2. STATUTES (§ 77*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—SALE OF LIQUOR—UNIVERSITY GROUNDS—“PRINCIPAL ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE.”

Pen. Code, § 172a, provides that every person who, on or within $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles of a university grounds or campus, on which are located the “principal administrative offices” of any university having an enrollment of more than 1,000 students, more than 500 of whom reside or lodge on such university grounds or campus, sells, gives away, or exposes for sale any vinous or alcoholic liquors is guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the words “principal administrative offices” as so used did not mean those offices and those activities through which the university, as an institution, was organized and financed, but were used in the sense of the principal place of business of the university as such, and that act was not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 11, and of article 4, § 25, subd. 33, as a special and local law, on the theory that classification based on the student enrollment and student residence was improper and unreasonable, and was adopted as a mere cover of an intent to make the statute applicable to a single university, and that the act was general.

In Bank. Petition of B. Burke for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of San Mateo County and the Superior Court of that county. Petition dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

Thomas, Gerstle, Frick & Beedy, and J. J. Lerman, for petitioner. S. F. Leib and Edward F. Treadwell, for Leland Stanford Junior University. Joseph J. Bullock, Dist. Atty., and Ross & Ross, for respondent San Mateo County.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner was arrested and convicted in the justice's court of a violation of the provisions of section 172a of the Penal Code, which section, in so far as it is pertinent to this consideration, reads as follows: “Every person who, upon or within one and one-half miles of the university grounds or campus, upon which are located the principal administrative offices of any university having an enrollment of more than one thousand students, more than five hundred of whom reside or lodge upon such university grounds or campus, sells, gives away, or exposes for sale, any vinous or alcoholic liquors, is guilty of a misdemeanor.” He sued out and obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the superior court of San Mateo county asserting the illegality of this law, and was remanded to custody. In like manner he was remanded under a writ of habeas corpus sued out by him and issued from the district Court of Appeal. As his petition before this court presents the question of the constitutionality of the section of the Penal Code above quoted, for the final determination of that question a writ was issued from this court.

Petitioner contends that the act under which he was convicted violates article 1, § 11, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation; that it violates the provision of article 4, § 25, subd. 33, of the same Constitution, which provides that the “Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say * * * 33. In all those cases where a general law can be made applicable.” And, finally, he contends that the law is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The argument of petitioner is that the law is, in fact, a special law directed against the sale of liquor within $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the Leland Stanford, Jr., University; that there is merely a colorable attempt to phrase the law in general language; that the limitations in the law of the number of enrolled students, of the number of students residing or lodging upon the university grounds, and of the location of the principal administrative offices, are, one and all, unreasonable in themselves, and designed to make the law applicable only to the one educational institution above named.

If the concession should be at once made that this is a special law, and that it was designed to accomplish the very purpose which petitioner specifies, it still would not follow that the law must for that reason be condemned; for, if the case be one to which a general law cannot be made applicable, the constitutional limitation upon the power of the Legislature is at an end, and the Legislature may properly pass a special law to meet such a case. People v. Mullender, 132 Cal. 217, 64 Pac. 299. If it be that the Leland Stanford University is an educational institution needing legislation, and if, because of the character of the institution, its location, or any one of a number of other reasons appearing sufficient to the legislative mind, the desired or required legislation is special to that university, and is not applicable to educational institutions as a whole, or as a class, there is no prohibition in the law against the Legislature passing just such special legislation of this character as the exigencies of the situation may demand. If, therefore, the Legislature had specifically addressed this legislation to the requirements of the Leland Stanford University, it would demand a very plain exposition of the abuse of legislative power before a court would hold that the legislation should have been made to apply to all or to any designated class of educational institutions.

[1] But passing this consideration, we come to the question whether this legislation, couched in general language, is obnoxious to the constitutional inhibition against passing special legislation in those cases where general laws may be made applicable. And, first, it is to be borne in mind that such legislation is not to be condemned, merely because the class to which it applies consists of but one unit, individual, or entity. Thus, where population is made the basis of classification, we have frequent instances of single cities or of single counties forming a separate class, but the classification itself is never judicially condemned for that reason, because when the power to classify has been given to the Legislature there is always with that power vested necessarily a very wide discretion in its exercise. Grumbach v. Leland, 154 Cal. 679, 98 Pac. 1059; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 Pac. 578; Bacon v. Walker, 204 U. S. 311, 27 Sup. Ct. 289, 51 L. Ed. 499.

The law under consideration is penal. It is passed in the exercise of the police power. Its very apparent design is to protect students in the formative periods of their lives from the temptations of alcoholic drink. There is no occasion to point out the evils to which such alcoholic indulgences lead, in the deterioration of the moral and physical fiber of the student, in the destruction of discipline, and in the general demoralization, not alone to the student, but to the educational institution itself, which follows.

[2] It is argued, however, that, while in proper cases numbers or population may be the basis of classification, the basis of numbers in a law such as this is entirely without justification. But we do not think this is sound. A classification of educational institutions for the indicated purpose may well be based on numbers. The Legislature did not mean that any institution which called itself a university should, for the purposes of this law, be considered a university. It proposed for those purposes to say, and did say, that it should be a university with an enrollment of 1,000 students. True, as argued, there is no reason why an institution with an enrollment of 1,000 students should be put upon a different plane from an institution with an enrollment of 999 students; but, if this argument were to be recognized as final, it would mean the destruction of every classification based upon numbers or population, since no court could judicially declare in the case of a city or county that there was any difference justifying a classification between a population of 99,999 and 100,000. The judicial answer which has been and always must be made to this argument is that made by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Bacon v. Walker, supra, namely that where the discretion so to classify is vested in the Legislature the selection of a limit is a legislative power which will be judicially reviewed only in a plain case of abuse.

The same answer is to be made to the second objection to the requirement touching a residence upon the university grounds of more than 500 enrolled students. There is, in this respect, of course, no material difference between a residence of 500 students and a residence of 501 students. The Legislature, however, has seen fit to prescribe that there shall be a residence of more than 500 students. It may have been within the legislative contemplation that when a lesser number of the students is resident upon the university grounds it is within the power of the university authorities to exercise such personal control over them as to relieve from the necessity of passing such a penal law. However this may be, the basis of the classification is not inherently unreasonable. It was within the legislative power and discretion to fix some limit, and while there is no essential difference between 499 resident students and 500 resident students, yet, if you carry the reasoning down the scale, still recognizing that there is no essential difference between 499 resident students and 498 resident students, the point will be reached where there is a marked difference between 500 resident students and 2 resident students. It will, of course, be said that such a law for 2 resident students would be unnecessary, but within its powers the Legislature has said that such a law becomes necessary when there are more than 500 resident students, and a court cannot say that the limit which the Legislature has thus fixed is so inherently unreasonable as to destroy the law itself.

The third objection to the validity of this act is that it limits the operation of the law to that class of educational institutions which, in addition to enrollment and residence of the specified number of students, has its "principal administrative offices" located upon the grounds or campus. In other words, the selling of liquor is prohibited within 1½ miles of only those grounds or campuses upon which are situated the "principal administrative offices" of the university. "Principal administrative offices" is not a fortunate phrase in a penal law such as this, since very clearly it requires construction. If "principal administrative offices" is to be construed to mean the meeting place of the regents of the University of California, or the meeting place of the trustees of the Leland Stanford University, it would often be that the "principal administrative offices" of any or every university are far removed from the grounds or campus upon which the educational activities of the institution are carried on. It cannot be that this was the meaning of "principal administrative offices" as employed in this section. The phrase is used as descriptive of the character of the grounds or campus to which the penal law is made to apply. It is not made to apply to university grounds or a university campus generally. Thus, treating of the University of California, it would not apply to its subordinate grounds, where special educational activities were in progress. It would not apply to the Lick Observatory. It would not apply to the Affiliated Colleges. It would not apply to its agricultural stations, but would apply only to those grounds and that campus which form the center of its activities, and where, because they are the center of its activities, the "principal administrative offices," within the meaning of the law, must be located. In this sense the "principal administrative offices" does not mean those offices and those activities through which the university, as an institution, is organized and financed. It means the principal place of business of the university as a university, where the principal educational functions of the university are carried out. So construed, the law means to limit the inhibition upon the sale of liquor to what we may designate the university proper, and the language is so chosen to avoid any possible application of the law to any outlying grounds or campuses, and, so construed, there is nothing unreasonable in the phrase "principal administrative offices."

It follows from the foregoing that if the classification here made be a narrow one, there is still reason for its narrowness, and the law operates uniformly upon all within the designated class.

Wherefore the writ is discharged, and the prisoner is remanded.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Petition by Tirey L. Ford for writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

A. A. Moore, Garret W. McEnerney, and Stanley Moore, for petitioner. C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and A. E. Lane, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Petitioner seeks to be released from the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco on habeas corpus.

On May 25, 1907, fourteen indictments, and on March 26, 1908, three other indictments, were returned and filed against petitioner charging him with bribery of various members of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco in connection with the granting of an electric overhead trolley system franchise on certain streets of said city to the United Railroads Company, a corporation. Petitioner gave bail under all these indictments, and was at liberty upon the same until about the time of his application for this writ. His trial under the first series of fourteen indictments was set for September 12, 1907, upon which date he was tried upon one of them resulting in a disagreement of the jury. Between this last date and May 2, 1908, he was tried on two other indictments of this first series and acquitted. A trial of petitioner was not had under any other of the indictments of said series. Various dates, however, were fixed therefor between September 12, 1907, and February 17, 1910, and continuances had until this latter date, sometimes with the consent of petitioner and sometimes against his protest. No trial of petitioner was had under any of the second series of indictments returned March 26, 1908. One of these was dismissed by the court and the trial of petitioner upon the others was from a date originally fixed therefor from time to time continued up to February 17, 1910, sometimes with the consent, and at other times against the protest, of petitioner.

On February 7, 1910, the district attorney moved to dismiss all these indictments on the ground of lack of evidence to convict petitioner. This motion was denied by the court, and by consent of petitioner the trial under all these indictments was continued until February 17, 1910. On this latter date, when the cases were again called for trial, petitioner announced his readiness to proceed therewith, but the court, of its own motion, continued the trial until April 25, 1910, against the objection and protest of petitioner. On April 25, 1910, the date to which said trial had been continued, petitioner moved the court to dismiss all of said indictments upon the ground that the trial of petitioner under each of them had been continued and postponed for more than 60 days last past without his consent and against his protest, insisting that under section 1382 of the Penal Code he was entitled to a dismissal of each and all of said indictments. The court, without disposing of said motion to dismiss and against the objection and protest of petitioner, made an order continuing the trial of petitioner under all of said indictments and his motion to dismiss the same until July 14, 1910. Thereafter, and on June 22, 1910, petitioner, who had been theretofore at liberty on his bail bond given on all these indictments procured his sureties to surrender him to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and immediately thereafter applied to this court for this writ of habeas corpus, which was granted. In making the order for the writ, bail, pending the hearing and disposition by this court, in the same amount as under the indictments, was fixed. This was given by the petitioner who is now at large thereunder.

Having stated the facts, we now come to a disposition of this matter after a hearing had on the return to the writ.

The Constitution of this state guarantees to every person charged with crime the right to a speedy and public trial. Const. art. 1, § 13. In order to prescribe with definiteness what should constitute a reasonable time under the constitutional mandate, it is declared in the Penal Code that, unless good cause is shown to the contrary, a prosecution must be dismissed against a defendant when an indictment or information has not been filed against him within 30 days after he was committed to answer, or he is not brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the indictment or information against him and the trial had not been postponed on his application. Pen. Code, § 1382. The effect of the last portion of the Code provision is to imperatively fix the time as 60 days within which, under the constitutional guaranty, a defendant must be brought to trial, and to declare that the guaranty is violated and the defendant entitled to a dismissal of the indictment against him when he is not brought to trial within said 60 days after it is filed, unless good cause for not doing so is shown or the postponement of his trial beyond that period is made on his application. The claim of petitioner is that in clear violation of the constitutional guaranty and the provision of the Penal Code he is retained in custody under the indictments against him, and is entitled on the showing made at the hearing in this proceeding to a discharge from custody.

At the hearing the main question presented was whether under the provision of the Penal Code referred to there was good cause shown by the prosecution which warranted the superior court in continuing the trials of petitioner from February 17, 1910, to April 25, 1910, and again from the latter date to July 14, 1910, over the protest and objection of the petitioner, and in denying his motion for a dismissal of the indictments, which was, in effect, the result of continuing the trial and disposition of the motion from April 25, 1910, to July 14, 1910. It was insisted by the respondent to this writ that on the several days when continuances were ordered by the court a showing was made to it that a material witness for the prosecution—one J. L. Gallagher—upon whose testimony the prosecution relied for a conviction, could not be produced, and that this showing constituted good cause warranting the orders made. On the part of the petitioner the claim is that a simple showing that Gallagher was absent and could not be produced at the dates the trial had been set for did not amount to a showing of good cause or state any legal justification whatever under the section of the Penal Code for ordering the continuances or declining to grant the motion to dismiss; that it appeared that Gallagher had not been subpoenaed by the prosecution on the trial; that about November 26, 1909, he left California, and was then supposed to be somewhere in Europe, the particular locality unknown; that there was no showing made when, if ever, he would return to California, or that he would be available as a witness at any time to which a continuance might be had. We simply state the claims of the parties at the hearing as to the showing of good cause for the continuances, in a general way, because in the view we take as to the right of the petitioner to have the benefit of this writ, we are not called on to now determine whether under the Code provision there was any showing of good cause which justified the continuances as ordered by the court.

[1] Undoubtedly, where a defendant is not brought to trial within the statutory period, and no good cause is shown by the prosecution for a delay, it is the imperative duty of the superior court, on a motion of the defendant to that end, to order the indictment dismissed. The court has no discretionary power under such circumstances to further postpone the trial but is required to dismiss the indictment. Where, after such motion is made and denied and defendant is retained in prison, it has been held that he has a right to apply to this court for a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged from custody thereunder, and that when it appears upon the hearing here that there was no good cause for delay on the trial in the lower court beyond the 60 days provided in the statute, his discharge will be ordered. Ex parte Vinton, 47 Pac. 1019¹; In re Bergerow, 133 Cal. 349, 65 Pac. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178.

[2] But assuming the right of a defendant to be discharged on habeas corpus, when the constitutional guaranty and the statutory provisions have been violated and he is detained in custody, we do not think that under the later decisions of this court the petitioner is in a position to invoke the benefit of the writ. It is unnecessary to discuss the history of the writ of habeas corpus. That topic is thoroughly treated of in the books. While regarded as the greatest remedy known to the law whereby one unlawfully restrained of his liberty can secure his release, still, whether considered as it existed at common law or under the English statutes, or as guaranteed under the Constitutions of the various states, including our own, with appropriate statutory procedure for readily invoking it, the essential object and purpose of the writ is to inquire into all manner of involuntary restraint, as distinguished from voluntary, and relieve a person therefrom if such restraint is illegal. It was never contemplated, as anciently designed, or as at present guaranteed in the different jurisdictions of this country, that the writ should be invoked in behalf of a person who was not actually in restraint and involuntarily and illegally so, and the granting of the writ necessary to relieve him from such restraint.

Now, when we examine the facts here, it appears that the petitioner at the time when the application for the writ was made to this court was not in actual, involuntary imprisonment such as entitled him to invoke its benefit. It was shown on the hearing that petitioner after the failure of the court to pass upon his motion to dismiss and the making of the order of April 25, 1910, further continuing his trial, procured the sureties on his bail bond to surrender him on June 22, 1910, into the custody of the sheriff. Application was made on the same latter date to this court for this writ, which at that same date was granted and petitioner was ordered admitted to bail pending its hearing. This bail was at once given by the same sureties, and he was released from custody and has been at liberty ever since. While it is true that the petitioner was in the custody of the sheriff for a short time pending his surrender and his admission to bail under the order of this court, it is quite clear that this surrender by his sureties was solely for the purpose of working an imprisonment upon which to base an application for this writ to which otherwise he would not be entitled. It was evidently intended that the custody should endure no longer than was necessary to make this application and was solely for the purpose of making out a case to support the issuance of the writ.

But the right to a writ of habeas corpus to determine the illegality of a detention under criminal process is not intended to apply, and may not be invoked, when the imprisonment which is made the basis of its issuance is self-invited, and the surrender by the sureties is made at the instance of the petitioner, and is solely for the purpose of making a case on the face of the petition to which the provisions of the habeas corpus act will apply. This, at least, is the rule firmly established in this jurisdiction where petitions for a writ of habeas corpus were made under similar circumstances, and it likewise applies in other jurisdictions. In re Gow, 139 Cal. 242, 73 Pac. 145; Ex parte Schmitz, 150 Cal. 663, 89 Pac. 438, and cases referred to therein. In both these cases the circumstances under which applications for writs of habeas corpus were made were similar to those attending the application at bar. In the last case mentioned, after reciting the fact that the custody into which the petitioner Schmitz had surrendered himself was self-invoked and submitted to only for the purpose of making out a case on habeas corpus, this court adopted the principle and rule announced in Re Gow, supra, where it was said: "Our conclusion is that such a practice ought not to be countenanced, and hereafter the court will make strict inquiry 'in this class of cases whether the alleged imprisonment is actual and involuntary and if it be found to be, as in this case, a merely nominal restraint voluntarily submitted to for the purpose of making out a case, the proceeding will be dismissed.'" And in the Schmitz Case this court, after quoting the foregoing, said: "We deem the rule here declared a most salutary one entirely in accord with the object and purpose of the remedy by habeas corpus and adhere thereto. See, also, In re Dykes, 13 Okl. 336, 74 Pac. 506; In re Dill (Kan.) 11 Pac. 672; Commonwealth v. Green, 185 Pa. 641, 40 Atl. 96, 21 Cyc. 290. The writ is discharged and the proceeding is dismissed."

tation and for the purpose of invoking the benefit of this proceeding on habeas corpus, and hence his application would fall within the rule laid down in the above cases, still that distinction should be made between his case and the cases cited; that the Gow Case was obviously an attempt to have this court determine on habeas corpus the validity of a local municipal ordinance, the Schmitz Case to have determined on habeas corpus the validity of an indictment; that these were questions which could be submitted for original determination in the trial court, and, if decided adversely to either petitioner, he had a remedy by appeal, in the one instance to the superior court, in the other to the district court of appeal; and that for these reasons, aside from voluntary surrender, this court was warranted in refusing to entertain the writs in those cases; that, on the other hand, in the case of petitioner there is no other remedy save the writ of habeas corpus which he can invoke for a violation by the superior court of his constitutional right to a speedy trial.

Giving due consideration to these suggestions, it is to be observed that the denial of the writ to petitioners in the cases cited was not placed on the ground that the points made on the hearing for a discharge under the writ of habeas corpus were available to the defendants in the trial court or on appeal, but the refusal to entertain the proceedings was placed specifically on the ground that voluntary imprisonment, had for the sole purpose of making a case on habeas corpus, was contrary to the spirit, purpose, and object of the writ and was an abuse of it. As the showing here clearly brings petitioner within the rule announced in the cases referred to, we perceive no reason why in his case it should not be adhered to and his petition dismissed.

[3] Nor, as claimed by petitioner, is he without remedy unless in a habeas corpus proceeding, because we are satisfied that where a superior court, without good cause shown therefor, and arbitrarily, has postponed the trial of a defendant without his consent beyond the 60 days within which the statute declares he must be tried, or the indictment against him dismissed, he is entitled to relief by a proceeding in mandamus. It is true that the contrary view was entertained in Strong v. Grant, 99 Cal. 100, 33 Pac. 733, which was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the superior court to dismiss a criminal prosecution for failure to bring the petitioner to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information against him. It was there held that mandamus could not be issued to correct errors of a court in passing upon a question regularly submitted to it in the course of a judicial proceeding, or to control the exercise of its discretion; that the petitioner Strong having invoked a judicial decision in submitting his motion for a dismissal to the superior court, although the court may have erred in the decision of the question then submitted, the error could not be corrected on mandamus.

But it is quite apparent that if, as we hold, one will not be permitted to invoke proceedings in habeas corpus where his surrender into custody by his sureties is self-solicited, and his imprisonment thereby voluntarily assumed solely for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of the writ, and the rule in the Strong Case that he is not entitled to a writ of mandate is to be adhered to, a peculiar situation arises under which one whose right to a speedy trial guaranteed by the Constitution and under the statute is violated is entirely without remedy even when it appears that the postponement of his trial beyond the 60 days is arbitrarily made and unwarranted for any reason.

In this case of Strong v. Grant the present Chief Justice concurred in the denial of the application for a writ of mandamus because, in his judgment, there were circumstances in the case other than those stated in the main opinion upon which the superior court could without an abuse of discretion hold that there was good cause for delay in proceeding against the prisoner. In such concurring opinion, however, he so clearly presented the remediless situation in which a defendant is placed who is not permitted to invoke either habeas corpus, or mandamus, when his trial is arbitrarily and unjustifiably postponed beyond the period fixed by the statute, under the constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial, and the Code section in aid of it, that we quote from it. He said: "A person charged with a criminal offense has a right to a speedy trial, in order that, if innocent, he may go free. To detain him in custody, or to compel him by the exaction of bail to dance attendance upon a court while his trial is arbitrarily postponed without his consent, is not only a wrong and injustice to him, but is a detriment to the public. The design of the statute, quoted in the opinion of the court, is to prevent these evils. The effect of that opinion, however, coupled with other decisions in similar cases, is to deprive the statute of its intended operation—so far, at least, as its enforcement by this court is concerned—and to pervert it to a use wholly foreign and inimical to its purpose. In effect, it has been held that, no matter how unjustifiably the right secured by the statute has been disregarded by the superior court, the party injured has no remedy except by an appeal to this court, and this obviously is no remedy at all for an innocent man whose trial has been unreasonably delayed, because upon his acquittal he has nothing to appeal from. The only persons who can appeal are those who have been found guilty, and they, if their convictions are otherwise illegal, have no occasion to resort to this statute for their deliverance. The only person, therefore, who can secure its benefits through the intervention of this court is one who stands convicted under a judgment in all other respects free from error, or, in other words, one who is actually guilty of the crime charged against him. People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 515 [24 Pac. 892]. It is very safe to say that the Legislature would never have enacted such a law if this were the only case in which it could be made effective. The truth is the law was enacted like all similar provisions relating to criminal procedure for the benefit of the innocent—and not for the sake of screening the guilty. It is true, with respect to this, as with respect to all rules of procedure deemed necessary for the security of innocent men unjustly accused. Guilty men also—being deemed innocent until proved guilty—may take advantage of them, but it is a most extraordinary result that for the wanton and deliberate violation of this rule, an innocent man has no remedy, while one justly convicted of a crime may by means of it evade the penalty. To me it seems there must be a mistake somewhere in the decisions that lead to such a result, and I think the mistake consists either in holding that the injured party cannot resort to a mandamus, as this opinion holds, or in holding that he cannot resort to habeas corpus, as was held upon a former proceeding by this petitioner. (December 12, 1892.) If an innocent man who is kept in jail month after month while his trial is arbitrarily postponed cannot resort to this court for relief, either by habeas corpus or by mandamus, I know of no other remedy he has. Appeal, as above stated, is no remedy, for he cannot appeal until after a trial, and the refusal to bring him to trial is the very wrong of which he complains, and moreover, being innocent, it is to be presumed he will be acquitted if he ever is brought to trial, and that he will have nothing to appeal from. I cannot bring myself to admit that for such a wrong there is no remedy, and consequently I feel satisfied that either habeas corpus or mandamus must lie.”

Digressing for a moment, it may be said that in the habeas corpus proceeding referred to in the foregoing opinion Ex parte Strong, 31 Pac. 574, it was held by this court that while the allegations in the petition, if true, showed that it was the duty of the superior court to dismiss the prosecution, it was held that until the prosecution was dismissed the imprisonment was lawful. This doctrine while supported by decisions in other jurisdictions is opposed to the rulings in In re Begerow, supra, and Ex parte Vinton, supra, where it was held that when a motion to dismiss for failure to bring one to trial within the statutory time has been denied by the superior court and no reason or other cause whatever exists or is shown why the defendant has not been brought to trial within the limited time provided by the statute and he is retained in actual, involuntary custody, a writ of habeas corpus will lie, and, upon such a showing, the defendant petitioner will be discharged from custody thereunder.

Recurring now to Strong v. Grant, which is the only authority here holding that mandamus will not lie even where it appears that the court should have granted the motion to dismiss, and its action refusing it is plainly arbitrary and an abuse of discretion, it will be found that that decision is based upon the general rule referred to therein that a writ of mandamus cannot be issued to correct the errors of a court in passing upon questions regularly submitted to it in the course of a judicial proceeding, or to control the exercise of its discretion. Several authorities are cited in that opinion illustrating the application of the general rule, but the case of Lewis v. Barclay, 35 Cal. 213, was particularly relied on and quoted from. In this latter case a writ of mandate was sought here to compel a county judge to reinstate an appeal which it was claimed he had erroneously dismissed. In refusing the writ this court said: “The duty to be performed by the respondent in this case was strictly judicial, and there was no refusal on his part to perform it. He may, or may not, have erred in the disposition of the case, but whether he did or not his action cannot be reviewed by mandamus, nor, indeed, by any other means, for the case is one of which the county court had final jurisdiction, and, if error was committed, there is no remedy.” But, while it is true that when the Strong Case was decided, and for many years thereafter, the general rule prevailed as laid down in Lewis v. Barclay that mandamus would not lie to compel an inferior court to reinstate an appeal regularly dismissed even where the appellant was otherwise without remedy, a different view has for several years past been entertained by this court, and in the case of Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 114 Pac. 978, it is expressly held that a writ of mandate will lie to the superior court to compel it to reinstate an appeal from a justice's court erroneously dismissed. So that, in as far as the decision in the Strong Case is based particularly on the doctrine announced in Lewis v. Barclay—a doctrine which no longer obtains here—to that extent has the case of Strong v. Grant lost its weight as an authority.

[4] And, while the general rule announced in Strong v. Grant, that a writ of mandate cannot be issued to correct the errors of a court in passing upon questions regularly submitted to it in the course of judicial proceedings or to control the exercise of its discretion undoubtedly obtains, it is not universally true that such writ will not issue to control such discretion or to require a judicial tribunal to which a matter for determination is submitted, to act in a particular way. As an illustration, a writ of mandate will issue to compel the superior court to reinstate an appeal erroneously dismissed (Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, supra); to compel a judge to enter judgment on the report of a referee (Russell v. Elliott, 2 Cal. 245); to compel a district judge to issue an attachment for contempt in disobeying an injunction (Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130); to compel a judge to sign a bill of exceptions (Lin Tai v. Hewill, 56 Cal. 118; People v. Crane, 60 Cal. 279); to compel the court under the McEnerney act (Laws 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78) to order a publication of summons, although the refusal may be based on the insufficiency of the complaint or the accompanying affidavit; to compel a judge to settle a statement or bill of exceptions. Other illustrations, if necessary, might be given. It is hardly necessary to say that in all the matters particularly referred to the exercise of judicial discretion by the lower court is in the first instance involved, and yet it is held that on mandamus such judicial discretion may be controlled, and the lower court or judge thereof, compelled to act in a particular way when the facts are not in dispute, and the court has come to a wrong conclusion of law therefrom, or disregarded a duty expressly enjoined by the law under the undisputed facts.

This subject of controlling the judicial discretion of the lower court by mandamus is exhaustively treated in Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, where, after reviewing the authorities we have referred to and authorities from other jurisdictions, it is said that: "In view of the foregoing cases, it seems a mere perversion of language to say that the writ will never issue to control judicial action or to compel a tribunal to act in a particular way." In this same case the court lays down the test under which the right to a writ of mandate is to be determined, where it is said: "In every case the tribunal that is to act must determine in the first instance whether the case is a proper one for its action. And in our opinion the true tests are whether its determination is intended by law to be final; and, if not, whether there is any other 'plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.' If the determination of the tribunal was intended to be final, it is plain that it cannot be disturbed, either on mandamus or in any other way. If it was not intended to be final, but there is another 'plain, speedy, and adequate remedy,' the writ cannot issue; for it was not designed to usurp the place of other remedies. But, if the determination was not intended to be final, and there is no other adequate remedy, the writ must issue. Otherwise there would be an admitted wrong without a remedy. The writ issues in such case to prevent a failure of justice. And this is its ancient office. In the language of Lord Mansfield: 'It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of police. Therefore it ought to be used upon all occasions where the law has established no specific remedy, and where, in justice and good government, there ought to be one.' Rex v. Barker, 3 Burr. 1268. See, also, 3 Bla. Com. 110; Tapping on Mandamus, 9; Commonwealth v. Sessions of Hampden, 2 Pick. [Mass.] 418."

[5] There is no finality to an order refusing to dismiss an indictment where the motion is based on the ground that the trial of a defendant has been illegally continued beyond the prescribed period. It may be reviewed on appeal if the defendant is subsequently brought to trial and convicted. There is, however, no appeal directly from the order refusing to dismiss and the right of appeal after conviction affords no adequate remedy as the defendant may never be brought to trial. Under such circumstances, if a party at large on bail is not afforded a remedy by mandamus to correct a clear abuse of discretion on the part of the court in arbitrarily refusing to dismiss the indictment against him, where he has not been brought to trial within the specified period, the constitutional guaranty and the statutory mandate are, as to him, worthless. While in the Wood Case the court was considering more particularly the right to a writ of mandate in civil cases, still the writ lies as well in criminal cases where there is a clear legal right to be enforced, as well as a clear legal duty on the part of the court to discharge it and where there is no other remedy. 26 Ency. L. & Proc. pp. 166, 188, 218.

It is unnecessary to discuss this matter further. As far as the case of Strong v. Grant is concerned, we do not think the rule announced there denying a defendant the right to a writ of mandate where he has not been brought to trial within the statutory period and no good cause for the refusal to dismiss exists should be adhered to. The rule is not supported by the weight of authority, finds no support now in the doctrine announced in the case particularly referred to and quoted from to sustain it, and is not consonant with justice, because it deprives the party of all remedy where there may exist an arbitrary violation of his clear constitutional and statutory rights. In our view, a defendant who claims that the superior court illegally refuses to grant his motion to dismiss an indictment against him where he had not been brought to trial within 60 days is entitled to apply to this court for a writ of mandate, and if, upon the hearing thereof, it clearly appears that there was no good cause shown at the hearing of the motion, and upon which showing alone would the court be warranted under the statute in refusing to dismiss, that the action of the court in its refusal was simply arbitrary and amounted to an abuse of discretion, this court will direct a peremptory writ of mandate to issue compelling the superior court to do what, in the absence of such showing, was its clear positive legal duty, dismiss the indictment.

It is, of course, to be understood that such a writ will only issue where there was an entire absence of any showing constituting good cause presented in the superior court upon the hearing of the motion to dismiss. If the evidence presented on that subject was conflicting or on the conceded facts in evidence a reasonable deduction therefrom would support the action of the trial court in denying the motion, a writ of mandate would be denied.

As under the authorities heretofore referred to the petitioner is not in a position to avail himself of this proceeding in habeas corpus, his petition therefor is dismissed and he is remanded to custody.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by F. R. Walti and others against Marks Gaba and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Cassin & Lucas, for appellants. Joseph H. Skirm, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case was ordered heard in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First district.

The opinion filed in that court, prepared by Hall, J., was as follows:

"This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

"On the 2d day of April, 1906, plaintiffs were the owners of 39 sacks of wool of the fall clip of 1905, then stored with the Kron Tanning Company in San Francisco, and a band of sheep located on a ranch at Bitter Water, near Kings City. On said day plaintiffs and defendants entered into a written contract as follows:

"Tully Ranch, Bitter Water, April 2, 1906.

"I, the undersigned, have this day sold to Gaba-Magidson all of our spring wool clip of 1906 at eighteen (18) cent per lb.; also the fall clip wool of 1905 at fourteen (14) cent per lb. The fall wool, which is stored at the Kron Tanning Co. office, at San Francisco, the spring wool to be delivered at Kings City depot in consideration thereof we accepted a deposit of two hundred and fifty (250) dollars part payment of said sale, the balance to be paid on the delivery of wool.

"[Signed] Walti and Bourdieu,

"Per Ed. Bourdieu."

"The $250 referred to in the contract was paid to plaintiffs by defendants upon the execution of the contract. At this time the wool described as the spring clip of 1906 was growing on the bodies of the sheep running on the ranch at Bitter Water, and the fall wool of 1905 was stored with the Kron Tanning Company in San Francisco, where it remained until the conflagration of April 18, 1906, when it was destroyed. In May, 1906, after the sheep had been sheared, plaintiffs tendered the spring clip of wool at Kings City to defendants and demanded payment for all the wool, both that then tendered and the wool that had been destroyed at the Kron Tanning Company's warehouse on April 18th, at the stipulated price. 1. SALES (§ 61*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—"BOUGHT"—"SOLD."

The use of the words "bought and sold" in a written contract of sale does not necessarily import a present sale, but are frequently used to express a mere agreement to sell.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 162-170; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 850, 851; vol. 7, pp. 6540-6542; vol. 8, p. 7801.]

2. SALES (§§ 62, 214*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

Plaintiffs executed a memorandum reciting that one of them had that day sold to defendants all plaintiffs' spring wool clip of 1906 at 18 cents per pound, also the fall clip of 1905 at 14 cents per pound, the fall wool being stored at a specified place, the spring wool to be delivered at a specified depot, and had accepted a deposit of $250, part payment, the balance to be paid on the delivery of the wool. At the time of the execution of the memorandum, the spring 1906 clip was growing on the bodies of the sheep, and the fall wool was stored as recited, where it remained until April, 1906, when it was destroyed by fire. Held, that the contract was entire, and since the spring clip was requir-ants refused to pay for the destroyed wool, but offered to accept and pay for the spring wool at 18 cents per pound, less the $250 paid on account. This offer plaintiffs refused, and insisted on payment for all the wool, less the $250 paid on account, and, defendant refusing to accept the tendered wool on these terms, plaintiffs brought suit for $2,195.34, being the price of all the wool, both that which had been destroyed and the spring clip of 1906, less $250, paid at the execution of the contract.

"Defendants answered and sought to recover the $250 paid to plaintiffs.

"Appellants' theory was and is that the transaction had between them and defendants was an absolute sale, and that title passed to all the wool involved at the time the memorandum was signed by Walti and Bourdieu and the $250 paid by Gaba and Magidson.

"If this theory of the case be correct, it is certain that defendants should bear the loss of the destroyed wool and should pay for the entire amount. But the respondents contend that the transaction constituted an agreement to sell and to buy only, and that no title passed at the execution of the contract, or would pass until delivery of the wool.

"The court adopted respondents' theory of the case, and found in accordance with their pleadings: 'That the said plaintiffs did not sell and the said defendants did not buy any wool by the said agreement in writing, but the said plaintiffs agreed to sell and the said defendants agreed to buy the wool mentioned in the said agreement in writing upon the terms and conditions therein set forth and contained, and that the said agreement in writing constituted and was one entire contract, by which the said defendants agreed to pay the balance of the price of all the wool therein mentioned upon the delivery of all the wool therein mentioned by the said plaintiffs to them, the said defendants.' It is the correctness of this finding that is attacked.

"We are of the opinion that the interpretation adopted by the court of the transaction is sufficiently supported by the writing itself, and the evidence as to the circumstances and conditions surrounding its execution.

[1] "It is true that the writing states that 'I have this day sold,' etc., but the use of the word 'sold' or the word 'bought' does not always import a present sale, but such words are frequently used where the parties in fact intend only an agreement to sell. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 218 [18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199]; Anderson v. Read, 106 N. Y. 344 [13 N. E. 292]; McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 458; Elgee Cotton Cases, 22 Wall. 180 [22 L. Ed. 863].

"If the contract now under discussion had only referred to the spring wool, which was still growing on the backs of the sheep at the execution of the contract, and had then still to be fully grown, sheared, and delivered at

Kings City by appellants, there could hardly be room for discussion as to the fact that no title passed at the execution of the contract. The rule laid down by Benjamin on Sales, and approved in Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., supra, and in Elgee Cotton Cases, supra, is: 'Where by the agreement the vendor is to do anything to the goods for the purpose of putting them into that state in which the purchaser is bound to accept them, or, as it is sometimes worded, into a deliverable state, the performance of those things shall, in the absence of circumstances indicating a contrary intention, be taken to be a condition precedent to the vesting of property.'

"In the case at bar it is perfectly clear from the conditions existing when the writing was executed that the parties intended that the appellants, the owners of the sheep, should care for the sheep until the proper time for shearing the spring wool, should then shear it and put it in a condition for delivery, transport it to Kings City, and there deliver it. Incident to this delivery it would also be necessary to weigh it to ascertain the price to be paid, and this is laid down by Benjamin, and approved in the Blackwood Case and in the Elgee Cotton Cases, as another indication that the title has not passed.

"If the sheep had been destroyed by act of God before the spring wool had been sheared, and the wool thus lost, it would hardly be contended by any one that the buyer should bear the loss of the wool, or could be compelled to pay for it. Yet this would be the case if title had vested in him. He would not bear such loss, because the title to the wool had not vested in him, and by the terms of the contract was not intended to vest in him until it had been sheared and delivered at Kings City. In both Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., supra, and the Elgee Cotton Cases, supra, the pivotal point was as to whether title had passed to the buyer upon the execution of the contract.

"In the Elgee Cotton Cases, supra, a part payment had been made, and the contract provided that the cotton 'from this date is at the risk of Mr. Lobdell' (the buyer). Yet, as in the Blackwood Case, the court held that no title had passed, in accordance with the rule above quoted from Benjamin on Sales. In neither case can the essential facts be distinguished from the facts in the case at bar, so far as the sale of the spring wool is concerned, and, so far as the contract related to the spring wool, it is perfectly plain that no title passed at the execution of the contract.

"This brings us to a more particular consideration of the contract as relating to the fall wool.

"The court found that the agreement constituted one entire contract, by which the defendants agreed to pay the balance of the price of all the wool therein mentioned upon the delivery of all the wool mentioned.

"In this connection we note that appellants in their brief claim that the fall wool was delivered. The record does not support this claim. It is true that Mr. Bourdieu did testify that Mr. Gaba, who acted for defendants, agreed to go to San Francisco the next day after making of the contract, and take and pay for the wool at the warehouse. Mr. Gaba, however, denied this, and testified that nothing was said about delivery, except as contained in the writing. In support of the action of the trial court, we must accept this as true. Appellants did notify the warehouseman to deliver the wool to defendants on their paying for it at 14 cents per pound, but no order on the warehouseman was given to defendants, and no notice given to defendants of the instructions sent to the warehouseman, and defendants never did in any way accept delivery of or control over the wool in the warehouse.

[2] "The court was justified in finding that the contract was entire. The circumstances under which the contract was executed, as well as the wording of the contract, indicate that it was an entire contract for the purchase of all the wool, both spring wool and fall wool. Under the contract the sellers could not compel acceptance and payment for the fall wool, unless they also delivered the spring wool. Neither could they compel payment for the spring wool, unless they delivered the fall wool. A payment of $250 was made at the execution of the contract. This was not a payment on the purchase price of the spring wool alone; neither was it a payment on the purchase price of the fall wool alone. It was a payment on the entire purchase price of all the wool. In the words of the contract, it was 'a part payment of said sale,' not a part payment of said sales. The contract concludes with the words, 'the balance to be paid on the delivery of wool.' These words indicate that the parties had in mind but one 'balance,' which would be the difference between the total purchase price and the $250 paid down. The language suggests but one more payment, the amount of which could only be ascertained or be due upon delivery of all the wool. The plaintiffs seem to have adopted this construction of the contract, for they made no demand for any payment until they tendered the spring wool. Further the evidence shows that defendants did not desire to purchase the fall wool at 14 cents, as they considered it worth but 13 or 13½ cents per pound, while plaintiffs desired 19 cents per pound for the spring wool, but would not sell it for even that price, unless they also sold the fall wool. Mr. Gaba testified that he could not get the spring wool unless he bought the fall wool with it. In support of the action of the trial court, we must accept this as true. It thus appears that the inducement to the contract as made was the sale and purchase of the entire lot. In such case the contract is entire, and not severable. 35 Cyc. 116.

"Upon the question of the entirety of the contract, a case in all respects in point with the case at bar is the case of Thompson & Petty v. Conover, 30 N. J. Law, 329. Conover agreed to sell to Petty all the corn he then had, about 600 bushels, at 65 cents per bushel for the white, and 63 cents per bushel for the yellow. The white was delivered and accepted, but Petty without cause refused to accept the yellow. Conover then sued in trover to recover the white corn that had been delivered. It was held that the contract was entire, and that the seller could recover from the buyer the possession of the corn delivered, as the buyer refused to accept the other corn.

"In Pope v. Porter, 102 N. Y. 368 [7 N. E. 304], the contract was as follows: 'Sold to the following named parties Scotch Pig Iron to arrive as specified below * * * 500 tons Coltness pig iron at 36 per ton for shipment to be due here in April next, 500 tons of Coudler pig iron at 34 per ton, for shipment to be due here in March next. Payable on arrival here by four months note indorsed by the above-named parties with interest added at 6 per cent.'

"The seller did not deliver the Coudler iron, which was due to arrive in March, but did deliver the Coltness iron, which arrived later. This the buyer refused to accept, and the seller sued for its price. It was held that the contract was entire, and that the seller having failed to deliver the part first to be delivered could not recover for the iron subsequently tendered.

"Other instances of contracts for the purchase of different articles at specified prices for each article, which were held to be entire and not severable contracts, are found in Smith v. Lewis, 40 Ind. 98; Bruce v. Pearson, 3 Johns. [N. Y.] 534; Pratt v. Frasier, 72 S. C. 369 [51 S. E. 983].

"Because of the wording of the contract in the case at bar, the part payment to be credited on the entire purchase price, and balance to be paid on delivery of wool, as well as the circumstances in evidence concerning the sale of all or none of the wool, it is clear to us that the contract was entire.

"It is equally clear, under the authorities hereinbefore cited (Benjamin on Sales; Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., supra; Elgee Cotton Cases, supra), that it was not intended to pass title to the spring wool, until it had been sheared and delivered at Kings City. As the contract was entire, the court was justified in finding that it was not intended that title to the fall wool should pass until delivery of the spring wool. In other words, the court was justified in finding that the contract was not one of present sale, but an agreement to sell and deliver at a future time all the wool referred to. Before the time for delivery of all the wool had arrived, the fall wool was destroyed while still in the hands of the seller."

This opinion correctly states the facts of the case, except as to two matters which are altogether immaterial here, viz.: There were only 29 sacks of the fall wool, instead of 39, as stated in the opinion, and in the written agreement the word "of" occurred before the word "payment"; the agreement reading "part of payment," instead of "part payment."

Upon further consideration of the legal questions presented by the facts, we are satisfied with the views expressed by the District Court of Appeal in the foregoing opinion, and adopt the same as the opinion of this court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CLARK v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—BONDS—ELECTIONS—PROPOSITION—SEPARATE SUBMISSION.

Where the issuance of bonds by a city is submitted to vote of the electors, there must be a separate proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, or independent object or purpose for which it is intended to incur indebtedness, showing separately the amount desired for each one, in order that the voter may express his opinion on each without affecting the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1920; Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—BONDS—HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS—SUBMISSION TO VOTE.

A council resolution declared that the public interest demanded the acquisition and construction of certain municipal improvements in a harbor within the city, and particularly described the same by dividing them into two parts consisting of (1) "docks, wharves, and warehouses" on or adjacent to the city water front, and comprising that portion of the harbor lying southerly of a line passing through the center of a turning basin east of an island, together with an extension of streets to the water line, and the making of canals from such streets to the water, estimating the cost at $2,000,000; and (2) like improvements on that portion of the harbor lying north of the line referred to, of which part the estimated cost was $1,000,000. Held, that the proposition on the ballot, combining such improvements and reciting, "Shall the city incur a bonded debt of $3,000,000, to acquire and construct certain municipal improvements, to wit, the construction of docks, wharves, and harbors, and the opening, improving, constructing, and maintaining of streets and highways to navigable waters, the construction and maintaining of canals and waterways, and the acquisition of all necessary lands for improvement?" was not objectionable as submitting distinct propositions in a single question; the contemplated improvements being of the same character, and all relating to the improvement of the harbor in question.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 911*)—HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS—AUTHORITY—"DOCK"—"WHARVES."

Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1889, p. 457) art. 1, § 2, subd. 7, confers on the city of Los Angeles power to lay out, open, extend, pave, repave, and improve streets, and as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1291) authorizes the city to acquire or construct and operate public wharves, docks, piers, or moles along the seashore in connection with the transportation of passengers and freight between the ocean and the city. By the charter (section 258), as amended by St. 1909, p. 1303, the city was authorized, throughout its entire area, to acquire, construct, own, operate, and maintain docks, wharves, piers, canals, and sea walls; and by section 262, as amended by St. 1909, p. 1305, was given power to incur a bonded debt for all the foregoing purposes, including the maintaining of the streets in question. Held that, since the term "dock" means an artificial basin, in connection with a harbor, for the reception of vessels and the slip or waterway extending between two piers or projecting wharves, waterways were included within the term, and warehouses were included within the right to erect "wharves," so that the city was authorized to contract indebtedness for the construction of docks, wharves, and warehouses, including the maintaining of streets and highways to navigable waters, and the construction and maintaining of canals and waterways.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Percy H. Clark against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Scarborough & Bowen, for appellant. John W. Shenk, City Atty., Leslie R. Hewitt, and W. B. Mathews, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action against the city and certain of its officers to enjoin the sale of city bonds, amounting to $3,000,000, known as "Harbor Improvement Bonds," and to declare the same void. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and thereupon judgment was given for defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

The defendants claim that the issuance and sale of the bonds in question were authorized by the electors of Los Angeles city at an election called and held for that purpose on April 19, 1910. It is admitted that the amount exceeds the annual income and revenues of the city, and that, under section 18, art. 11, of the Constitution, they cannot be lawfully sold, unless authorized by the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city, voting at an election held for that purpose. Such an election was held, and the proposition to incur the indebtedness in the amount of these bonds, by the issuance and sale thereof, was carried by the necessary two-thirds vote. Appellant asserts that the proceedings are void.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

1. Appellant claims that the election was unavailing, because the question submitted with regard to these bonds included an aggregate debt to be incurred for two or more distinct and independent objects, each of which, it is argued, should have been submitted separately in a separate question.

The Constitution declares that no city "shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner, or for any purpose, exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose." Article 11, § 18. The act providing for such elections requires that the council shall first resolve that the public interest "demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any municipal improvement, * * * to carry out the objects, purposes and powers of the municipality, the cost of which will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income." At any subsequent meeting, it may pass an ordinance calling a special election to submit to the voters "the proposition of incurring a debt for the purpose set forth in said resolution, and no question other than the incurring of the indebtedness for said purpose shall be submitted; provided, that propositions of incurring indebtedness for more than one object or purpose may be submitted at the same election." This ordinance must "recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred." Stats. 1907, p. 609.

The resolution of the council declared that the public interest demanded "the acquisition and construction of certain municipal improvements" in the harbor of San Pedro, which had been shortly before brought into the city by annexation of territory. It more particularly described the proposed improvements by dividing them into two parts, to wit, first, "docks, wharves, and warehouses" upon or adjacent to the city water front bordering upon navigable waters, comprising that portion of the harbor lying southerly of a certain line passing through the center of the turning basin east of Smith Island, together with the extension of streets to said waters, and the making of canals from such streets to such waters, all of which part was estimated to cost $2,000,000; second, like improvements on that portion of the harbor lying northerly of said line, through the center of said turning basin, of which part the estimated cost was $1,000,000, making the total estimated cost of all the improvements $3,000,000. The ordinance calling the election also provided for the submission of a separate proposition to incur a debt of $3,500,000 to pay the cost of certain electric light and power works. It stated that the election was to be held to submit "the propositions of incurring debts for the purposes set forth in said resolutions and hereinafter stated." Two purposes were then stated, designated, respectively, as "first" and "second." The one designated as "first" described all the harbor improvements, stating them in two parts, and giving the estimated cost of each part and the total cost of all, in the same words as in the resolution. It thus presented the proposition for all the harbor improvements as a single "purpose," for which a debt of $3,000,000 was necessary.

The proposition was stated on the ballot as follows: "Shall the city of Los Angeles incur a bonded debt of $3,000,000, for the purpose of acquiring and constructing certain municipal improvements in said city, to wit, the construction of docks, wharves and warehouses, the opening, improving, constructing and maintaining of streets and highways to navigable waters, the constructing and maintaining of canals and waterways, and the acquisition of the necessary lands for said improvements?"

It is obvious that the statement of the proposition in the ballot must needs be brief and in general terms. The purpose for which such elections are required is to obtain the assent of the voters to a public debt, to the amount, and for the object, proposed. The amount must, of course, be stated on the ballot; the general purpose must be stated with sufficient certainty to inform the voters, and not mislead them, as to the object intended; but the details of the proposed work or improvement need not be given at length in the ballot. The statute provides that the ordinance calling the election shall recite the objects and purposes, and that it must be published daily for seven days, or once a week for two weeks, before the election. It may and should give a fuller description of the object or purpose for which the debt is to be incurred, and the voters may thereby obtain full information on the subject. The question as stated on the ballot was sufficient to inform the voters that the question presented included the objects and purposes set forth in the resolution and ordinance. It remains to consider whether or not, when taken in connection with the resolution and ordinance, it is not invalid because it presents two distinct and separate objects, not related to or dependent on each other, without giving the voter an opportunity to distinguish and vote for one and against the other.

[1] The rule seems to be that there must be a separate proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, and independent object or purpose for which it is proposed to incur indebtedness, and showing separately the amount desired for each one, in order that the voter may express his choice on each without thereby affecting the other.

Some examples from the decisions will serve to illustrate what are considered distinct objects. On this point the cases conflict. A proposition to vote a lump sum for waterworks and electric works was held void.

Stern v. Fargo, 18 N. D. 289, 122 N. W. 403, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 665. The contrary was decided in Kemp v. Hazlehurst, 80 Miss. 443, 31 South. 908; Seymour v. Tacoma, 6 Wash. 138, 32 Pac. 1077; and State v. Wilder, 200 Mo. 97, 98 S. W. 465. An election to vote a lump sum to be devoted to the construction of an electric plant and to the maintenance thereof was said to embrace two distinct objects. Neacy v. Milwaukee, 142 Wis. 590, 126 N. W. 8. The construction of waterworks and the purchase of waterworks already constructed have been declared to be different and distinct objects. Elyria, etc., Co. v. Elyria, 57 Ohio St. 374, 49 N. E. 335; Leavenworth v. Wilson, 69 Kan. 74, 76 Pac. 400; Farmers', etc., Co. v. Sioux Falls (C. C.) 131 Fed. 912. Contrary decisions on these points are found in Nash Co. v. Council Bluffs (C. C.) 174 Fed. 182; State v. Allen, 183 Mo. 283, 82 S. W. 103; and State v. Allen, 178 Mo. 555, 77 S. W. 868. In People v. Baker, 83 Cal. 149, 23 Pac. 364, 1112, the statute provided that the order calling the election should "specify the particular purpose for which the indebtedness is to be created, and the amount of bonds which they propose to issue." Stats. 1883, p. 311, § 37. The order was for the issue of bonds to the amount of $250,000, "for the purpose of constructing, grading, repairing, and maintaining bridges and public highways within the county, and for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a county jail and poorhouse and hospital." It did not state how many bonds were to be issued for each purpose, nor provide for a separate vote on each. It was held that two distinct and independent purposes were specified, and that consequently the election was ineffectual.

On the other hand, in People v. Counts, 89 Cal. 15, 26 Pac. 612, the order was for the issuance of bonds for $75,000, the money raised to be used to construct two certain and described public wagon roads in the county. The ballot did not separate the two purposes. The court said: "The object of the statute in requiring the board to 'specify the particular purpose for which the indebtedness is to be created and the amount of the bonds,' is simply to notify the electors of the county of these facts, to the end that they may be enabled thereby to form an intelligent judgment as to the propriety of creating the proposed indebtedness for such purpose; and it would seem that this object is as well accomplished by the specification in the order under consideration, as it would have been if the purpose, specified in the same way, had been to construct only one road." The two roads led to the same main county road, but connected at different places. The case of People v. Baker, supra, was distinguished. It was held that the proposition to construct the two distinct roads connecting with the same main road embraced but a single purpose, within the meaning of the statute quoted. In Oakland v. Thompson, 151 Cal.

576, 91 Pac. 387, bonds were voted for the purpose of acquiring several distinct and widely separated parcels of land in the city of Oakland, to be converted into separate public parks, for the enjoyment of all the inhabitants of the city. Answering the same objection, the court said: "The scheme is a single scheme, the purpose a single purpose. * * * The plan is a single plan for the acquisition of all these lands for park purposes. * * * Certainly the plan adopted was within the discretionary power of the council under the law, and it enabled every voter to express himself for or against the whole proposition. More than this was not required."

[2] Upon the authority of the decisions last cited, it is clear that the question embracing the harbor improvement bonds is not inimical to the Constitution or the bond act on this point. The purposes included in the proposition voted on are not so distinct and independent as to preclude the submission of one proposition to incur a single indebtedness for all of them. The purpose intended was a single purpose—that of improving the harbor at San Pedro by the construction thereon of docks, wharves, and warehouses, with the streets and waterways necessary or convenient for their use and for access to them from the land on one side, and from the water on the other. All this constituted but one general plan or object. The fact that the estimated cost was stated in two sums, $2,000,000 for the improvements on one side of the line described, and $1,000,000 for those on the other side, does not render the two parts so distinct that they cannot be embraced in one scheme for improving the harbor, nor does it make each an entirely separate and distinct enterprise. The estimate might have given separately the cost of each dock, wharf, warehouse, street, and waterway, without affecting the character of the whole as a single scheme or object. The naming of warehouses does not show a double purpose. Warehouses are a necessary, or at least a convenient, adjunct to a wharf. We hold that the proceedings are not invalid in this particular.

[3] 2. The power of the city to construct and maintain these public harbor improvements is clear. Subdivision 8 of section 2 of the charter confers upon the city power to lay out, open, extend, widen, pave, repave, and improve streets. Stats. 1889, p. 457. Subdivision 7c of the same section, as amended in 1909, gives power "to acquire or construct and operate public wharves, docks, piers or moles along the seashore, in connection with the transportation of passengers and freight between the ocean and the city." Stats. 1909, p. 1291. This appears to cover, by implication at least, all the purposes designated in the ordinance. Warehouses, as stated, are convenient parts of a wharf, being necessary for the safe-keeping of goods thereon while awaiting shipment. Waterways are included in the term "dock"—a word defined by Webster as "(2) An artificial basin or inclosure in connection with a harbor, for the reception of vessels;" and "(3) The slip or waterway extending between two piers or projecting wharves, or cut into the land for the reception of ships." Section 258 of the charter, as amended in 1909, declares that: "The city of Los Angeles shall also have, throughout the whole of said city, including any such borough, the exclusive power to acquire, construct, own, operate and maintain docks, wharves, piers, canals and sea walls." Stats. 1909, p. 1303. This is not made dependent on the creation of any "borough" mentioned in the amendment, but is a clear grant of power to the city, and it sufficiently covers all the subjects mentioned in the ordinance, not included in section 2 of the charter, except, perhaps, the maintaining of the streets. Section 262 of the charter (amendment of 1909, Stats. p. 1305) gives power to incur a bonded debt for all the foregoing purposes, including the "maintaining" of the streets in question. From this the power to carry out such purpose and "maintain" the streets is necessarily implied. It is also implied from subdivision 23 of section 2, conferring all powers "necessary to the complete and efficient management and control of the municipal property."

All the other points urged, affecting the validity of the bonds, are considered and disposed of adversely to appellant's contentions in the case designated as "L. A. No. 2,794," entitled Clark v. City of Los Angeles et al., 116 Pac. 722, decided on May 31, 1911, involving the bonds for electric works, voted on at the same election. The increased debt allowed by section 223 of the charter covers these harbor bonds, as well as the electric works bonds.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUGHES BROS. v. RAWHIDE GOLD MINING CO. (Civ. 773.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 714*) — RECORD — MATTERS NOT APPARENT BY.

Where, on appeal from an order granting a new trial, there is nothing in the record disclosing the specific reasons for the order, statements of counsel as to the specific ground on which the motion was granted cannot be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2962; Dec. Dig. § 714.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*) — NEW TRIAL — REVIEW.

Where notice of motion for a new trial states one of several grounds on which the court could reasonably, and in the exercise of discretion, grant a new trial, an order allowing a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*) — REVIEW — GRANT OF NEW TRIAL — INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It is the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial whenever, in its opinion, the evidence on which the former decision has been made is insufficient to justify the same, and the exercise of its discretion in that behalf is not open to review, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 933*) — ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL — REVIEW — PRESUMPTION.

Where one of several grounds stated in a motion for new trial was that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the decision, it would be assumed on appeal that this was one of the grounds for making the order, which would be accordingly affirmed, unless the order, by direct language, excluded such ground as the basis of the determination.

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 68*) — DRAFT — ACCEPTANCE — "MAY BE MADE."

Civ. Code, § 8193, provides that an acceptance of a bill of exchange must be in writing, and "may be made" by the acceptor writing his name across the face of the bill, with or without other words. Held, that the phrase "may be made" indicates that the section is permissive, only, and that any other written acceptance clearly disclosing the drawee's intention to accept will constitute an acceptance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Hughes Bros. against the Rawhide Gold Mining Company. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel M. Shortridge and C. M. C. Peters, for appellant. J. B. Curtin, for respondent.

HART, J. In this action, the court below awarded judgment to the defendant. Thereafter the court granted the motion of plaintiff for a new trial, and it is from the order allowing said motion that this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant.

The grounds upon which said motion was made are: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and judgment; (2) that the decision and judgment are against law.

The action is in debt, and was brought to recover the sum of $531.75, alleged by the complaint to be due and owing plaintiff from the defendant.

The circumstances under which the alleged obligation arose, according to the averments of the complaint, are, in brief, as follows: That the defendant corporation was indebted to a certain Charles Zany and one B. A. Valverde in a sum of money exceeding in amount the sum sued for; that said Zany was indebted to the plaintiff in the said sum of $531.75, and that the former, for the purpose of paying said indebtedness, executed an acceptance of a bill of exchange drawn on said Zany and in favor of plaintiff, and the same was delivered to the defendant. Said bill was in the following language:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes Cal. Rep. 114-117 P.—47

"$531.75. Oakdale, Cal., Feb. 17, 1909.

"On demand pay to the order of Rawhide Gold Mining Co. five hundred thirty-one and 75/100 dollars. Value received and charge the same to account of Hughes Bros.

"To Charles Zany, Quartz Mt."

Thereafter said Zany and Valverde executed and delivered to the defendant the following order in writing: "Feb. 25, 1909. To the Rawhide Gold Mining Company: Please pay to Hughes Bros., a corporation, $531.75 and charge the same to our account. Chas. Zany. B. A. Valverde."

It is alleged that the defendant "promised and agreed to pay the same to plaintiff, but has since neglected and refused to do so." It is further alleged that the defendant has refused to return said draft to plaintiff, although the latter has demanded its return since defendant's refusal to pay the same.

The court, among other matters, found that the defendant "received and took said first-mentioned draft or bill of exchange and said second-mentioned draft or order from said plaintiff herein, for the purpose of the collection thereof for said plaintiff, and not otherwise, and in pursuance with an understanding and agreement had between said W. A. Nevills, president of said defendant, and said W. J. Hughes, president of plaintiff, that the same was to be held out of any moneys found due from defendant to Charles Zany in a settlement of accounts thereafter to be had between said defendant and said Zany;" that "said defendant upon either of said above-mentioned dates, or at any other time, never promised or agreed to pay said plaintiff said sum of $531.75, or any other sum, except under the conditions and agreement mentioned in paragraph 111 hereof;" that "no settlement of the accounts between said Charles Zany and said defendant had been had up to the commencement of this action, nor has any settlement of said accounts been had up to the trial of this action, and up until said trial said defendant had not collected anything on account of the said draft or bill of exchange, or of said draft or order hereinabove set forth, and the said accounts between said Charles Zany and B. A. Valverde and said defendant were at the commencement and trial of this action still in process of litigation, and in the courts undetermined finally."

The position of the appellant in this case is as stated in the foregoing findings; the contention being (to be more explicit) that the evidence without conflict shows that the agreement between plaintiff and defendant was simply that the former would assign to the latter its claim against Zany for the purpose of its collection only, and that defendant would collect the same if, upon the final settlement of the accounts between it and Zany and Valverde, there was found to be due from defendant to said Zany and Valverde a sum of money from which the claim could be paid in whole or in part.

The sole question to be examined and decided here is whether the court acted within its discretion, or abused such discretion, in granting the order appealed from.

Upon what particular ground, if upon only one of the two upon which the motion for a new trial was made, or whether upon both said grounds the motion was granted by the court, does not appear from the record. It is, however, asserted by counsel for the respondent that the court, in deciding the case for defendant, stated from the bench that "it could not understand how the plaintiff could maintain an action of debt to recover that much money; that it evidently had mistaken its remedy, and that it should have sued in trover for conversion of that sight draft, alleging its value," etc. From this statement in counsel's brief, the implication is that the court awarded judgment to defendant solely on the ground that the remedy of plaintiff was in conversion, and not in debt or assumpsit. Of course, if this be true, evidently, in the judgment of the court, as evidenced by its order granting a new trial, there was sufficient evidence to establish the claim of plaintiff, if the theory of the plaintiff as to the relations between it and the defendant were, by reason of the transactions set forth in the complaint, those of creditor and debtor, respectively.

[1] But, since, as seen, there is nothing in the record disclosing the specific reasons prompting the court to grant the order appealed from, we cannot obviously consider the mere statements of counsel as to the specific ground upon which the motion was allowed.

[2] "Where, however, there is stated in the notice one ground of several upon which the court could reasonably, and in the exercise of a sound discretion, grant a new trial, the order will not be disturbed." Edinger v. Sigwart, 13 Cal. App. 667, 672, 110 Pac. 521, 523.

[3, 4] In Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110, where the defendant's notice of motion designated as the grounds upon which the motion would be made "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision," and "errors of law occurring at the trial," and, as here, the statement of the case upon which the motion was heard contained specifications of particulars wherein it was claimed that the evidence was insufficient, and of various errors of law upon which the defendant relied, it is held: "The rule is firmly established that the superior court is not only authorized, but that it is its duty, to grant a new trial whenever, in its opinion, the evidence upon which the former decision was made was insufficient to justify that decision. Its action in granting a new trial upon this ground is so far a matter within its discretion that, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence, it is not open to review (Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269 [29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124]; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 441 [35 Pac. 1024]; Harrison v. Sutter Street Railway Co., 116 Cal. 156 [47 Pac. 1019]); and when this is made one of the grounds of the motion, although other grounds are also presented, if the order does not by direct language exclude this from the grounds upon which the motion is granted, it will be assumed that it was one of the grounds for making the order, and the order will accordingly be affirmed."

As the order here does not, as seen, show that the court excluded from consideration, in granting the motion, the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the decision, we may assume that this was one of the grounds upon which the motion was granted.

There is, in our judgment, a conflict in the evidence as to the nature of the legal relations established between the plaintiff and the defendant by the transactions described in the complaint, and referred to in the findings of the court hitherto quoted herein. While it is true that in giving his testimony the president of plaintiff, who personally conducted, on behalf of the latter, the transactions referred to in the complaint, made some statements which bear the appearance of being inconsistent with the theory upon which the complaint is drafted and the cause, on plaintiff's part, was tried, there is nevertheless some evidence tending to disclose that the two written instruments pleaded in the complaint were intended, respectively, as a bill of exchange and an acceptance thereof by the drawee. That such was intended to be the legal effect of said instruments, the language thereof seems quite clearly to imply. Zany's acceptance of the bill drawn by the plaintiff on the defendant is, it occurs to us, plainly evidenced by the order or draft on defendant, executed by Zany and Valverde, in favor of plaintiff, on the 25th day of February, 1909, for the precise sum specified in the bill.

[5] By the law of this state, it is provided that an acceptance of a bill of exchange must be in writing, but that it is a sufficient acceptance if the acceptor writes "his name across the face of the bill, with or without other words." Section 3193, Civ. Code. The manner of acceptance thus authorized is, obviously, merely permissive in legal effect; that is, the language that acceptance "may be made" as indicated does not exclude any other mode of acceptance, so long as it is in writing and clearly discloses an intention on the part of the drawee to accept. See volume 4, Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 207 (2d Ed.), and cases cited in footnotes; Parsons on Bills and Notes, vol. 1, p. 281 et seq.

But we will briefly examine the testimony. It appears that Zany maintained a boarding house at the mine of the defendant, for the purpose of accommodating in that regard the employés of defendant; that the latter had entered into an arrangement with Zany by which the former was to pay the latter for the boarding of its said employés. Zany, as seen, was indebted to the plaintiff corporation, which was then engaged in the general merchandising business at Oakdale, in the sum mentioned in the said alleged bill of exchange described in the complaint. Hughes, president of plaintiff, having received information that Zany was about to retire from or abandon the boarding house business, met Capt. Nevills, president of defendant, at Oakdale and initiated negotiations by which he hoped to ultimately secure the payment of his claim through defendant. Nevills agreed to furnish information to Hughes as to the movements of Zany. After some correspondence between the secretary of defendant and Hughes, in which the latter was finally advised that, to protect himself against loss, he would have to take some steps looking to the collection of his account against Zany, as the latter was about to quit business, Hughes drew the order on Zany described in the complaint as a bill of exchange. It seems that Valverde, a creditor of Zany, had threatened to garnish the money due the latter from defendant, but finally secured from Zany an assignment to him of Zany's claim against defendant. Nevills said to Hughes that, before defendant would accept the order or bill of exchange, he (Hughes) would have to deliver to said defendant an order or an acceptance executed by both Zany and Valverde. This suggestion Hughes followed, and procured the order signed and executed by Zany and Valverde, already mentioned, and delivered the same with the bill of exchange to defendant. Hughes thereafter frequently communicated with the officers of defendant, inquiring when it was probable that he would receive the money due plaintiff and, after much correspondence on the subject, Hughes, for plaintiff, demanded from defendant a return of the bill of exchange and the acceptance thereof by Zany and Valverde. Defendant refused this demand, whereupon plaintiff instituted an action in claim and delivery for the recovery of said bill. (This suit was subsequently dismissed on plaintiff's motion.)

It further appears that Valverde sued defendant to recover the money it had in its possession due Zany, and of which he claimed ownership by virtue of the said assignment of said money to him by Zany. The defendant answered Valverde's complaint, and, among other averments, pleaded as a set-off the bill of exchange mentioned in the complaint.

In its answer to plaintiff's complaint, in the action for the recovery of said bill, the defendant alleged: "That heretofore, to wit, about the 23d day of February, 1909, for value and in the due and ordinary course of business the said Hughes Bros., plaintiff above named, sold, assigned, and transferred the account and indebtedness mentioned in paragraph 2 of said complaint to the defendant, the Rawhide Gold Mining Company, which said company was the owner and holder thereof at the time of the commencement of the above-entitled action, and ever since has been, and still is, the owner and holder of said assigned claim as aforesaid."

The record shows that the sheriff took from the possession of defendant said bill upon a process issued upon plaintiff's complaint in replevin, but that subsequently defendant, demanding redelivery of the bill to it, executed to the sheriff an undertaking as required by section 514 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and thereupon the sheriff redelivered said bill into its possession.

Hughes testified that after the execution of the bill of exchange he met Nevills at the depot at Jamestown; that "he told me that Zany had turned everything over to Valverde, and that Valverde had sued him (Nevills), and he wanted me to go up with Mr. Peters (defendant's attorney) and commence suit against Zany—attach him. * * * I said, 'I will go and get an order.' He said, 'It will do no good.' * * * I went over and met Zany and Valverde together. I says to Zany, 'To save any trouble, you give me an order on the Rawhide mine; Mr. Valverde, too. Both of you sign it,' because Valverde was suing him; it was safe both ways. I went to the telephone and called up Mr. Nevills and told him I had this order. He says, 'If his lawyer says it is all right, I will accept it. If Mr. Peters says it is all right, it would be all right.' I got the order and came back; my bookkeeper made it, and I brought it with me." He further testified that he showed the order to Mr. Peters, defendant's attorney, and that the latter pronounced the order to be sufficient, and that defendant could pay it if it desired to. "I delivered these two documents to Mr. Lang (secretary of defendant), and from that time until now they have not been in my possession."

In reply to the contention of defendant, as shown by the testimony of Nevills, that the order was received by the defendant only for the purpose of collecting it for plaintiff, and that it was agreed that plaintiff was to wait for the money until a settlement between Zany and defendant was had, Hughes testified that no such understanding was had between them; that after he delivered the bill and order to defendant he expected the latter to pay him the money called for by said bill, and that that was the understanding. He testified that when it appeared to him, after repeated demands on defendant for payment without success, that he was not going to receive the money, he demanded the redelivery of the bill, but that defendant refused to deliver possession of the same to plaintiff, and that thereupon he instituted the action to recover its possession to which we have made reference.

Of course, the testimony produced by defendant contradicts plaintiff's testimony; the theory of the defendant being, as seen, that it was merely made an agent by plaintiff to collect the money due the latter from Zany. This testimony, however, only results in a conflict—at least "an appreciable conflict"—upon the vital proposition in the case, and, as we have seen, under such circumstances we cannot say that the court's decision granting a new trial involves an abuse of the discretion which it is legally authorized to exercise in passing upon motions of this kind.

But counsel for appellant insist with much vigor that there is no conflict; that the testimony is all one way, and that it conclusively discloses that the defendant was merely the agent of plaintiff for the collection of the money from Zany. In support of this contention, attention is called to the averments of the complaint, in the action by plaintiff to recover possession of the bill of exchange or order from defendant, setting forth plaintiff's ownership of said bill or order. But those averments, considered as evidence in the case, as well as the fact of the bringing of that suit by plaintiff, were, like all the testimony in the case, to be given such weight, if any, as the court deemed them entitled to. It would not be a far-fetched conjecture to suggest that, in considering the motion for a new trial, the court concluded that the unqualified declaration in defendant's answer to plaintiff's action to recover the bill that it was the owner and holder thereof, that said bill had been sold and assigned to it by plaintiff, fully impeached or overcame plaintiff's averment of ownership. Besides, the court perhaps reached the conclusion that defendant's averment of ownership in its answer to that complaint of plaintiff was corroborated by the fact that, in the action against it by Valverde, it set up the bill drawn by plaintiff and accepted by the drawee, Zany, as an offset to any claim Valverde might undertake to establish against defendant on account of its indebtedness to Zany. In any event, it was, as we have suggested, for the court, in its consideration of the application for a new trial, to appraise the probative value of the testimony, and we doubt not that, as before declared, there is a sufficient conflict in the evidence upon the question whether the instrument was a bill of exchange or a mere assignment of the claim therein specified to defendant for collection only to render the court's order granting a new trial clear of just disturbance by this appeal.

There are some other legal propositions, only, however, in support of the main question submitted here, discussed in the briefs. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived, these need not be noticed.

The order is affirmed.

JOHNSTON v. BLANCHARD. (Civ. 979.)
(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 27, 1911.)

1. GOOD WILL (§ 6*)—SALE—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where a defendant sold his business of distributing advertising in a certain district and covenanted not to engage therein for 30 years, on penalty of forfeiting a certain sum, a complaint alleging that he had re-engaged in the business within the time limited, and was soliciting trade, was sufficient without showing that he had succeeded in securing any of the plaintiff's customers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Good Will, Cent. Dig. §§ 2-5; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—SALE OF GOOD WILL.

Where defendant sold his business and covenanted not to engage therein in the same district for 30 years, and that he should forfeit to the purchaser the sum of $5,000 as liquidated damages for a violation of this agreement, the purchaser was entitled to specific enforcement of the agreement not to re-engage in the trade, under Civ. Code, § 3389, permitting a contract to be so enforced, though a penalty is imposed or damages are liquidated for its breach.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 17*)—PERSONS ENTITLED.

Where defendant sold his business of distributing advertising matter in a certain section of the country and covenanted with the purchaser not to re-engage in the business for a certain length of time, an assignee of the purchaser was entitled to enforce the agreement, though the word "assignee" was not used in the defendant's contract of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-46; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 5*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—GOOD WILL.

Under Civ. Code, § 993, by which the good will of a business is property, such right is transferable, and a purchaser of defendant's business, with an agreement by defendant not to re-engage therein, may assign his rights to one purchasing from him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 17*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ENFORCE CONTRACT.

Civ. Code, § 1674, provides that one who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business, so long as the buyer or any person deriving title from him carries on a like business. Held, that where defendant sold his business to W., covenanteeing not to re-engage therein, and W. sold to plaintiff, plaintiff was entitled to have the contract enforced for his protection, so long as he carried on a like business, but such right could not be extended to his successors and assigns.

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 127*)—MOTION—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR.

A motion for a new trial, made on a statement containing no specifications of the particular errors relied on, must, under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, be disregarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Daniel Johnston, doing business as the Los Angeles Distributing Company, against Calvin W. Blanchard. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for appellant.
Andrew M. Strong and E. T. Sherer, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to enjoin defendant from conducting the business of distributing advertising matter in the county of Los Angeles, in violation of the terms of an agreement, whereby he covenanted that he would not do so.

Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

Defendant and one West were copartners in the city of Los Angeles, and, under the firm name and style of Los Angeles Distributing Company, conducted the business of distributing advertising matter for advertisers in the county of Los Angeles. On March 27, 1909, they sold said business, together with the good will thereof, to one W. W. Lee, and at the same time entered into a contract and agreement which contained a provision as follows: "It is further agreed that said parties of the first part (Blanchard and West) will not enter into a similar business such as the one contracted to be sold under this agreement, in any of the cities or territories above mentioned, for a period of thirty (30) years from the date of these presents, and on violation of this provision it is agreed by and between the parties of the first part and the party of the second part that they shall forfeit to the party of the second part the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) as liquidated damages for the violation of this agreement." On July 2, 1909, Lee, by an instrument in writing, sold, transferred, and assigned all his right, title, and interest in said contract and the subject-matter thereof, and transferred the business to plaintiff. Plaintiff entered upon and continued in conducting the advertising business and the distributing of advertising matter so purchased by Lee from Blanchard and West and by Lee assigned to him. The complaint alleges that Blanchard, the defendant, notwithstanding his contract, did, a few months after making said agreement, enter into a similar business to the one sold to Lee, and at the time of the instituting of the suit he was engaged in conducting an advertising distributing business in the city of Los Angeles. The only point argued by appellant is the sufficiency of the complaint tested by a general demurrer, which was overruled.

[1] 1. It is urged that the complaint fails to allege a breach of the contract. We are unable to perceive any merit in this contention. It clearly appears that defendant, in violation of the terms of his agreement, was at the time of filing the complaint engaged in a like business in the county of Los Angeles, and was engaged in soliciting the distribution of advertising matter from advertisers in said county, and soliciting business from the customers of plaintiff, as a result of which acts it was alleged he would suffer irreparable damage. The purpose of the action was to specifically enforce a negative covenant, the violation of which must necessarily constitute an invasion of plaintiff's rights. The specific point urged by appellant is that it is not alleged that defendant has succeeded in securing any of plaintiff's customers. In such case as this, the right to enforce a covenant does not depend upon a showing of the actual loss of customers who might in any event have discontinued their patronage, but upon the conclusion of the court, justified by the facts alleged, that injury to plaintiff would very probably result from defendant's acts, and that such injury would be irreparable. The re-entry of defendant in the active management of a business in Los Angeles county of like character to that which he had sold would necessarily result in depriving plaintiff of the good will of the business purchased, and hinder and obstruct the latter's successful conduct and management thereof. That defendant was actually engaged in soliciting plaintiff's customers was, not only a breach of his implied warranty (section 1776, Civ. Code), but, in effect, an impending threat of injury to the latter, for which injury, inconvenience, and perplexity the law afforded no adequate remedy. The facts alleged are ample to show not only a breach of the contract, but that plaintiff would by reason of a continuance thereof be irreparably damaged.

[2] 2. The contract contained a clause to the effect that, in case of a violation of the provision whereby defendant agreed that he would not engage in a like business to that sold, he should forfeit to plaintiff's assignor $5,000 as liquidated damages. Appellant contends that plaintiff was limited in his rights to an action at law to recover the sum specified in the contract as liquidated damages. From our point of view, it is unnecessary to determine whether the amount specified in the contract should be deemed liquidated damages or a penalty exacted for violation of the contract, in which latter case, but not the former, it is conceded the remedy by injunction would lie. It is likewise unnecessary to discuss or attempt to distinguish the numerous authorities cited by appellant in support of his contention. Whatever may be the law elsewhere, the question, so far as this state is concerned is concluded by the Code. Section 3389, Civil Code, provides: "A contract otherwise proper to be specifically enforced, may be thus enforced, though a penalty is imposed, or the damages are liquidated for its breach, and the party in default is willing to pay the same." Under the provisions of this section it is therefore immaterial whether the sum specified in the contract be regarded as liquidated damages or as a penalty, for in either case the plaintiff had a right to waive an action at law and resort to equity for specific performance. Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 9, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

[3] 3. The suit was instituted by plaintiff to whom Lee, the purchaser from defendant, had sold, transferred, and assigned the business and contract, the breach of which is made the subject of the action. Appellant contends that such transfer and assignment imposed no obligation upon defendant enforceable at the suit of such assignee, for the reason that the word "assignee" does not appear to have been inserted in the contract; in other words, that the rights acquired by Lee under defendant's covenant were not subject to assignment. The courts have repeatedly held to the contrary, where the assignment, as here, was made in connection with the business it was designed to protect and going with the business.

[4] The good will of a business is property and, like other property, transferable. Section 993, Civ. Code. We are unable to find any provision of the Codes which prohibits such an assignment; hence, like other property, it may be transferred. Section 1044, Civ. Code. In discussing a like question, the court, in Francisco v. Smith, 143 N. Y. 488, 38 N. E. 980, says: "Such an agreement is a valuable right in connection with the business it was designed to protect, and, going with the business, it may be assigned, and the assignee may enforce it just as the assignor could have enforced it, had he retained the business." In Hedge, etc., Co. v. Lowe, 47 Iowa, 141, it is said: "It is urged by appellant that the contract is a personal one, and that it cannot be assigned. If the agreement not to engage in the agricultural implement business was of sufficient value to constitute in part an inducement to Vorse to purchase, it must be admitted that it might be equally valuable to a vendee of Vorse. The question here is, not whether this agreement may be the subject of transfer in the abstract, but whether it may be transferred with the business to which it originally pertained." To the same effect, see vol. 22, Cyc. p. 866; Up River Ice Co. v. Denler, 114 Mich. 296, 72 N. W. 157, 68 Am. St. Rep. 480; Webster v. Buss, 61 N. H. 40, 60 Am. Rep. 317. In the event of Lee's death, without assignment, there can be no doubt, we think, that his executor in taking over the business could have enforced the contract in protecting the same, and if this be true it must follow that Lee's assignee would have the same right. The case of Hillman v. Shannahan, 4 Or. 163, 18 Am. Rep. 281, cited by appellant, if an authority to the contrary, should not be accepted against the great weight of authority holding otherwise. The action there, however, was to recover liquidated damage upon a bond, conditioned that defendant would not violate his covenant, not, as here, to enforce a covenant, the performance of which was necessary to protect the business.

4. Another ground of objection to the complaint is that it appears therefrom that defendant was not engaged in business on his own account, but merely as the employé of others. It appears that defendant was conducting the business under the name of Rynerson-Blanchard Company, and that he, together with his wife and her father, owned the business, and that he was manager and executive head thereof. The complaint thus clearly shows that defendant had "entered into a similar business to that contracted to be sold." Conceding that he possessed no pecuniary interest in the enterprise, nevertheless engaging in soliciting business for the Rynerson-Blanchard Company, who was a competitor of plaintiff, was a violation at least of the spirit of his covenant. In the case of Kramer v. Old, 119 N. C. 1, 25 S. E. 813, 34 L. R. A. 389, 56 Am. St. Rep. 650, the court says: "It is the duty of the court to restrain the contracting parties from violating the spirit, as well as the letter, of the agreement. Under a fair and just interpretation of its terms, the stipulation meant that the three defendants would not engage in business, so as to bring their skill, names, and influence to the aid of any competitor carrying on the same trade within the prohibited limits." See, also, Richardson v. Peacock, 28 N. J. Eq. 155; Salzman v. Siegelman, 102 App. Div. 406, 92 N. Y. Supp. 845; Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 357, 50 Pac. 662; Pittsburg Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 208 Pa. 37, 57 Atl. 77; Whitney v. Slayton, 40 Me. 231.

[5] 5. While appellant does not direct our attention to the fact or make any point thereon, reference to the judgment discloses that it is erroneous in this: That by its terms defendant is enjoined from engaging in or carrying on the business of the distribution of advertising matter in the county of Los Angeles (not exceeding, however, the term specified in the contract), so long as plaintiff, "or his successors or assignees," continue the business of the distribution of advertising matter in Los Angeles county. Section 1674, Civil Code, provides that "one who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or a part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein." Under the provisions of this section of the Code, plaintiff, who derived his title to the good will of the business by a transfer from W. W. Lee, who was the buyer from defendant, is entitled to have the contract enforced for his protection, so long as he carries on a like business in the county, but such right cannot be extended to his successors and assigns. It therefore follows that the judgment, in so far as it has reference to the successors and assignees of plaintiff, is unwarranted and to that extent erroneous. As thus indicated, the judgment should therefore be modified.

[6] 6. No argument is presented in support of a reversal of the order denying the motion for a new trial. It is not improper to say, however, that the motion was made upon a statement which contains no specifications of the particular errors relied upon; and hence, under the provisions of section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, the same must be disregarded. De Molera v. Marti, 120 Cal. 544, 52 Pac. 825; McLennan v. Wilcox, 126 Cal. 53, 58 Pac. 305.

The cause is remanded to the trial court, with instructions to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the words "or his successors or assignees," and also striking therefrom the words "or his assignees or successors," and, as thus modified, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, at appellant's cost.

COREY v. STRUVE et al. (Civ. 838.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1911.)

1. CROPS (§ 1*)—CONTRACTS—"CROP"—"CROP OF BEETS."

The word "crop," in its general significance, means the product of cultivated plants while growing, or the product after it has been harvested or severed from the stock or root to which it is attached, and the phrase "crop of beets" may be interpreted to include the tops of the beets.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1755, 1756.]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 326*)—RENTING ON SHARES—CROPS—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A lease of a farm provided that a part should be devoted to the growing of a crop of sugar beets, and that at the proper time, and when directed by a sugar company, the tenant would harvest, top, haul, and deliver the beets to the company, and when so delivered one-fourth of the beets in weight should be delivered in the name of the landlord, as his property as yearly rental. The lease made no provision for the disposition of the tops. Held, that under Civ. Code, § 1636, requiring the court to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties to a contract as it existed at the time of the contract, the lease did not give the tops to the tenant, in view of the evidence that the landlord in such leases always kept the tops.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1367-1378; Dec. Dig. § 326.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 326*)—RENTING ON SHARES—CROPS—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION—"FARMING."

A lease of a farm for the growing of beets required the tenant to deliver, when directed by a sugar company, beets to it, and that one-fourth should be delivered in the name of the landlord as yearly rentals, and provided that the tenant should farm the beet land in accordance with the customs and directions of the sugar company, or its field superintendent. The undisputed evidence showed that one of the customs of the sugar company was to leave the beet tops on the ground, to be plowed under as fertilizer. Held, that under Civ. Code, § 1641, requiring the court, construing a contract, to take the whole contract together and give effect to every part, if practicable, the beet tops did not pass to the tenant, but must remain on the land; the custom of the company being a part of the "farming," which includes the cultivation and fertilization of the soil, as well as caring for and harvesting the crops.

4. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 15*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Under Civ. Code, § 1646, providing that a contract must be interpreted according to the law and usage of the place where it is to be performed or made, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 12, providing that evidence is admissible of usage to explain a contract, evidence of usage is admissible where the parties to a contract omitted to state important parts of their agreement, and the usage is consistent with the express terms, and the adoption of the usage can clearly be presumed to have been intended by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-33; Dec. Dig. § 15; *Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1945-1952.]

5. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 12*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Before evidence of usage can be given any effect in the construction of a contract, it must appear that the parties thereto were aware of the existence of the custom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. §§ 23, 24; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

6. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 12*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A tenant, in a lease of a farm for the growing of crops of sugar beets, claimed to be unacquainted with the custom in the locality which required that the tops of the beets should be left on the land, except so far as his knowledge was limited to a single lease obtained from a sugar company; but the tenant knew that the company required the tops to be left on the land. About 12,000 acres were farmed to beets in the locality in which the sugar company farmed and leased about 7,000 acres. Held, that the general usage must be presumed to have been known by the tenant, and he was bound thereby, and the tops must remain on the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Hiram Corey against James P. Struve and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daughert & Lacey, for appellant. J. H. Andresen and W. S. White, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

On October 4, 1907, plaintiff leased to defendants, for the term of five years, a large tract of farming land in the Salinas valley, by a written lease, which provided that during each year of the term not less than 250 acres should be devoted to the growing of sugar beets. It is alleged in the complaint "that during the year 1908 the defendants planted about 278 acres of said land to sugar beets, and a large part of the crop of sugar beets raised thereon has been harvested by said defendants. That in harvesting the said crop of sugar beets the defendants caused the tops of said beets to be cut therefrom and placed upon the surface of said land. That plaintiff is the owner of said beet tops, and by the terms of said lease said beet tops were to remain upon said land, and it is necessary, to prevent impoverishment of the soil, that said beet tops remain upon said land as fertilizer." That under the terms of said lease a part of the rental to be paid plaintiff consists of a share of the crop of sugar beets. "That the defendants, without any right whatever, have removed from said lands a large part of said beet tops, and have sold and otherwise disposed of the same, and they assert and give out and threaten that they intend to and will remove from said lands the beet tops now remaining thereon," as well as those to be grown hereafter. Wherefore plaintiff prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing any beet tops from the premises during the term of said lease.

Appellant states that his cause of action "is based upon three propositions: (1) That the removal of the beet tops would impoverish the soil, and would therefore be in violation of the provision of the lease against waste. (2) That the removal of the beet tops would be in violation of the following provision of the lease: 'Said lands so farmed to beets to be farmed in accordance with the customs and directions of the Spreckels Sugar Company, or its field superintendent.' (3) That the plaintiff as landlord is the owner of the beet tops."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In accordance with its findings of fact and conclusions of law, the trial court "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants be and they are hereby enjoined from removing from the lands described in the lease referred to in the complaint any of the beet tops cut from sugar beets grown on said premises during the term of said lease. That the plaintiff is the owner of one-fourth of said beet tops, and the defendants are the owners of three-fourths of said beet tops; and each of said parties may dispose of his share of said beet tops by feeding them to cattle on said premises, and retain all moneys or benefits received therefrom without accounting to the other party therefor; but if said beet tops are fed to stock they shall be fed upon the lands whereon said beet tops are grown, in the manner in which beet tops are usually fed; that is to say, they shall not be gathered from the rows in which they are deposited when cut, but may be scattered upon said lands."

It is not disputed that when the beets are ready for harvesting they are ploughed out of the ground; the tops are then cut off and deposited in rows alongside of the rows of beets. The beets are then loaded into wagons and hauled to the Spreckels sugar factory, and the tops are customarily left upon the ground, to be plowed under for fertilizing purposes, or fed upon the ground to cattle turned therein. The evidence, it may be remarked, shows a conflict as to whether it is more beneficial to the soil to plow the tops under or to feed them to cattle upon the land, thereby obtaining the ordure for fertilization.

The trial court based the conclusion as to the ownership of the beet tops upon its construction of the following provision in the lease: "And at the proper time or times, and when directed by the said Spreckels Sugar Company, they (the lessees) will harvest, top, haul and deliver said beets to the Spreckels Sugar Company at Spreckels, California, and when so delivered, one-fourth of said beets, in weight so delivered, are to be delivered in the name of, and for the use of the party of the first part herein, as his property and as the yearly rentals for such portion of said lands farmed each year to beets, and said party of the first part hereby reserves to himself the one-fourth of the crop of beets raised each year as the property of the lessor." It is stated by appellant that the learned trial judge declared in his opinion that, "so far as the ownership of the tops is concerned, it is determined by this provision, and under it the plaintiff cannot be held to be the owner of more than one-fourth of such beet tops." We think the contract has not been construed according to the intention of the parties as gathered from all the terms of the instrument, viewed in the light of the familiar rules of construction.

[1,2] It is no doubt true that the phrase "crop of beets" might be interpreted to include the tops, as the word "crop," in its general signification, means the product of cultivated plants while growing, or that product after it has been harvested or severed from the stock or root to which it was attached. Volume 8, Am. & Ency. of Law, p. 302. It seems clear, though, that the parties here used the term in the latter and more restricted sense. There can be, indeed, no uncertainty as to what they intended should be delivered to the Spreckels Sugar Company. The defendants agree to "harvest, top, haul and deliver said beets to the Spreckels Sugar Company." A distinction is here recognized between the beets and the tops. The said agreement simply means, and can mean nothing else than that, after harvesting and cutting off the tops, they are to deliver the esculent roots to the company. Indeed, there is no contention that the defendants were to deliver the tops to the company. It is plain, therefore, that the rent consisted of a proportion of the beets after they had been topped, for the provision continues, "and when so delivered, one-fourth of said beets, in weight so delivered are to be delivered in the name of and for the use of the party of the first part herein, as his property and as the yearly rental of such proportion of said lands farmed each year to beets." It requires nothing more than a transposition of the foregoing to make it appear as follows: The yearly rental of the land farmed each year to beets shall be one-fourth of said beets in weight after they have been harvested, the tops removed, and the beets then delivered to the Spreckels Sugar company.

The succeeding clause would seem to be a mere repetition of the provision as to the rent. "One-fourth of the crop of beets" had already been described as the beets without the tops. If we were to construe the latter provision as including the tops, we would then have two inconsistent provisions, one providing that the rent should consist of the beets without the tops, and the other reserving for the rent the beets, including the tops. As used, therefore, in the provision in question, the term "crop of beets" seems to mean simply the yield of beets, or the beet product of the soil, and there would be no difference in signification if the reservation had been of "one-fourth of said beets" as described in the preceding clause.

Again, it was not the intention of the parties to make provision in the lease for the division of the beet tops, and it was their understanding that no provision of the kind had been made. James P. Struve, who conducted the negotiations for the defendants and the only one of the latter who testified, was asked on cross-examination: "When it says in this lease 'that Mr. Corey, the lessor, reserves to himself the one-fourth crop of beets,' etc., did you understand that the word 'crop' included tops?" He answered: "I did not." Again, he was asked this question: "Was it your understanding that there was some provision about tops in the lease?" His answer was: "No; it never occurred to me until Mr. Armstrong approached me first."

While the appellant was not asked the direct question as to his understanding of the lease in this respect, it is a fair inference from his testimony that he understood there was no such provision. He refers to written leases to other parties, and declares "there was never any provision with reference to beet tops," and also, "the beet tops from the land were never sold and moved from the land." Again he says: "The landlord always kept the tops. I do not know of one who does not." Indeed, the attitude of both parties was consistently opposed to the view that there was any provision in the lease as to the division of the beet tops. The defendants, at the trial, relied upon the custom prevailing in Pajaro Valley, where they had farmed for years, and the plaintiff upon the custom in Salinas Valley, and also upon a subsequent provision of the lease hereinafter to be noticed. It can hardly be gainsaid, therefore, that the construction placed upon the lease by the court below is directly opposed and contrary to the intention and understanding of the parties. Of course, the basic principle of all interpretation of contracts is "to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Section 1636, Civ. Code. If the contract had been free from any doubt, manifestly, in the absence of mistake or fraud, no extraneous evidence would be admissible as to the understanding or intention of the parties. That is not the case here, and it may be said that no objection was made to such evidence.

Another principle, somewhat allied to the foregoing, may also be invoked. Each party undoubtedly understood that the other assumed that the lease made no provision as to the division of the beet tops. Defendants, for instance, so believing themselves, would naturally conclude that plaintiff had the same view. This is strengthened by the consideration that they knew it was the custom of the Spreckels Sugar Company and all of its tenants to leave the beet tops upon the ground and plow them under; that beet tops were never mentioned in any conversation with plaintiff about the lease; that at the time the lease here was made the respondents had a similar lease of adjoining lands from the Spreckels Company upon the same terms (one-fourth of the crop), which provided that the beet tops belonged to the landlord and should be left upon the ground, and the lease itself provided that the beet land should be farmed in accordance with the customs and directions of the Spreckels Sugar Company, which customs required the tops to be left upon the ground and to be plowed under. Viewed in this aspect, it would not be improper to consider defendants as promisors, and apply to them section 1649 of the Civil Code, providing that: "If the terms of a promise are in any respect ambiguous or uncertain, it must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed, at the time of making it, that the promisee understood it." Giving effect to this rule, we must accept one of two interpretations, either that no provision was made for the beet tops or that they were to be long to the landlord.

[3] But we think the latter construction is required by the application of another familiar rule that "the whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Section 1641, Civ. Code. Assuming that the provision as to the reservation of "one-fourth of the crop of beets" introduces an element of uncertainty, it is entirely eliminated by the due consideration of the agreement to farm said beet lands in accordance with the customs and directions of the Spreckels Sugar Company or its field superintendent. It is manifest that there is a distinction between "customs" and "directions." They are familiar terms, and it is not necessary to define them. One of the customs, or, in other words, the common practice of the Spreckels Company, was to leave the beet tops upon the ground, to be plowed under as a fertilizer. The evidence shows this without conflict. In fact, the said James Struve testified that he knew "that in this valley the Spreckels Sugar Company required the beet tops to be left on the land." If this custom is to be considered a part of the "farming," it would seem to follow that defendants had promised to thus leave the tops. The word "farming," as suggested by appellant, certainly includes the cultivation and fertilization of the soil, as well as the caring for and harvesting of the crops. It is submitted that the condition is exactly the same as though the lessee had promised to farm the land as it had been farmed by the lessor, and the latter—as really appears to have been the case—for years had plowed the beet tops under. This practice surely would be considered a part of the contract, and the lessee would be bound to pursue a similar course. To accept respondents' interpretation of this clause would be to ignore the significance altogether of the term "customs." Their contention is that they were bound merely to follow the directions of the field superintendent, given by him pursuant to beet-growing contracts, a copy of which appears in the record. Appellant points out that this contract shows that the field superintendent is authorized to direct the lessee as follows: (1) To cultivate up and resow where the crop is not satisfactory. (2) To commence and proceed with the harvesting of the crop and to deliver the same. (3) To select the date of delivery and the amount to be delivered each day according to the requirements of the factory. If the parties, however, had intended no more than this, they should not have used the word "customs," which, as we have seen, comprehends an additional circumstance of moment. As far as the "directions" are concerned, it was probably contemplated that they should be given through the field superintendent, as agent of the Spreckels Sugar Company, but the "customs," which were to be recognized, relate to the said practice of the Spreckels Company.

[4] But if we admit that the clause under review has no bearing upon the question as to the disposition of the beet tops, then we have a contract with no provision concerning them. The situation would then call for the application of section 1646 of the Civil Code, providing that: "A contract is to be interpreted according to the law and usage of the place where it is to be performed; or if it does not indicate a place of performance, according to the law and usage of the place where it is made." By subdivision 12, § 1870, of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is also provided that evidence is admissible of "usage to explain the true character of an act, contract or instrument, where such true character is not otherwise plain; but usage is never admissible, except as an instrument of interpretation." The rule has also been stated as follows: "Evidence of usage is admitted to annex incidents to contracts where it is apparent that the parties have omitted to state important parts of their agreements, and the incident so annexed is consistent with the express terms, and its inclusion can fairly be presumed to have been intended by the parties." Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 29, p. 432.

In Kilgore v. Bulkley, 14 Conn. 391, it is said: "Experience and observation prove that the engagements of individuals are in fact entered into with reference to the customs and usages which prevail in the community where they are made; they therefore tacitly agree to conform to them, and, so far from doing injustice by regarding such customs and usages, it is the only mode by which justice can be obtained."

It may not be amiss to cite a few of the many examples of the application of this principle given by appellant in his brief: Where a lease is silent as to the disposition of crops growing at the termination of the tenancy—or "away-going crops"—a local custom, whereby the tenant is entitled to such crops, forms a part of the lease. Foster v. Robinson, 6 Ohio St. 90. A contract providing for the sale of "all the timber 6 ins. in diameter," but silent as to "laps," the "laps" passed also by local custom and usage of lumbermen. Allen v. Crank (Va.) 23 S. E. 772. Evidence is admissible to show that by custom the term "dry goods," used in a written contract, did not include clothing, hats, caps, or notions. Wood v. Allen, 111

Iowa, 97, 82 N. W. 451. In Callahan v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 479, it is said: "If there was an existing usage among farmers as to the meaning of the word 'stubble' where this contract was made, it must be inferred that the contracting parties, being farmers, contracted with reference to it, and that they used the word in the broader meaning which was given to it by that usage, and not in the ordinary or popular sense. Evidence of such usage and meaning was therefore admissible to define and explain the peculiar or local meaning of the word as it was used in the contract." And in Higgins v. Cal. Petroleum, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 629, 52 Pac. 1080, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to show that the term "gross ton" had a peculiar local significance, and meant a long ton of 2,240 pounds, and not the statutory ton of 2,000 pounds.

The evidence was quite clear as to the custom in Salinas Valley that the landlord owns the tops. As stated, though, by the witnesses, a provision to that effect was generally contained in the lease; the counsel for defendants stating, in reply to a question by the court, that probably 90 per cent. of all these leases contained a clause providing that the beet tops belonged to the landlord. The plaintiff testified that by custom the landlord always gets the tops, and that he did not know of one who does not; that he always got the tops from former tenants, though their written lease made no mention of them; and that he didn't know of a farmer in the valley who does not leave the tops.

[5, 6] Of course, for evidence of this character to have any potency, it must appear that the parties to the contract were aware of the existence of the custom. It could not be said with any show of reason that they contracted with reference to a custom of which one of the parties was ignorant. "Evidence of usage is admissible only on the ground that the parties who made the contract were both cognizant of the usage, and must be presumed to have made their engagements with reference thereto." Pennell v. Delta Transportation Co., 94 Mich. 247, 53 N. W. 1049. And it is claimed by respondents that they had farmed all their life in Pajaro Valley, and were thus unacquainted with the customs of Salinas Valley, and that their knowledge of local practices was limited to a single lease which they had received from the Spreckels Sugar Company, which would not import knowledge of a general custom. But defendant James P. Struve testified, as we have already seen, that he knew when he came that the said company required the beet tops to be left on the land. It appears in the evidence that about 12,000 acres altogether were farmed to beets, and of this acreage the said company farmed and leased about 7,000 acres. He therefore knew the practice as to a very large part of the whole. It may be said, also, that he nowhere states that he was not familiar with the custom in this respect, although he declares that he was "not familiar with the farmers in Salinas Valley." It is unreasonable to assume that defendants would make no inquiry concerning the matter. It was of considerable importance, and to seek information concerning the custom as to the beet tops would naturally occur to one who had been in the business before, and we think it is a case for the application of the principle that the general usages of a particular trade or business are presumed to be known to those engaged in them. Smith v. Russell Lumber Co., 82 Conn. 116, 72 Atl. 577; Waring v. Grady, 49 Ala. 465, 20 Am. Rep. 286; Ankeny v. Young, 52 Wash. 235, 100 Pac. 736. And if known there is no doubt that the parties are held to have contracted with reference to them, unless the contrary appears, and such usages form a part of the contract. Union Insurance Co. v. American T. I. Co., 107 Cal. 327, 40 Pac. 431, 28 L. R. A. 692, 48 Am. St. Rep. 140.

In the view we take of the record, the position of respondents is untenable, and the judgment and order are therefore reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 2, 1911.)

The dismissal, by consent, of an appeal from a judgment has the effect of affirming the judgment.

The complaint, in an action upon a contract providing that defendant on plaintiff's request was to return money paid by plaintiff for the purchase of corporate stock, averred that demand was made for a return of the money, and that at the same time an offer was made to return and surrender the stock, and the answer denied any demand or offer to return the stock excepting a demand made by plaintiff's attorney just before the commencement of the action. Held, that the answer admitted a demand and offer to surrender the stock by plaintiff's attorney.

4. CONTRACTS (§ 176*)—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 882*)—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR—SUBMITTING ISSUES TO JURY.

Where the court, at the request of both parties to an action on a contract, left it to the jury to determine the question of reasonableness of time, and defendant's recognition of liability in one of a series of similar transactions on one of which plaintiff's action was brought was shown, neither party is in a position to complain of the submission of such issue to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Edward Spaeth against the Ocean Park Realty, Mining & Investment Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. M. Palmer and Anderson & Anderson, for appellants. L. G. Susemihl, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. [1] The action was for money. Verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff. Appeal by defendants from an order denying a new trial. An appeal from the judgment was heretofore, by consent, dismissed, the effect of which was to affirm the same. The only matter for review then remaining is as to the action of the court in denying the motion for a new trial.

The principal issue involved relates to the terms and conditions of the contract through which plaintiff acquired 3,000 shares of mining stock from defendants. The terms of this contract were determined by the jury in their affirmative answer to the following special interrogatory: "Did the defendants, at the time plaintiff purchased the stock, promise the plaintiff to return to him the sums paid by him, viz., $1,000 and $500, if he at any time thereafter became dissatisfied or wanted his money back?" The contracts were entered into in August, 1907.

[2] It is averred in the complaint that demand was made for a return of the money, and at the same time an offer was made to return and surrender the stock. The answer denied any demand or offer to return the stock, except a demand made by plaintiff's attorney just prior to the commencement of the action. Construing this answer under the rule, it, in effect, admits a demand and offer to surrender the stock by plaintiff's attorney. Upon the trial the authority of the attorney in the premises was shown. The record discloses, from the remarks of the court and statements of counsel upon both sides, that the trial proceeded upon the theory that two issues only were to be determined and both were matters for the jury: First, the terms of the original contract; and, second, the reasonableness of time within which the rescission was sought by plaintiff. As to the first issue, the evidence was conflicting, but there is enough in plaintiff's testimony to support the answer to the special interrogatory and the verdict based thereon. It is true the questions asked the plaintiff were involved and confusing, and the answers indicated that plaintiff lacked somewhat in intelligence and ability to properly express himself, yet the jury probably made no mistake in arriving at their conclusion. This was the opinion evidently of the trial court, as evidenced by its denial of the motion for a new trial, and we are not prepared to say that the verdict is unsupported.

It is urged by appellants that, assuming the contract to have been as contended by plaintiff and found by the jury, nevertheless, as a matter of law, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because he did not attempt to rescind within a reasonable time; and, assuming that the question was one for the jury, no evidence appears to warrant such implied finding.

[3] It is settled law in this state that "when the terms of an agreement do not limit the time within which it is to be performed, the law implies that it is to be performed immediately, or at least within a reasonable time."

[4] We think it may be said that the current of authority is to the effect that, when the facts are undisputed, as in the construction of a written instrument, or applying a rule where the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties are conceded, it is for the court to determine as to the reasonableness of time within which parties may be permitted to insist upon rights given or reserved.

[5] We think, however, under the circumstances of this case, where the court at the request of both parties instructed the jury to determine the question of reasonableness of time, that neither party is in a position to question the action of the court in submitting such issue to the jury. It appears from plaintiff's testimony that, at the time of the purchase and promise to return the money, whenever plaintiff at any time became dissatisfied, defendants assured plaintiff that the stock would increase in value, and that he never would exercise his right. In addition, it appears that altogether there were three transactions involving the purchase of stock, in one of which, shortly before the suit, upon demand, defendants returned the consideration. From the finding of the court, all of these contracts were similar in their nature, and the payment and recognition of liability in connection with one purchase was a circumstance which the jury might take into consideration as being a construction placed upon the contract by the parties connected therewith. The peculiar character of this contract and the circumstances connected therewith may be said to indicate that the parties understood that plaintiff should be permitted to hold the stock with all rights reserved until some future date, when the condition of the property or of the market would indicate an increase in value.

[6] We recognize a difference between a contract to pay on demand, or where no time is fixed, which implies that such demand shall be made within a reasonable time, or within such time as by our Code is provided in proper instances, and the contract under consideration through which a future date, indefinite, it is true, was fixed, within which time the plaintiff might determine as to his desire to retain or return the stock; and, in the absence of any showing that the delay was so unreasonable as to render the contract oppressive, or through which an injury resulted to the defendants, the implied finding by the jury that the time was reasonable should not be disturbed. Quill v. Jacoby, 37 Pac. 524.¹

[7] Appellants assign as error the action of the court in overruling their objection to any evidence being received, because no cause of action was stated in the complaint. This objection was, in effect, a demurrer to the complaint upon that ground, and cannot be reviewed upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial. Moore v. Douglas, 132 Cal. 400, 64 Pac. 705.

We are not satisfied that prejudicial error is apparent in the record, and the order denying a new trial is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by Charles Lathrop against the National Sugar Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant C. P. Stewart and others appeal. Reversed.

Woodruff & McClure, for appellants.
George P. Adams, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for damages on account of fraud and deceit alleged to have been practiced by appellants upon plaintiff in the sale to him of certain shares of corporate stock of the National Sugar Company. From the judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

[1] The action as originally brought included among the defendants the National Sugar Company, as to which, however, and other defendants not appealing, the same was dismissed at the time of the trial. Defendant Stewart was the president of the corporation and a stockholder therein. Defendants Wayne and McGraw were copartners doing business as stockbrokers in Los Angeles under the firm name of Wayne & McGraw. In July, 1907, plaintiff purchased from Wayne & McGraw certain shares of the capital stock of said corporation, for which he paid the sum of $740, and received a certificate therefor. The complaint alleges that in order to persuade and induce plaintiff to purchase the stock the defendants Stewart, Wayne and McGraw made certain representations to plaintiff and upon which he relied and was thereby induced to make the purchase, and that said representations were false and untrue, and when made by defendants known by them to be false and untrue. Briefly stated, these alleged false representations were to the effect that the National Sugar Company owned valuable patents and patent rights of machinery, devices, and processes for manufacturing and refining a high grade of marketable sugar from wood charcoal at a cost below that of any other known process for the manufacture of sugar; that said process was entirely practicable, that it had been in every way tested, and that its results were a certainty, and by the use thereof great profits could be made; that the proceeds of the sale of stock in said corporation were to be used in the installation and equipment of a plant for carrying out the purposes of the corporation, and that defendant Stewart exhibited to plaintiff a machine and device in operation, whereby sugar was apparently, but not in fact, being produced from wood and carbon, or charcoal; that it was falsely claimed that the sugar was made from wood and charcoal; that the stock of said corporation would be of great value and far in excess of the amount paid by plaintiff therefor; that defendants conspired together for the purpose of falsely making such representations to plaintiff, with the intent to use the corporation as a scheme and device in the selling of stock to this plaintiff.

[2] The court found, "That on account of the statements of C. P. Stewart and Herbert N. Wayne, of the firm of Wayne & McGraw, the said plaintiff was induced to purchase and did purchase of and from Herbert N. Wayne stock of the National Sugar Company in the sum of seven hundred and forty dollars ($740);" but each and all of the allegations of the complaint touching the matter of false representations claimed to have been made by defendants are found to be untrue. Hence, it follows the statements made to plaintiff, and which the court found induced him to purchase the stock, were not false, but true. The court further found that "Wayne, of the firm of Wayne & McGraw, did represent to plaintiff that the said Wayne thought it (the process for the manufacture of sugar from charcoal) was the greatest invention in existence, and that he thought there could be great dividends and profits made in the purchase of stock, and also advised the said plaintiff to purchase stock in the National Sugar Company." Even if this finding could be regarded as material or responsive to any issue, and it is neither, it is not found that the same was not an honest expression of Wayne's opinion upon the future success of the enterprise. On the contrary, since the court found that the company owned a patented device and process entirely practicable which enabled it to manufacture a high grade of marketable sugar out of wood charcoal and water at a cost below that of any other process for producing sugar, and that by means thereof great profits could be made, it would seem that Mr. Wayne was fully justified in the belief that the National Sugar Company was destined to become a strong factor in destroying the alleged controlling power of the so-called sugar trust. As to defendant Stewart, the court found that he "did not at any time induce the plaintiff to purchase stock of said corporation, or any corporation; nor did the said Stewart offer to plaintiff or advise plaintiff to purchase stock from said corporation, or any person or individual."

The fact that respondent's able and learned counsel presents no argument, either oral or written, in support of the court's ruling, leads to the conclusion that no reason can be assigned for affirming the order and judgment. In this we concur.

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EFFECT AS A WHOLE.

In an action for slander, where the court, having instructed the jury that the words alleged to have been spoken were not privileged, charged them that the defendant claimed that the words alleged to have been spoken were privileged, the latter statement did not prejudice the plaintiff, for the court had distinctly told the jury that defendant's claim was not correct.

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 124*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

An action of slander was brought against defendant, who was district attorney, for words alleged to have been spoken by him in a prosecution where plaintiff was attorney for accused. On trial plaintiff testified that some of the slanderous words complained of were spoken in a prosecution where plaintiff was tried for perjury. The court instructed the jury upon the duty of the prosecuting attorney, upon the discovery of crime, or upon his having reasonable cause of suspecting the crime had been committed. Held that, as the instruction was obviously drawn to inform the jury that the words spoken in the prosecution where plaintiff was the accused were privileged, the instruction could not have misled the jury into believing that the words spoken in the case where plaintiff was counsel were privileged.

5. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where the court, in an action for slander, had charged that the slanderous words alleged in the complaint were actionable "in themselves," and that express malice need not be proved, it was not improper for the court to refuse an instruction telling the jury that the words charged were actionable "per se."

6. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

In an action for slander, where the court had in terms charged that it was not necessary to prove all the words to have been spoken, it being sufficient to prove the words in any one of the statements of slanderous words contained in the complaint, and that, when one person utters words concerning another which in their common significance impute the crime of perjury or subornation of perjury, it is presumed that they were used in that sense, a requested instruction, charging the jury that, if defendant spoke of plaintiff in the presence of others any of the slanderous words charged, the import of which was to accuse plaintiff of the crime of perjury or subornation of perjury, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, was properly refused.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1214*)—DECISION ON APPEAL—EFFECT ON RETRIAL.

In an action for slander, where the words charged were slanderous per se, it was not error to exclude evidence tending to show express malice, as such malice was implied by the language used.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for slander, where defendant was entitled to show that some of the words charged were privileged, being uttered in a case in which plaintiff was the accused and defendant district attorney, the admission of the indictment in that case to prove the fact of privilege was not prejudicial error, though the proof might have been made in briefer form.

11. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 103*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for slander, where defendant had shown that some of the words charged were uttered in a prosecution for perjury in which plaintiff was the accused and defendant had been the prosecuting attorney, evidence that the indictment was fictitious, and was fraudulently obtained, was not pertinent to the issue and was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

12. WITNESSES (§ 255*)—REFRESHING MEMORY—USE OF WRITINGS.

Where the district attorney, who was present at the trial of a criminal case, had the official reporter take down the testimony of the witnesses and what occurred at the trial, the district attorney in a later case could use those notes to refresh his memory to enable him to testify to the facts; the reporter having died in the meantime.

13. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 24*)—CONSTRUCTION—EFFECT AS TO EXISTING LAWS.

The libel and slander act (St. 1871-72, p. 533), having been passed before the adoption of the Codes, and the present Constitution, is not unconstitutional as requiring the plaintiff to file an undertaking for the payment of costs, and a defendant, having been successful, is entitled to a reasonable attorney's fee as an item of his costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Action by A. H. Carpenter against A. H. Ashley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 83 Pac. 444.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicol & Orr, G. F. McNoble, and A. H. Ashley, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for slander. Plaintiff complained that defendant, on January 23 and 24, 1901, spoke and published certain defamatory words of and concerning plaintiff, in the presence and hearing of divers persons, to his damage in the sum of $10,000. Defendant denied, in his answer, that he uttered the words attributed to him or any words other than as defendant set forth; that they were spoken under circumstances which he described and while defendant, as district attorney, was prosecuting one Ennis in a justice's court whom plaintiff was defending; that the language used by defendant had its origin in connection with certain testimony being given by one Sennett, whom defendant accused of committing perjury and whom he declared his intention to have arrested and prosecuted therefor; that the language addressed to plaintiff and which he used of and concerning him was entirely different from that attributed to him by plaintiff and was not intended to and did not charge plaintiff with having committed the crime involved in the alleged slanderous words; and that what defendant did say was true and was spoken in the discharge of his duty as district attorney and was privileged.

This is the second trial of the action by a jury, in both of which defendant had the verdict. The judgment on the verdict at the first trial was reversed on appeal, the Supreme Court holding, against the view taken by the trial court in the instructions given and refused at that trial, that the words alleged to have been uttered by defendant were not privileged. Carpenter v. Ashley, 148 Cal. 422, 83 Pac. 444.

[1] The issues at the second trial were the same as at the first trial and met like fate at the hands of the jury upon sufficient evidence. Unless, therefore, the trial court erred either in its instructions to the jury or its refusal to give such as were asked by plaintiff, or in its rulings upon the evidence, the judgment must stand.

The burden of appellant's complaint of the instructions is that the court ignored the law of the case as laid down by the Supreme Court on the first appeal, namely, that under the disclosed facts the words alleged to have been spoken were not privileged. Plaintiff requested 28 instructions. The court gave 11 of these as requested and 7 after some modification not pointed out nor complained of. In at least two of these instructions—numbered 6 and 15—the court distinctly and unequivocally told the jury that the words spoken by defendant were not privileged, and, in No. 15, the court stated "that plaintiff is entitled to a verdict against the defendant without proof of special damage," if the jury "believe from the evidence that the defendant spoke or uttered the words."

[2] Instruction No. 16 was refused probably, and certainly might well have been, because given in Nos. 6 and 15. For like reason the court properly refused No. 22. The instructions given were favorable to plaintiff in all respects and covered every phase of the case substantially as requested by plaintiff.

[3] In the thirty-first instruction the court briefly referred to the issues presented by the pleadings, in course of which the court stated, among other things, that the defendant "claims that such publication (the words alleged to have been spoken) was privileged." Complaint is made of this. But we do not see that harm could have thus come to plaintiff's case, for it was but stating what defendant claimed and what the court had distinctly told the jury was no defense because not privileged.

[4] Instructions numbered 32 and 33 had reference only to the duty of the district attorney, upon the discovery of crime or upon his having reasonable cause for suspecting that a crime has been committed amounting to felony, to bring the same to the attention of the grand jury. It appeared from plaintiff's testimony, when on the witness stand, that some of the slanderous words complained of were spoken by defendant when he was addressing the jury at the trial of People v. A. H. Carpenter (plaintiff here) on the charge of perjury. The instruction was drawn doubtless to inform the jury that words spoken under such circumstances were privileged. These instructions could not, we think, have been understood by the jury as in any wise weakening the force of the instructions given with reference to the words which were spoken at the trial of People v. Ennis, which were the words referred to in the complaint.

Instructions 12, 14, and 24 "are," as stated in appellant's brief, "to the effect that where the words are actionable per se the plaintiff is entitled to recover without proof of special damage."

[5] The court, in its instruction 5, given at plaintiff's request, told the jury that the words charged in the complaint "are actionable in themselves" and that "express malice need not be proved." The point made by appellant seems to have been covered, except that the court used the words "actionable in themselves" instead of "actionable per se." It is altogether probable that the jury would not have been further enlightened by giving the language in Latin.

[6] Instruction 23 was that if the jury believed that "defendant spoke of plaintiff, in the presence of others, any of the slanderous words charged in the complaint, the import of which would be to charge the plaintiff with the crime of perjury or subornation of perjury, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict in his favor, unless the defendant has established the truth of the slanderous words so proved to have been spoken by him and charged in the complaint." If the instructions given had left room for doubt as to whether it was necessary for plaintiff to show that all the alleged slanderous words had been spoken by defendant before plaintiff could recover, there would be force in the claim that this instruction should have been given. But the court had instructed the jury, in No. 9, that "it is not necessary to prove all the words that are charged to have been spoken. It is sufficient to prove, substantially, the words in some one or more of the statements of the slanderous words contained in the complaint." In the instruction No. 8, the jury were told "that when one person utters words concerning another, which, in their ordinary and common significance, impute the crime of perjury, or subornation of perjury, it is presumed it was in that sense they were used and understood by the bystanders who heard them," etc.

Instruction numbered 25 was fully covered in other instructions.

[7] There are numerous assignments of error in ruling upon evidence offered. Some of these do not call for notice, and none of them import prejudice if error be conceded. We will notice such as appear to call for remark.

Witness Haynes, for plaintiff, had testified to the words spoken as charged, and was then asked, "What else did you hear him say outside of these direct charges of perjury?" An objection was sustained, but the witness stated that he remembered nothing further that was said.

[8] Witness Davis, for plaintiff, was a newspaper reporter and reported to his paper, the Evening Mail, one of the cases where the alleged words are said to have been spoken. Plaintiff undertook to prove by the witness that he wrote the article published in that paper and to identify the report as plaintiff's Exhibit 1. Plaintiff tried in several ways to get this report before the jury, but objection was sustained, and finally the court said to counsel: "I call your attention again to the ruling of the Supreme Court in this case (on the first appeal), and I do not want to be called upon to continue repeating my rulings. * * * I don't want you to undertake to do indirectly what the Supreme Court has said you cannot do directly." The Supreme Court had ruled that these newspaper articles were inadmissible. The witness testified that he considered his notes made at the time a memorandum, but did not so consider the full report written out afterwards. He was allowed to refresh his memory from looking over the report, but was not allowed to read the report. He then stated what he remembered. We think the ruling was correct.

[9] Plaintiff was a witness in his own behalf and apparently conducted his own examination. He was asked what he heard defendant say of him at the Ennis trial, and answered: "He addressed you, and he said that you are worse than Stennett, for—(Defendant's counsel moved to strike out the answer on the ground that it is no part of the actionable words in the complaint.)" The motion was allowed. Plaintiff claims that the evidence was intended to show malice. So far as the element of malice was concerned, it was implied by the language charged, and the court so instructed the jury, and that it was not necessary to prove malice. The witness proceeded to testify very minutely to all that he heard said which formed part of the charge made in the complaint.

It was not erroneous to strike out the further answer of the witness: "He said in the justice's court of Stockton township that I should be disbarred."

[10] Witness Carpenter had testified in chief that defendant had said to him: "You have sworn to either 13 or 16 lies and have made the Stennetts perjurers." On cross-examination defendant interrogated witness to show that this occurred at his trial under an indictment for perjury which defendant was prosecuting. Defendant's counsel stated that his purpose was to show the circumstances under which the statements were made by defendant. It was, perhaps, unnecessary to introduce the indictment to accomplish defendant's purpose; but its introduction could not have made prejudicial what in briefer form might have been brought to the jury's attention.

[11] On re-direct, witness Carpenter put to himself a series of questions the purpose of which he said was to show that the indictment "was fictitious and fraudulent and obtained by defendant through felonious means." Of course, such inquiry was not pertinent.

[12] Defendant Ashley was a witness in his own behalf. He was asked to narrate the colloquy occurring between him and plaintiff during which the alleged slanderous words, or whatever they were, were uttered. He testified that he, as district attorney, directed the official reporter, E. E. Hood, to take down the testimony of the witnesses and what occurred during the hearing, and that Hood did take down all the proceedings and write them out soon thereafter, and that he, the witness, examined the transcription, and that it was a true and correct statement of the proceedings. "The Court: Do you know the transcription made by him under your direction, handed to you, to be a true and correct statement of the proceedings that were taken? A. I do. The Court: I think Mr. Ashley may refresh his memory from it. I don't think they are admissible as independent evidence." Mr. Hood was dead at the time of the present trial. The ruling was not error.

[13] A cost bill was filed by defendant amounting to $513.90. Among the items was a charge of $100, counsel fees. This and some other items were objected to by plaintiff. The court taxed defendant's costs at $317. The only complaint now made is that the allowance of attorney's fees was unconstitutional, citing Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 265, 88 Pac. 982, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 909, 119 Am. St. Rep. 193. That was a case involving the constitutionality of the mechanic's lien law, which gives to the plaintiff reasonable attorney's fees but allows no fees to the defendant should he prevail. The argument against the constitutionality of the act proceeds upon the principle that the parties are entitled to the equal protection of the law, under the national Constitution, which is violated because a right is given one and denied the other. And it violates the state Constitution, which prohibits special laws and requires that general laws shall be uniform.

The libel and slander act was passed March 23, 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 533), prior to the adoption of the Codes and prior to the adoption of the new Constitution. It was held, in Smith v. McDermott, 93 Cal. 421, 29 Pac. 34, that the section of the act requiring plaintiff to file an undertaking for the payment of costs was constitutional; that the Constitution did not repeal prior legislation. In Caffey v. Mann, 3 Cal. App. 124, 84 Pac. 424, the question was whether the defendant was entitled to recover $100 as attorney's fees, in an action for slander, where the action had been dismissed by plaintiff. The lower court disallowed the item. The appellate court held that it was a proper charge as costs. See, also, same case, 5 Cal. App. 712, 91 Pac. 172. In both cases petition to have the cause heard in the Supreme Court was denied. The mechanic's lien law was passed after the adoption of the Constitution in 1879 and was thus brought within its controlling provisions.

We discover no error in the record.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

1. LARCENY (§ 64*)—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

ALLEN, P. J. Defendants were jointly prosecuted upon an information charging them with the crime of burglary. From a judgment based upon a verdict of guilty, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants jointly appeal.

The evidence presented by the state tended to show that a barn belonging to one Goode, located near Bakersfield, was burglarized and a set of harness stolen therefrom. The following morning Goode and an officer discovered that whoever committed the crime had used a small wagon in removing the stolen articles. This wagon was traced from the barn, as were the tracks of a single individual who evidently propelled the wagon, to a point near what is denominated a shack occupied by defendant Roderiquez and a woman and from this wagon to such shack surface markings upon the ground indicated that something had been dragged from the wagon along the ground to the shack. Outside of this shack, lying upon the ground, Goode and the officer found defendant Morano. Upon inquiry, he disclaimed any knowledge of the taking of the harness or of its whereabouts. He, however, was taken in charge by one of the parties, and Goode proceeded to call to his assistance the sheriff of the county. This officer entered and examined other shacks in the vicinity of the one occupied by Roderiquez and found no harness therein. During this examination Roderiquez, who had been asleep in his own shack, came out and went into an adjoining tent where his breakfast was being served. The sheriff then said to Goode and those present that, having found nothing in the other shacks, he was going to enter the one of Roderiquez and make an examination therein. Thereupon, Roderiquez spoke up and said, "You will find the harness in there under a canvas." They entered and found the harness so covered with canvas, and thereupon the arrest of Roderiquez and Morano followed. The matters above recited, testified to by several witnesses, comprised the evidence offered on behalf of the people.

Morano offered no testimony in his defense, while Roderiquez and the woman occupying the tent with him were both examined in behalf of Roderiquez. The woman testified that the little wagon was the property of Morano; that about 10 o'clock on the night of the burglary Morano dragged the harness so contained in a sack into Roderiquez's tent and covered it with the canvas. Roderiquez testified that he was asleep at the time Morano was said to have brought in the harness and knew nothing of it, and that his only knowledge connected therewith was derived from the statement of the woman to him in the morning, and that his statement to the officers that the harness was inside the tent was based upon such information. He disclaimed any connection with the burglary. It will be observed that there was no evidence tending to connect Morano with the crime, except that of the woman; the stolen property was not in his possession, and in support of the verdict finding Morano guilty it must be assumed that the jury accepted the statement of such woman to be true. Upon such theory, there is ample evidence in the record to sustain the verdict of guilty as to Morano. We find nothing in the record, however, assuming Morano's guilt sufficient to warrant the jury in finding a verdict of guilty against Roderiquez.

[1] The mere possession of property recently stolen is not of itself sufficient evidence on which to convict a defendant of theft. It is at most but a circumstance tending to show guilt. The duty, however, devolved upon Roderiquez to account for such possession. That he accounted therefor to the satisfaction of the jury is evident from their verdict finding Morano guilty. That but one person was actively engaged in the burglary is made to appear. Roderiquez was informed against as a principal. If Morano be guilty, there is nothing in the record tending to show that Roderiquez was present, or aided or abetted in the commission of the offense, and therefore a principal under section 971 of the Penal Code. Nor is there anything indicating that Roderiquez concealed the crime from a magistrate, or harbored or protected the person charged with or convicted thereof, under section 32 of the Penal Code. He, however, was not informed against as an accessory, but as a principal alone. Were the conviction of Morano not involved, we should be inclined to the opinion that the circumstances were such as to support a verdict of guilty as against Roderiquez.

[2] It is obvious from the evidence that both were not actively engaged in the commission of the crime, and that in the opinion of the jury Morano was the active participant; that it was Morano who propelled the wagon; that it was Morano's wagon which was used in the transportation of the harness; that it was Morano who dragged the harness from the wagon into the tent of Roderiquez; and, in the absence of any testimony tending to show that Roderiquez was an accessory before the fact, we think that the verdict as against Roderiquez cannot be justified.

The judgment and order upon the appeal of defendant Morano are affirmed, while the judgment and order as to defendant Roderiquez are reversed, and as to defendant Roderiquez the cause is remanded to the superior court of Kern county for further proceedings.

PEOPLE v. GIBSON. (Cr. 189.)

1. LARCENY (§ 64*)—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

That, three or four days after a theft, accused had possession of part of the stolen property, all of which was taken from a trunk, and that he asserted ownership thereof, warranted a finding that he took all the property.

2. LARCENY (§ 68*)—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

Where one accused of larceny is shown to have had possession of the stolen property, when it had been recently stolen, slight corroborative evidence of inculpatory circumstances will justify submission of the case to the jury, in the absence of evidence on accused's part.

3. LARCENY (§ 77*)—INSTRUCTIONS—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

It was proper to instruct that, if the property was stolen and received into accused's possession shortly after being stolen, his failure to account for such possession was a circumstance tending to show guilt; that he was bound to explain the possession, in order to remove its effect as a circumstance to be considered with other suspicious facts, if the evidence showed any, but that mere possession of property recently stolen is not sufficient to convict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 199-204; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Terry Gibson was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Alfred Siemon, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. By information filed by the district attorney, defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny, and upon trial therefor he was convicted. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. He contends for a reversal upon two grounds, namely, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and errors of the court in instructing the jury.

The subject of the larceny was a watch, of the value of $35, and $65 in coin, which were stolen from the trunk of the prosecuting witness. The evidence tends to show that at the time of the theft this trunk was in a bunkhouse occupied by defendant, the prosecuting witness, and two or three others, all of whom were engaged in constructing oil rigs in the McKittrick oil fields; that the watch and $65 in coin were in the trunk at noon on July 15th, and that defendant ceased work as an employé and left the bunkhouse on the afternoon of that day, going to the town of McKittrick; that on the day following the owner discovered that the property had been stolen; that on July 19th defendant presented the watch alleged to have been stolen by him to a pawnbroker in the city of Los Angeles and, claiming to own it, negotiated a loan thereon. The defendant offered no evidence whatever.

[1] The possession by defendant of a part of the stolen property three or four days after the theft was in itself, in the absence of any explanation on his part, a circumstance tending to show guilt. Standing alone, it was not sufficient to justify a conviction, but added to this is the fact that he asserted ownership thereof, a circumstance which, when taken in connection with the fact that both the coin and watch were in the same receptacle and missed at the same time, not only warranted the jury in concluding that defendant had stolen the watch which he claimed to own, but had likewise and at the same time stolen the $65 in coin. People v. Melvane, 39 Cal. 614.

[2] Where, in the absence of any evidence on his part, it appears that a defendant is found in possession of recently stolen goods, slight corroborative evidence of other inculpatory circumstances will justify the submission of the case to the jury. People v. Vidal, 121 Cal. 221, 53 Pac. 558. "Whether or not it constitutes proof is a question, in the first instance, for the jury, and, in the second, for the trial judge upon hearing the motion for new trial." People v. Ward, 10 Cal. App. 524, 102 Pac. 679; People v. Cain, 7 Cal. App. 163, 93 Pac. 1037; People v. Wong Chong Suey, 110 Cal. 117, 42 Pac. 420.

There is no merit in appellant's contention that the watch identified by the prosecuting witness as the one stolen from him was not the same watch identified by witness Cohn as the one upon which he made the loan to defendant. Suffice it to say that the evidence tended to establish the fact.

[3] "But the chief cause of complaint and the most potent reason for a reversal of the case," says appellant, is the alleged error of the court in giving to the jury the following instruction: "If the jury believes from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the property mentioned in evidence was stolen from the premises described in the evidence, and received into the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and the accused is bound to explain the possession, in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence discloses any such." In connection with this, the jury were further instructed as follows: "You are further instructed that the mere possession of property recently stolen is not of itself sufficient evidence upon which to convict the defendant of theft. It is a circumstance tending to show guilt, but not of itself sufficient to warrant conviction." The giving substantially in the form here used of instructions in like cases has been so often approved by the Supreme Court that it may be said the propriety thereof has become settled law in this state. People v. Horton, 7 Cal. App. 34, 93 Pac. 382; People v. Etting,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237; People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 646, 36 Pac. 129. If there is anything in the case of People v. Abbott, 34 Pac. 500, cited by appellant, contrary to this view, it must be deemed overruled by these later decisions.

We find no reversible error in the record; hence the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

ZANONE v. SPRAGUE et al. (Civ. 839.)
(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
June 3, 1911.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 91*) — CONSTRUCTION OF HOMESTEAD STATUTES.

Homestead statutes are not designed to protect debtors against the performance of their just obligations, but to provide for the conservation of homes and to protect them against business misfortunes or the improvidence of the heads of families, and are to be given a liberal construction to effect these purposes.

2. HOMESTEAD (§ 158*) — FORFEITURE — DIVORCE.

Where the husband has filed a declaration of homestead of his separate estate, a divorced wife retains no interest therein unless she procures an assignment to her by the court rendering the decree, under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4, providing that a court rendering a decree of divorce shall assign the homestead to the former owner, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 158;* Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 825.]

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 158*) — FORFEITURE — PRESUMPTION — DIVORCE.

Where a decree of divorce is silent as to the divorced wife's homestead rights, it will be presumed that the court, at the time of granting the divorce, made no order with reference to such homestead, having assigned it neither to the former owner nor to the wife for a limited period, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4.

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 158*) — FORFEITURE — DIVORCE.

Where a homestead has been selected by the husband from his separate estate, the whole of the homestead interest vests in him on his divorce, without a decree, assigning such homestead to him, and if not assigned to the wife under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4, the property impressed with a homestead right remained in its former owner, freed from any homestead claim which the former wife might have had therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 158;* Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 825.]

5. HOMESTEAD (§ 158*) — FORFEITURE — DIVORCE — POWER TO ASSIGN HOMESTEAD — "FOR A LIMITED PERIOD."

While the Legislature can authorize the assignment of a homestead upon the granting of a divorce to either party absolutely, whether such homestead is carved out of the separate property of one or selected from the community, yet, under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4, which limits the right of such party in a homestead selected from the separate property of the other to its enjoyment "for a limited period," there may be enjoyment or occupation by the innocent party for a long period of years, even during the life of such party, but it does not mean that the court has the power of vesting the homestead absolutely in such party unless he is the former owner of property from which the homestead was selected.

6. HOMESTEAD (§ 158*) — FORFEITURE — DIVORCE — POWER OF COURT.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4, the power of the court to assign a homestead which has been selected from the separate property of either husband or wife to the innocent party to a divorce action may not be exercised arbitrarily, but it is only where the circumstances of the case justly demand such assignment that the power should be exercised.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

7. HOMESTEAD (§ 135*) — RIGHTS OF SURVIVING HUSBAND OR WIFE — STATUTORY PROVISIONS — "HUSBAND" — "WIFE" — "SURVIVOR."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 16, declaring that words and phrases must be construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language, but that technical words and phrases or those which have acquired a peculiar meaning are to be construed according to such peculiar meaning, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, providing that if a homestead, selected by the husband and wife or either during coverture and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community or from the separate property of the one selecting it or joining in its selection, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor. The words "husband" and "wife," as used in section 1474, mean, respectively, a man who has a wife and a woman who has a husband, and do not mean an unmarried man or woman; and the word "survivor," as therein used, refers to the husband and wife as such, and means that, upon the death of the husband as a husband or the wife as a wife, the homestead shall vest absolutely in the survivor of such marriage relation, so that the survivor must be a surviving spouse, and the surviving individual after the dissolution of the marriage is not within the statute.

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 42*) — PERSONS ENTITLED TO RAISE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Where the only rights that plaintiff in an action to establish homestead rights could have shown were those arising under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 4, the plaintiff cannot urge the unconstitutionality of that section so as to require its determination, since, were it constitutional, plaintiff would not be prejudiced thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Sadie Zanone, as administratrix of the estate of Catherine A. Powers, decased, against John R. Sprague, as administrator of the estate of Jane M. Sprague, etc., and John R. Sprague, her husband. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert P. Troy and Andrew Thorne, for appellant. W. H. Morrissey, for respondents.

HART, J. This is a suit to quiet title to certain real property situated in the city of San Francisco. The court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit and rendered and caused to be entered judgment accordingly. The appeal here is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

There is no dispute as to the important facts, which are: Alfred Coad and plaintiff's intestate, Catherine A. Powers, intermarried in the month of July, 1869. The real estate in dispute was the separate property of said Alfred Coad, it having been devised to him by his father, Samuel Coad, prior to his said marriage to plaintiff's intestate. On the 6th day of January, 1870, Alfred Coad filed with the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco a declaration of homestead on said property. In the declaration so filed it was stated that the family of the declarant consisted of himself and wife (plaintiff's intestate), and that, at the time of the filing of said declaration, they were residing on the premises upon which the declaration of homestead was so filed. On the 14th day of April, 1881, Alfred Coad was, by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, granted a decree of divorce from plaintiff's intestate. On the 12th day of October, 1890, Alfred Coad and Jane Mary Sprague, defendant's intestate, intermarried and remained husband and wife up to the time of said Coad's death, which occurred on the 13th day of April, 1906. Coad and defendant's intestate, as husband and wife, resided on the premises in dispute at the time of his death. Subsequently to the death of Coad, his widow married John R. Sprague, the marriage ceremony having been performed on the 29th day of September, 1907. After the trial of this action, both Catherine A. Powers and Jane M. Sprague died intestate, and the plaintiff and the defendant were duly appointed administratrix and administrator, respectively, of the estates of the deceased women, and were thereupon substituted as parties plaintiff and defendant, respectively, to this action.

The claim of the plaintiff is that her intestate, Catherine A. Powers (mother of plaintiff by Alfred Coad), is the owner in fee of the premises in controversy by reason of the declaration of homestead filed thereon by Alfred Coad during their coverture (section 1474, Code Civ. Proc.), said homestead never having been abandoned during the life of said Coad by the mode prescribed by law. Section 1243, Civ. Code.

The contention of the defendant is: (1)

That no valid homestead was ever declared and filed on the premises; (2) that, assuming that there was a homestead declared and filed on the premises according to the requirements of the law (sections 1263, 1264, Civ. Code), the interest of Catherine Powers therein terminated with the decree dissolving the marriage relation between her and Coad.

The decree of divorce is absolutely silent as to the homestead or other property, and, manifestly, in such case, if either or both of the propositions contended for by the defendant are maintainable, Catherine Powers had no interest of whatsoever kind or nature in the property in dispute at the time of the commencement of this action.

We are of opinion that the second proposition urged by defendant, viz., that whatever interest in or rights under the purported homestead acquired by plaintiff's intestate were lost upon the entry of the decree granting Coad a divorce from her, is sound and must be sustained. It will, therefore, not be necessary to examine and decide the question whether the attempt to impress the disputed property with the character of a homestead was successful or futile.

[1] "The policy of homestead laws," says Waples, in his work on Homestead and Exemption, page 29, "is the conservation of homes for the good of the state; the mischief to be prevented by those laws is the breaking up of families and homes to the general injury of society and of the state; the remedy provided is the exemption of occupied family homes from the hammer of the executioner," and therefore, as to "homestead statutes, liberal construction is the rule so far as concerns exemptions." Id. In other words, homestead statutes are not designed to screen debtors or to protect them against the performance of their just obligations, but to provide for the conservation of homes in the interest of the general welfare, and to that end to protect homes against the business misfortunes or the improvidence of heads of families. While homestead rights are purely creatures of the Legislature, they are, nevertheless, as stated, to be given a liberal construction in order to fully effectuate their beneficent purposes. With this rule in view, we shall consider the respective contentions of the parties to this controversy.

[2, 3] As the property involved here is of the separate estate of Coad, it is manifest, as will be seen, that the only way by which plaintiff's intestate could have retained any interest in the homestead in question, after the divorce was granted, was by an assignment of said homestead to her by the court for a "limited period" at the time the decree granting the divorce was rendered and entered. Subdivision 4, § 146, Civ. Code. Said subdivision of said section provides that, upon the dissolution of the marriage by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, in case the homestead has been selected from the separate property of either, the same "shall be assigned to the former owner of such property, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the innocent party."

As we have seen, the decree of divorce is silent as to the homestead, and it is, therefore, to be presumed that the court, at the time of granting the divorce made no order with reference to said homestead, having assigned it neither to the "former owner" of the property (Coad) nor to the wife "for a limited period." Brady v. Kreuger, 8 S. D. 464, 66 N. W. 1083, 59 Am. St. Rep. 771, 775. Indeed from the fact that Coad was the plaintiff in said action and from the further fact that plaintiff's intestate made no appearance therein, but allowed the proofs to be heard and the judgment to be entered upon her default, it may be assumed that the evidence must have disclosed that she did not come within the description of the party, as set forth in that section, to whom a trial court is authorized, in such case, to assign a homestead carved out of the separate property of the other spouse "for a limited period." At any rate, it is very evident that the circumstances developed at the hearing of the suit for divorce were not, in the judgment of the court hearing said action, such as to justify an order awarding the homestead, "for a limited period," to plaintiff's intestate.

If, as we conceive to be the correct rule, the only interest which plaintiff's intestate could have in said homestead, after the divorce was granted, is limited to that interest which she might have acquired had the court found (and made an order accordingly) that the exigencies of the action for divorce warranted it in assigning said homestead to her for a "limited period," then, the court not having so found or made such assignment of the homestead, it seems to us that it of necessity follows that whatever rights she might have claimed under said homestead terminated, ipso facto, with the entry of the decree of divorce.

[4] Nor, since the homestead was selected from his separate property, was it necessary, in order to vest in Coad the whole of the homestead interest, that the court should have expressly and by its decree or otherwise assigned to him said homestead. The "family" for whose benefit the homestead was selected from the separate property of the husband having been destroyed by the decree of the court divorcing the parties, the homestead necessarily ceased to exist as to that family, and, the homestead not having been assigned to the wife at the time of the making and entry of the divorce decree, the property so impressed remained in its former owner freed from and unincumbered by any claim which the former wife might have had to it by reason of said homestead. Waples on Homestead and Exemption, p. 67, et seq.; Brady v. Kreuger, supra; Bahn v. Starcke, 89 Tex. 203, 34 S. W. 103, 59 Am. St. Rep. 40.

[5] Of course, no one will gainsay the right or power of the Legislature to authorize the assignment of the homestead, upon the granting of a divorce, to either spouse absolutely, whether such homestead is carved out of the separate property of either spouse or selected from the community. But, in this particular instance, the Legislature of this state has not so provided. The right of the "innocent party" to an action for divorce to the enjoyment of the homestead, selected from the separate property of the other spouse, after a divorce has been granted, is limited by the express language of the statute, and, while the phrase "for a limited period" may entitle the "innocent party" to the enjoyment or possession or occupancy of such homestead for a long period of years, even perhaps during the life of such party, according to the circumstances of the particular case (Hutchinson v. McNally, 85 Cal. 619, 24 Pac. 1071; Neary v. Godfrey, 102 Cal. 341, 36 Pac. 655), it does not mean that the court has the power of vesting the homestead absolutely in such party, unless such party happens to be the "former owner" of the property from which said homestead has been selected.

The rule that the homestead, where selected from the separate property of one of the spouses, terminates, upon the granting of a divorce, in so far as are concerned the rights therein of the spouse from whose separate estate it has not been taken, unless such rights are preserved, as far as they may be, by the decree, is recognized and applied in many other jurisdictions, whose homestead laws vary only in immaterial particulars from ours.

In South Dakota the statute (section 93 of the Civil Code [section 2585, Comp. Laws]) provides, among other things, that "the court in rendering a decree of divorce, may assign the homestead to the innocent party, either absolutely or for a limited period, according to the facts in the case," etc. It will be noted that the code section in that state goes farther than subdivision 4 of section 146 of our Code, for it is there provided, generally and without any qualification as to whether the property from which the homestead is selected is of the separate estate of one of the spouses or of the community, that the court may, upon granting the divorce, assign such homestead to "the innocent party," absolutely, if "the facts in the case" warrant it. Here, as seen, the court has no such power.

In Brady v. Kreuger, supra, the decree of divorce made no disposition of the homestead—in fact, it was absolutely silent upon that subject—but it was, nevertheless, contended by the appellants in that case that "after a divorce the wife retains her interest in the homestead, and that, under the facts proven in this case, she was entitled to retain possession of the premises occupied by herself and husband at the time the divorce was granted." The Supreme Court of South Dakota disposes of this proposition adversely to the contention of the appellants as follows: "Appellants contend that this court will presume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the decree gave her the right to retain possession of the homestead. But this we cannot do. Courts will sometimes indulge in presumptions to support a judgment of a court, but never to reverse it. In the absence, therefore, of any proof as to the contents of the decree of divorce we cannot presume it contained anything favorable to the defendants. The relation of husband and wife having terminated, the wife ceased to have any claim upon or right in the husband's property, whether homestead or otherwise, unless such rights were preserved by the decree of the court. If the decree of the court preserved her rights to the homestead, or conferred upon her any other privileges in, or interests in or to, the property of the husband, the burden was upon her to establish such rights by the decree, as she clearly would have no right to the possession of the homestead after a decree of divorce had been granted, unless saved by the decree. There being in this state no right of dower, or other absolute claim of the wife upon the property of the husband, except under the law of succession, as his widow, or under a homestead claim which exists in favor of a wife or widow, and which depends solely upon the fact that she is such wife or widow, she can only avail herself of these claims by showing that she occupies either one or the other of these relations named to the husband. As the wife, upon a dissolution of the marriage, ceases to be the wife, and can never be the widow, of her divorced husband, her claims upon his property, necessarily, also cease and terminate upon the divorce. Rosholt v. Mehus, 3 N. D. 513, 57 N. W. 783, 23 L. R. A. 239. It was undoubtedly for these reasons that the Legislature of this state has conferred upon the courts, in which a decree of divorce may be obtained, such comprehensive powers for regulating and settling the rights of the wife in the property of the husband. Comp. Laws, §§ 2581-2585. The rights of the wife, therefore, in her husband's estate after a divorce is granted, are regulated and determined exclusively by the provisions of the decree of divorce, unless there is some valid contract between the husband and wife. When a wife, after the divorce, seeks to assert any claim to any part of the husband's property—homestead or otherwise—she must establish that right by the decree, or by a valid contract between herself and husband."

[6] As in South Dakota and in many other states, so in California, the law has provided the courts with ample power, in cases where the marriage relation has been dissolved by a decree of divorce, to justly and equitably adjust homestead and other property rights as between the parties for whose benefit homesteads may be declared or created. But such power cannot be applied without regard to the facts of the case. The power of the court, for instance, under subdivision 4 of section 146 of the Civil Code, to assign the homestead, which has been selected from the separate property of one of the spouses, to the "innocent party" to the divorce action, may not be exercised arbitrarily. It is only where the circumstances of the case justly demand such assignment that the power should be invoked and applied. For illustration, it may be suggested, as some of the reasons which may interpose against the exercise of that power, that the "innocent party" may be found to have ample separate means for his or her own purposes, while the "former owner" of the property may have no other means than those represented by the homestead; or, it may be that the community interest of such party may, under all the circumstances, be sufficient and just. Again, it may have transpired that the parties themselves have reached an amicable and satisfactory agreement by which they have apportioned their property rights without the necessity of disturbing or interfering with the "former owner's" absolute right to the possession and occupancy of his separate property from which the homestead has been selected. But, while this power must be exercised by the court reasonably and according as the facts of each case demand that it shall be applied, it must, as suggested, be put into operation in a case like this if the wife would retain, after the divorce, any interest whatsoever in the homestead selected from the separate estate of the husband. The court, in other words, would have to take some affirmative action to that end, or, as is declared in Brady v. Kreuger, supra, her rights under the homestead declaration would have to be preserved by the decree, otherwise they are destroyed forever. The court not having done so in this case, the homestead, as before asserted, so far as plaintiff's intestate is concerned, ceased to exist with the granting of the decree of divorce and the same, therefore, remained in the former owner free from any homestead claim, right or privilege of the former wife.

Whether, under such circumstances, such property would still retain the essential characteristics of a homestead, so far as the "former owner" is concerned, need not be decided here, although such has been declared to be the rule in this state. City Store v. Cofer, 111 Cal. 482, 44 Pac. 168.

[7] But counsel for appellant insist that the provisions of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure are absolutely controlling in the matter of the devolution of homesteads, after the death of one of the spouses, regardless of whether or not the family, as it originally stood when the homestead was filed, had, prior to such death, been destroyed by a decree of divorce. That section reads: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same. It vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor." The argument in support of this proposition is that the word, "survivor," as used in said section, means the one of the two spouses that outlives the other, without regard to whether, at the time of the death of the one or the other, the marriage relation between them had been duly dissolved by the decree of a court. Of course, it must be manifest, from the views we have ventured as to the effect of the decree of divorce on the rights of the plaintiff's intestate under the declaration of homestead, that we do not agree to such construction of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Indeed, applying, in the ascertainment of the true import of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the very rule of construction, as promulgated by section 16 of said Code, invoked by counsel for the appellant to establish their conception of the meaning and intention of said section 1474, the result must be, it seems clear to us, that said section does not, nor was it intended to, bear the interpretation which counsel ascribe to it.

Section 16, supra, declares that "words and phrases" must be "construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language; but technical words and phrases, and such other words as have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law, or are defined in the succeeding section, are to be construed according to such peculiar and appropriate meaning or definition."

The words "husband" and "wife," as applied to domestic relations, each has but one meaning. The technical meaning of those words is identical with their common or colloquial meaning, and the law can use them in no other sense. It is therefore not necessary to refer to and examine law or other dictionaries to ascertain their legal or only signification. They are generic terms that describe human beings of a certain class, and the mere mentioning or use of the words will as readily suggest or convey to the mind the kinds of the human family they describe as the mentioning of the word "horse" will portray to the mind the kind of quadruped that term describes. They obviously mean, respectively, as they are most tritely defined by Bouvier, "a man who has a wife" and "a woman who has a husband." As used in section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure, these words mean and can only mean, as descriptive of the domestic relation, just what they naturally imply, and, of course, do not mean an unmarried man and an unmarried woman. As all the other words in said section refer to the words "husband" and "wife," as so employed, we have only to look to the context of said section for the precise signification of all the vital words therein used for the purpose of defining or prescribing any rights which the Legislature by said section intended to confer upon either the husband or wife or both, and, so examining the section, it becomes very clear that the word "survivor," as therein employed, refers to the "husband" and "wife," as such—that is, it applies to those individuals with reference to the legal status they bear toward each other, and not, as counsel's construction of the section would have it, as mere individuals or strangers sustaining toward each other no legal relation. In other words, the true meaning of the language of the section is that the homestead selected as therein prescribed shall, upon the death of the husband as a husband or the wife as a wife, vest absolutely in the survivor of such marriage relation. Obviously, if the marriage relation was dissolved at the time of the death of either the one or the other, the deceased would have passed away not as a husband or as a wife, as the case might be, but, in contemplation of law, as a perfect stranger to the one who, in point of time, was the survivor. The irresistible result of this construction is that, in order that the homestead contemplated by said section may, upon the death of the one or the other of the spouses by whom and for whose benefit such homestead was selected, vest absolutely in the "survivor," such death must have occurred when the parties were still spouses, or, in other words, the "survivor" must be the surviving spouse and not merely the surviving individual whose character as a spouse had previously to the death of the other been destroyed by a decree of divorce.

[8] Counsel for the appellant make the further point that section 146 of the Civil Code is unconstitutional in that the act within which said section was embraced was, as passed by the Legislature of 1873-74, in violation of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution of 1849. Said section of our first Constitution reads: "Every law enacted by the Legislature shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title; and no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length."

The Legislature of 1873-74 attempted to amend, if it did not succeed in amending, a large number of the sections of each of the four Codes. See Stats. 1873-74. The title of the act amending certain sections of the Civil Code is as follows: "An act to amend the Civil Code."

The objections urged against the constitutional validity of said act are that its title expresses no subject whatever, and that it fails to re-enact and publish at large the law which it purports to amend. In other words, as to the latter objection, it is the contention that, to make the act conform to the provision of the Constitution referred to, in the place of publishing in the body of the act only such sections as were amended, the entire Civil Code, which constitutes one act, should have been embodied in and re-enacted by the amendatory act.

Section 146 of the Civil Code, as well as the other sections of said Code, as amended by the act of 1873-74, have been the accepted law of this state on the subjects to which they respectively relate for nearly 40 years, and there can be no doubt that, under many of said sections, there have grown up and been established rights of the most substantial kind which might be seriously jeopardized, if not completely destroyed, by a ruling at this late date holding said sections to be void for the reasons suggested or for any reason. Even if there be merit in the points urged against said sections, it is not for a moment supposable that any court would, under the circumstances, give its sanction to a proposition whose inevitable result would be to produce at least endless confusion and perhaps the destruction of vested property rights. But, if our views as to the meaning and intent of section 146 of the Civil Code and of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure are correct, it is immaterial whether the first-mentioned section is valid or invalid. It is very clear, as we have declared, that the only right which plaintiff's intestate could have acquired to the homestead involved here was that with which the court might have invested her for a limited period under the power conferred upon it by said section 146, and, manifestly, if said section is void for the reason urged here against its validity, she could not, at the time the divorce was granted, even have acquired or been entitled, as the "innocent party," if such she had been found to be, to the enjoyment of said homestead for "a limited period."

We have found no expression in any of the cases cited by counsel for appellant in conflict with the conclusion reached here. The cases cited were where, either after the death of one or the divorce of the parties for whose benefit the homesteads were created, an ineffectual attempt was made to enforce the payment of the claims of certain creditors by a seizure of the premises upon which the homesteads were filed, the contention of such creditors being that the peculiar facts from which the right to such homesteads arose were such as to relieve the premises of their homestead character either upon the death of one of the parties to the homestead or the divorce of such parties. See City Store v. Cofer, supra; Roth v. Insley, 86 Cal. 134, 24 Pac. 853.

The result of the conclusion at which we have arrived is, manifestly, that plaintiff's intestate has no title of any kind to the homestead in dispute, and that, as a necessary consequence, the judgment of the court below that she is not entitled to the relief sought by the complaint cannot be disturbed. The defendant asked for and was, therefore, awarded no affirmative relief.

While the proposition is not involved here, there can be no impropriety in suggesting, if, indeed, suggestion of the proposition is necessary, that, Coad having died intestate and, there having been, so far as we are advised by the record, no new declaration of homestead filed on the property in controversy after his marriage to defendant's intestate, the plaintiff, being the only child of said Coad, so far as the record shows, would be entitled to her share, according to our law of succession, in whatever estate, including the property here involved, of which her father died seised. Of course, it will not be contended that the homestead in question here could inure to the benefit of the second wife. Estate of Clavo, 6 Cal. App. 774, 93 Pac. 295.

Necessarily, the views ventured herein dispose of the points urged against the rulings of the court in excluding as evidence the declaration of homestead and in granting the motion for a nonsuit.

For the reasons stated herein, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

BRUCE v. BRUCE. (Civ. 808.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 169*)—CONSTRUCTION—RECITALS—SURPLUSAGE.

Where findings were expressly waived by both parties to a divorce action, in which the complaint averred acts of extreme cruelty, and facts relating to the selection of a homestead from property of the parties, a recital in the judgment that it appeared "that all of the material allegations of the complaint herein are true" is not an essential part of the judgment, and is entitled to no consideration in determining its effect on the property rights of the parties.

2. DIVORCE (§ 286*)—PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE AND FINDINGS TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT.

Where an interlocutory judgment for the plaintiff, in an action for divorce, in which findings were expressly waived, and in which the complaint contained no direct averment that the homestead was taken from the community, but alleged that it was selected from property acquired by defendant after the marriage, recitals in the judgment that all of the material allegations of the complaint were true, and that the homestead was selected by plaintiff from the separate property of the defendant, if treated as findings, will, as to the finding relating to the homestead, be presumed to have been supported by evidence sufficient to overcome the effect of the allegation as to the homestead, and that finding will prevail over the finding as to the truth of material allegations; and on allegations that the value of defendant's property was $28,000, and the amount of his annual Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action for divorce by Alice Bruce against H. S. Bruce. Interlocutory decree granting plaintiff a divorce, assigning the homestead to defendant, and awarding to plaintiff a lump sum as alimony, and from the part of the decree relating to homestead and alimony, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. L. Short and Dixon L. Phillips, for appellant. Chas. G. Lamberson and H. P. Brown, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiff for a divorce from the defendant. The parties intermarried in the month of March, 1896, the defendant having previously been married and raised a family of children by his former wife. An interlocutory decree, adjudging plaintiff to be entitled to a divorce, was rendered and entered. The decree, however, assigned to the defendant the homestead of the parties, and awarded to the plaintiff, as alimony for her permanent support and maintenance, the lump sum of $4,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, from the date of the rendering of said judgment until said sum is paid, the same to be a lien on the homestead property referred to. This appeal is by plaintiff from said last stated portion of the decree.

The sole ground for the divorce, as set out in the complaint, is extreme cruelty, charged to have been committed by the defendant on the plaintiff for a series of years by various and numerous alleged violent acts and words on the part of the former. The complaint further alleges that the defendant "is the owner and possessor of a large amount of real and personal property of the value of about $28,000, from which he received a large amount of rents and profits, which amount plaintiff is unable to state exactly, but on information and belief alleges that it amounts to as much as $3,500 annually." Proceeding further, the complaint declares that, since the intermarriage of plaintiff and defendant, the latter acquired a certain piece of real property, situated in Kings county, and upon which the plaintiff, after the acquisition of the same by defendant, duly made, executed and caused to be duly recorded a declaration of homestead, etc., but that, since the 20th day of June, 1908, defendant has prevented plaintiff from residing upon said premises or any part thereof; that said defendant "has received the rents, issues, and profits of said property, and is now receiving the same, and has appropriated and now appropriates the whole thereof to his own uses and purposes, the amount of which, plaintiff alleges, upon information and belief, is the sum of about $3,000 annually." The answer specifically denies all the material averments of the complaint.

[1] Findings were expressly waived by both parties; but the judgment contains, among other things, the following recital: " * * * And it appearing and having been satisfactorily proven to the court that all of the material allegations of the complaint herein are true," etc., and upon this counsel for appellant advance the proposition that, such recital being in effect a finding that all the material facts stated in the complaint are true, that portion of the decree declaring that the homestead mentioned therein was selected from the separate property of the defendant and assigning the same to him is not only without support, but directly antagonistic to the findings. In other words, the contention is that said recital in effect constitutes a finding that the homestead was selected from the community property.

This contention is clearly devoid of merit. Said recital was no doubt intended by the court to refer to those averments which involve a statement of the facts constituting the ground upon which the divorce is asked and was allowed, and, as it was not necessary to insert it in the judgment, being no essential part thereof, it may be regarded, as it certainly is, in view of the waiver of findings by the parties, as surplusage, and, therefore, entitled to no consideration in the determination of the effect of the interlocutory judgment on the property rights of the parties.

[2] But if the recital referred to may be treated or regarded as a finding of the facts, equally so may the recital in the judgment that said homestead was selected by plaintiff from the separate property of the defendant be regarded. Conceding both recitals to be the equivalents of findings of fact, that which finds that the homestead was selected from defendant's separate estate would have to prevail. There is no direct averment in the complaint that the homestead was taken from the community. The allegation in the complaint as to the homestead is merely that said homestead was selected from property acquired by defendant after the intermarriage of the parties. The effect of this allegation is only to raise a disputable presumption that the property so acquired belonged to the community. Of course, it does not necessarily follow as a fact that, because the homestead may have been selected from property acquired by one of the spouses during their coverture, such homestead has been selected from the community property. Therefore, treating, for the present purpose, as findings of fact the recitals in the judgment that all the material averments of the complaint are true and that the homestead was selected from the separate property of the defendant, said "findings," construed by the light of the presumptions in favor of the judgment, necessarily mean that, while it is true that the homestead was selected from property acquired by the defendant during his marriage relation with the plaintiff, it was, nevertheless, selected from his separate estate, the property so selected having been acquired by his separate means. In other words, the finding that the homestead was of the separate property of the defendant presupposes the introduction and reception of proof sufficient to overcome and dissipate the presumption, arising from the allegation of the complaint, that said property was acquired during the coverture of the parties, that the same was selected from the community. But this is, in reality, only to state, in a different form, the rule that, where findings are expressly waived by the parties, every intendment is in favor of the judgment. As is said in Long v. Saufley, 89 Cal. 438, 26 Pac. 902, "as findings were waived, we must assume that the court found all the facts that were necessary to sustain its judgment." See, also, Blanc v. Paymaster Mining Co., 95 Cal. 530, 30 Pac. 765, 29 Am. St. Rep. 149; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; Ames v. City of San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309; Griffin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 1 Cal. App. 680, 82 Pac. 1084.

It is, as we have seen, further objected that that portion of the decree awarding to plaintiff, for her permanent support and maintenance, the lump sum of $4,500, only, constitutes an unjust and inequitable adjustment of her rights in that respect, when compared to the value of defendant's property. But we perceive no ground upon which we would be justified in disturbing the judgment in that particular.

The complaint, as has been shown, declares that the defendant was, at the time of the commencement of this action, the owner of property of the value of $28,000, from which he received, as rents and profits, the sum of $3,500 annually; but it is not alleged that said property or any part thereof belongs to the community, nor is it stated that said property was acquired after the intermarriage of the parties.

The presumption is, as before declared, that every fact essential to the support of the judgment was proved and found by the court, and it, therefore, of necessity follows that the action of the court, as crystallized in its judgment, awarding plaintiff the sum of $4,500, must be presumed to have been justified by the evidence, and that that sum represents a just and equitable adjustment and adjudication of her rights in that regard.

We have been shown no legal reason why the judgment should not stand, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

1. HIGHWAYS (§ 90*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF ROAD DIVISION—PETITION AND AFFIDAVIT—PUBLICATION.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 2746, 2747, which set on foot the formation of a road division by a petition accompanied by an affidavit stating that the affiant has compared valuations, etc., and section 2748, which provides that such petition shall be published at least once a week, that the accompanying affidavit is prerequisite to jurisdiction does not make its publication essential, nor is its publication contemplated by the law, as the publication of the petition conveys constructive notice to the parties interested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 301, 302; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 95*)—BONDS—FORM AND CONTENTS—COUPONS—NUMBER.

Where the supervisors of a road district, in compliance with the provisions of Pol. Code, § 2764, prescribed a sufficient form of coupon as to bond No. 1 of a series, and further prescribed that "coupon numbered 1 on bonds numbered 2 to 100, inclusive, shall be in the same form except as to the number of the respective bonds to which each of said coupons shall be attached," there is a sufficient provision as to what bond number shall be inserted in the coupons on the bonds following bond No. 1; and where proper coupons are attached to each bond it is not essential that the coupon should have any number.

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 107*)—ESTABLISHMENT BY STATUTE—ROADS IN DIFFERENT JURISDICTIONS.

Pol. Code, § 2773 which relates to permanent road divisions and declares that the act is not to repeal any other acts providing for the improvement of roads, streets, or other public highways not within the boundaries of a municipal corporation, is intended to provide an alternative method for road construction, operating concurrently without repeal of other acts of similar tenor upon highways not within municipal corporations.

Code, §§ 3607-3900, dealing with the subject of taxation; but, if this were not so, the power to incur a debt and make provision for its payment by taxation having been granted, any reasonable mode of taxation would fall within the granted power.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Milo M. Potter against the County of Santa Barbara and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henley C. Booth, for appellant. W. S. Day, Dist. Atty., and George H. Gould, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. In form this is an action to restrain the county treasurer from cashing a certified check and paying the money into the county treasury, which check was deposited with plaintiff's bid for the purchase of bonds of the "Permanent Road Division of Goleta." In substance the action is one to determine the validity of the organization of this permanent road division, and the validity of its bond issue for road improvements. The specific law touching the creation and operation of such road divisions is found in title 6, pt. 3, art. 9, of the Political Code, §§ 2745 to 2773, inclusive.

[1] 1. The formation of a road division is set afoot by the presentation of a petition to the board of supervisors (section 2746), accompanied "by an affidavit stating that the affiant has compared the valuations," etc. Section 2747. "Such petition shall be published at least once a week," etc. Section 2748. No attack is made upon the sufficiency of the petition, but when published the publication did not embrace the accompanying affidavit. It is contended that by the terms of the statute the affidavit accompanying the petition is made a part thereof, and that a publication which does not include the affidavit is vitally defective. The fact that the accompanying affidavit is prerequisite to acquiring jurisdiction does not make its publication essential, nor is its publication contemplated by the law. The publication of the petition proper conveys the constructive notice to the parties interested. The irrigation act (St. 1897, p. 254, § 2) provides in similar terms that the petition shall be first presented to the board of supervisors, "accompanied with a good and sufficient bond." This bond, in like manner, is a jurisdictional prerequisite, but it has not been contended, and could not successfully be contended, that its publication was contemplated, much less required.

[2] 2. In compliance with the provisions of section 2764 the supervisors by order prescribed the form of the bonds and of the interest coupons attached thereto. The language of the order is as follows:

"It is further ordered, that coupon No. 1 on bond No. 1 shall be in the following form, to wit: Coupon. $60. The Treasurer of Santa Barbara County, No. 1, State of California, will pay to the holder hereof out of the Permanent Road Fund of the Permanent Road Division of Goleta in said county, on the 4th day of October, 1910, at his office in the city of Santa Barbara, in said county, the sum of $60, for interest due on Bond No. 1 of the issue of the bonds of said Permanent Road Division of Goleta in the sum of $100,000, issued October 4th, 1909. This coupon is payable in gold coin of the United States. Chairman of the Board of Supervisors. County Clerk and Ex Officio Clerk of the Board of Supervisors. County Auditor.

"That coupon No. 1 on bonds numbered 2 to 100, inclusive, shall be in the same form, except as to the number of the respective bonds to which each of said coupons shall be attached.

"That coupon No. 2 on bonds numbered 6 to 100, inclusive, shall be in the same form, except numbered 2 and payable on the fourth day of October, 1911, and except as to the number of the respective bonds to which each of said coupons shall be attached," etc.

It is conceded that the form of the coupons as to bond No. 1 is sufficient. But it is said that there is no provision as to what bond number shall be inserted in the coupons on the bonds following bond No. 1. This would seem to be made sufficiently clear, however, by the statement that "coupon numbered 1 on bonds numbered 2 to 100, inclusive, shall be in the same form, except as to the number of the respective bonds to which each of said coupons shall be attached." But even if this language be not utterly free from doubt, still, to each bond are attached its proper coupons, and it is not an essential matter that the coupons should have any number at all.

[3] 3. Section 2773 of the Political Code declares: "This act is intended to furnish an alternative method for accomplishing the road construction and improvement provided for herein, and does not repeal, modify or abridge any other act or acts having for their object the construction or improvement of roads, streets, or other public highways not within the boundaries of a municipal corporation."

Appellant construes this to mean that the design and effect of the act is to repeal all street laws operative within municipal corporations. It will be conceded that to convey the meaning actually intended the language of the section is susceptible of easy improvement. But from the whole scope of the act, and from the section itself, what was intended was to provide an alternative method for road construction, which should not operate within municipal corporations at all, but which should operate concurrently, and without repeal or modification of other acts of similar tenor, upon highways not within municipal corporations.

[5] 4. When a bond election has been carried, section 2763 provides that the board of supervisors shall be authorized and empowered "to issue the bonds of said division to the number and amount provided for in such proceedings, payable out of the funds of such division, and the money shall be raised by taxation upon the property in said district for the redemption of said bonds and the payment of interest thereon, but the total amount of bonds so issued shall not exceed fifteen per cent. of the taxable property of the division shown by the last equalized assessment roll of the county."

Appellant finds such inextricable confusion and uncertainty in this language as to destroy the section, since, it is said, the section itself distinguishes between district and division, and declares that the bonds shall be payable out of the funds of the division, but that the money shall be raised by taxation upon the district, and that no district is defined. Again, it may be conceded that the language, to convey its meaning, could be readily improved upon. But the meaning we think to be still clear enough. Said "district" means nothing more, other, or different from "said division." The district, in fact, becomes a division—the territory with boundaries delimited for certain specific purposes. Indifferently, it is a district or a division. It may have been that "district" was used in place of "division" from some excess of caution, to meet the supposed grant of power in section 4041 of the Political Code, which empowers boards of supervisors to levy taxes "upon the taxable property of any district for the construction and repair of roads and highways," etc.

[6] 5. Appellant next urges that the law contemplates the imposition of a tax for bond redemption and interest, but fails to state upon what basis the tax is to be levied—whether it is to be added to the county assessment roll, or have a special assessment, and fails further to state by whom the tax is to be collected; and, finally, fails to prescribe a penalty for delinquency. The law calling for a tax, the tax will be based ad valorem. Holley v. County of Orange, 106 Cal. 420, 39 Pac. 790. The supervisors are directed to pay the bonds and the interest (section 2763), and they are authorized to levy the tax for such purposes (Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 12). The subject of taxation is dealt with in the Political Code from sections 3607 and 3900, inclusive. The Legislature has thus made ample provision authorizing the supervisors to incur a debt and to levy a tax upon specified property for the payment of that debt. The mode of levy and collection is fully set forth in the provisions of the Code above mentioned. But if this were not so, still, the power having been granted to incur the debt and make provision for its payment by taxation, any reasonable mode of taxation would fall within the granted power. United States v. New Orleans, 98 U. S. 393, 25 L. Ed. 225; Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 660, 22 L. Ed. 455; Dillon, Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 854.

[7] 6. It is contended that the act is special legislation, forbidden by section 24, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that no property qualification shall ever be required for the right of suffrage. Herein the argument is that, as the petition is to be signed by landowners residing within the district, nonlandowning persons, and non-resident landowners are disfranchised, and resident landowning aliens and resident landowning women are given the suffrage. But the answer which has so often been made is that, by this and like provisions, the Legislature is not dealing with elections, with suffrage, or with the ballot, within the meaning of the Constitution and the election laws of the state.

[8] The formation of this and similar districts is a function pertaining purely to the legislative branch of the government. The Legislature can create them, or cause them to be created, without giving any person a voice or hearing upon the matter. Wherefore, it may do so by giving such persons as it may think best an opportunity to be heard. Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406; Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 417, 28 Pac. 1067; Laguna v. Martin, 144 Cal. 209, 77 Pac. 933; People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207.

[9, 10] 7. It is argued that a permanent road division under this act is not a corporate entity, has no corporate existence, and cannot, therefore, issue bonds. But the answer to this is that it does not issue bonds. The agency for the bond issue is the board of supervisors, and the tax for the payment of the bonds is imposed upon the property of the division. As was said of reclamation districts in People v. Reclamation District, 117 Cal. 121, 48 Pac. 1016, "the district (here division) is part of the scheme for conducting a public work, and not for self-government"; and as elaborately considered and discussed in Re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 308, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, the Legislature may legislate directly upon local districts, or may intrust such legislation to subordinate bodies of a public character. "It may create municipal organizations or agencies within the several counties, or it may avail itself of the county or other municipal organizations for the purpose of such legislation." In the instance of this law the Legislature has availed itself of the board of supervisors for the purpose of giving it effect and carrying it into execution.

[11] 8. It is contended that the act declares upon subjects not embraced within its title. Herein reference is made to the power of taxation and the use of the indefinite word "district" instead of "division." The title of the act, however, declares it to deal with one subject, namely, permanent road division. All the matters treated under that subject are strictly germane to it. The objection is without merit. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co. v. State Board, 60 Cal. 12, 29.

We have now considered every proposition advanced by appellant upon the validity of the law, of the organization of the district, and of the bond issue, and for the reasons given the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1216*)—SENTENCE.

The time during which one sentenced to state prison was at liberty on parole must be credited to him as time served on the sentence he was serving when paroled.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1216*)—JUDGMENT—CURRENT JUDGMENTS.

Pen. Code, § 105, provides that a second term of imprisonment imposed for escaping from a state prison shall commence from the time the prisoner would otherwise have been discharged, and section 669 provides that, when one is convicted of two or more crimes before sentence is imposed for either, a sentence upon the second or subsequent conviction must commence at the termination of the first term of imprisonment or at the termination of the second or subsequent term as the case may be. Held, that judgments run concurrently, except in the cases specified by the statute, so that where one was sentenced to a term in state prison and released on parole, and while on parole was convicted of another felony and sentenced, which latter term he served, he could not afterwards be retained in custody upon the theory that the judgments did not run concurrently; he having been imprisoned, after the expiration of the second term, for a longer time than the term prescribed by the first judgment, including the time while paroled.

In Bank. Application of Joseph Casey for habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged from custody.

Joseph Casey in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. From the return made to the court by the warden of the California state prison at Folsom, in response to the writ of habeas corpus issued herein, and the matters alleged in the petition for the writ, which were admitted by the Attorney General to be true, it was confessed by the Attorney General and satisfactorily appeared to the court that the petitioner was entitled to be discharged from custody. It was accordingly so ordered. That the reasons for such action may appear of record, this opinion is filed.

The petitioner was convicted of a felony, and adjudged to be imprisoned therefor for a specified term in the state prison. He was accordingly imprisoned in the state prison for a portion of such term, and then allowed his liberty on parole. While at large on parole he was charged with another felony, and convicted thereof. Upon this conviction, he was again adjudged to suffer imprisonment in the state prison for a term of years. He served this term in the state prison. At the expiration thereof, he had been imprisoned in the state prison, including the time he had been at large on parole, for a time longer than the term prescribed by the first judgment. He was nevertheless retained in custody upon the theory that the two judgments did not run concurrently and that there was still unsatisfied by imprisonment a portion of such original judgment.

[1] It cannot be disputed that the time during which the petitioner was at liberty on parole must be credited to him as time served on the original judgment. It may be conceded that his parole was revoked when he was arrested for the subsequent offense. But when again imprisoned in the state prison, after conviction of such subsequent offense, he was imprisoned not only under the second judgment, but also under the first judgment.

[2] In this state, there are apparently only two cases in which judgments of imprisonment in the state prison do not run concurrently. These are the cases specified in sections 105 and 669, Penal Code. Neither of these sections is applicable under the facts of this case. It is settled by the decisions that in all other cases the judgments run concurrently. Ex parte Morton, 132 Cal. 346, 64 Pac. 469; Ex parte McGuire, 135 Cal. 339, 67 Pac. 327, 87 Am. St. Rep. 105.

It follows that at the date of this petition, the petitioner had actually satisfied both judgments, and there was no legal ground for his retention in custody.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

Action by W. J. Beaver against the Continental Building & Loan Association. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Pendleton, for appellant. Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover from defendant the sum of $3,000. The cause of action was set forth by plaintiff in his complaint in the form of a common count for money had and received. The answer contained a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint, and, in addition thereto, a counterclaim was pleaded upon which judgment was asked against plaintiff for the sum of $2,231.77. It was adjudged that neither party recover in the action. The findings of the court were against the plaintiff on all of the issues tendered by his complaint, but in favor of defendant on its counterclaim, except that it was held that the indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant was barred by the statute of limitations. A statement of the case was settled and used on the hearing of a motion made by plaintiff for a new trial, and this appeal is taken from an order denying said motion, and also from the judgment.

On June 1, 1903, a deed of trust was executed by one J. W. Harvey, conveying to the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, as trustee, a certain lot of land located at Fourth and Fremont streets in Los Angeles city. This trust deed was made for the benefit of defendant and as security for a loan of $10,000 made by it to Harvey. At that time and subsequent thereto, plaintiff was acting as an agent of defendant in the city of Los Angeles, looking after matters of loan investments for the latter. Prior to August, 1904, payments due from Harvey under the terms of the loan agreement made with plaintiff had become delinquent, and the property furnishing the security for the repayment of the $10,000 loan had become charged with liens and incumbrances asserted by mechanics and other persons. The plaintiff thereupon wrote to defendant, suggesting that it would be agreeable to the owner of the property to have defendant institute a "friendly" foreclosure suit to "wipe out a lot of lien claims." This suggestion he wrote in a letter to defendant, addressed to its office at San Francisco. In response to this suggestion, the following letter was written to plaintiff by the general manager of defendant: "San Francisco, June 23, 1904. W. J. Beaver, Esq., Los Angeles, Cal.—Dear Sir: Referring to the J. W. Harvey loan for $10,000, beg to state that should we foreclose the property on friendly lines in order to kill the liens, we would expect the owner of the property to put up the cost of the foreclosure and the delinquent payments, and then let them take a new deed of trust for the same amount as the original one. Yours truly, William Corbin, Secretary and General Manager." A second letter from Corbin, dated early in July following, contained the information that foreclosure had been ordered to be made, and a request that Harvey send $200 to pay attorney's fees and costs of advertising. Some time later a check for $150 on this account was sent to defendant by plaintiff. Due proceedings were had for the sale of the property covered by the trust deed, and on August 16, 1904, the trustee, after sale, by deed transferred title thereto to defendant. There the title remained until November 29, 1905, when a deed passed it from defendant to one Tichenor, another agent of defendant, who held the property as trustee until June 26, 1906, when it was sold for a consideration of $15,500 to J. E. Ellison and wife. From the time the trustee's deed was made to defendant, down to the time when the property passed to the Ellisons, there had been no offer on the part of Harvey, or any successor of his to the title to the property, to discharge delinquent payments which were in arrears when the "foreclosure" was had. No demand was ever made upon defendant that it comply with the understanding expressed in Corbin's letter, first quoted. It is true that $150 had been paid toward foreclosure expenses, but nothing more had been paid and no deed had been demanded back, and no new trust deed had been offered to be executed.

The plaintiff here, notwithstanding that he had acted throughout the various proceedings as an agent of defendant, through a secret agreement with Harvey, became, on April 14, 1904, prior to the date of the deed from the trustee to defendant, the owner of Harvey's interest in the property. He had had the title transferred for him by Harvey to one Galoron, and later, on April 27, 1904, another deed was executed from Galoron to one Craig, who, plaintiff claimed, was also his trustee. By these means plaintiff, nominally at least, succeeded to whatever rights the owner of the property acquired through the agreement with defendant respecting the sale which was had under the trust deed. It was not claimed in this action that the plaintiff was entitled to enforce any right at all based upon the agreement mentioned and resting for authority upon the letter of Corbin written prior to the making of the sale under the trust deed. Indeed, it would seem to appear that any right attempted to be conferred by the first agreement, so called, would have become lost when the owner of the property should fail to offer within a reasonable time after the trustee's sale to perform all of the things he became obligated to perform, which included the making of payments delinquent on the loan and the execution of a new trust deed. None of these things were done, and nearly two years passed before the property was sold by defendant.

[1] Plaintiff must rest his claim to a right to recover solely upon an alleged agreement made subsequent to the date of the deed from the trustee to defendant. This agreement, he testified, was to the effect that, if he succeeded in securing a purchaser for the property, he was to receive all money over and above the sum of $12,000 which might be paid by the purchaser therefor. He stated in his testimony, that his demand was upon this subsequent oral agreement claimed to have been entered into by him with Tichenor. On this subject he testified: "The contract between Tichenor and myself, in which I was to get all over $12,000, was also oral, and that is the contract under which I claim $3,000 in this case." The date upon which the latter agreement was made was more than 1½ years prior to the time when the property was sold. In June, 1906, plaintiff did produce a purchaser for the property, but Tichenor refused to deal with him, claiming that all business arrangements between defendant and plaintiff had been terminated and were at an end. Through another agent, however, a sale of the property was consummated to the same persons who proposed to purchase through the plaintiff. We consider this second agreement, conceding it to have been made with a person having authority to act for defendant, to be one merely of employment of plaintiff as an agent to sell real estate. Such an agreement is invalid, unless expressed in writing. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6.

[2] A memorandum made on a card by Tichenor, showing prices fixed on the Harvey property in 1904, is of no service as establishing a sufficient writing in and of plaintiff's claim on the second agreement. This memorandum set forth no agreement, or terms of any agreement; it contained merely these words and figures: "Price given McKnight $11,321.75; price given Bank $11,104.55."

[3] If the agreement sued on is considered as a modification only of the first agreement, the terms of which were expressed in Corbin's letter, then it, too, is invalid, because not expressed in writing. Section 1698 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise."

[4] It may be added that this is not a case where the requirement of the statute making it necessary to the validity of certain contracts that they be expressed in writing works any apparent injustice or hardship when applied as a bar to a recovery by plaintiff. Plaintiff's conduct toward defendant in the matter of the Harvey loan was not characterized by that attitude of good faith and fair dealing expected to be evidenced in the deportment of an agent toward his principal. He did not inform defendant during the dealings had with respect to the Harvey property that he had acquired Harvey's title to the same until after sale had been made under the trust deed. While pretending to act for defendant, he was at the same time endeavoring to so manipulate the transaction as to profit himself by the outcome. If it were necessary to pass upon that question, it would be proper to hold that any interest acquired in the Harvey property by the plaintiff, while acting as agent for the defendant, became the property of defendant; that is, that plaintiff, by reason of the confidential relation existing between himself and the defendant, could not acquire any interest for himself in the property without the consent of defendant, and that any interest he did so acquire would be held by him as trustee for the benefit of defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

COALINGA PAC. OIL & GAS CO. v. ASSO-CIATED OIL CO. (Civ. 832.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 8, 1911.)1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 79*)—OIL LEASE—SALE OF PRODUCT—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUC-TION.

A lease of oil lands required the development of the lands for oil, and called for one-sixth of the gross product of oil to be paid to the lessor, or, at his election, one-sixth of the gross proceeds of the sale of the oil, and gave the lessor the right to elect to take the total output at market prices. A sublessee contracted to sell a specified quantity of oil, subject to the lease, and the contract permitted the buyer to take possession of the premises and operate them and make the deliveries contracted for, under certain circumstances. Held, that the contract did not require, the buyer not having taken possession, that the buyer should turn over any part of the deliveries to the lessor; the provision making the contract subject to the lease being intended merely to release the sublessee from further deliveries, if the lessor should elect to take the entire product.

Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 79.]2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 79)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

An oil and mineral lease required the lessee to prospect for petroleum on land described, and to remove and sell the product obtained, and to pay as rent one-sixth of the gross product to the lessor, or one-sixth of the gross proceeds of the sale thereof, at the option of the lessor, to be exercised when settlements should be made, and gave the lessor the right to purchase all the oil produced. Held, that, in the absence of an election by the lessor to exercise his option to purchase the product, and in the absence of any direction given to the lessee as to the disposition to be made of the one-sixth royalty, the lessee could sell all the product on the leased premises.

Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 79.]3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 79)—CONTRACTS OF SALE—CONSTRUCTION—"PRODUCTION."

A sublessee under an oil lease contracted to sell oil. The contract recited that it was its desire to sell its "production" to the buyer and the desire of the buyer to purchase the "production." The sublessee contracted to sell 300,000 net barrels of oil, to be delivered in installments before a designated date, the contract to terminate when the total net barrels had been delivered. The contract referred to the lease, which gave the lessor the option to take as rent one-sixth of the product, or one-sixth of the proceeds, and gave the lessor the right to purchase all the oil produced at the ruling market price, and made the lease a part thereof. Held, that the word "production" in the contract did not refer merely to the five-sixths part of the production which the seller was authorized to mine and sell, but the seller was required to deliver the quantities called for, though it might require the delivery of the rental in kind, to which the lessor was entitled, unless the lessor should exercise his option to purchase, or give direction as to the disposition to be made of its royalty.

Action by the Coalinga Pacific Oil & Gas Company against the Associated Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Short and F. E. Cook, for appellant. Sutherland & Barbour, for respondent.CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover the sum of $2,251.95 for 11,852.40 barrels of petroleum at 19 cents per barrel, being the balance due on a contract by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to sell and defendant to buy 300,000 barrels of petroleum. For a second cause of action, plaintiff claims the further sum of $3,597.62, alleged to be due for 8,994.06 barrels of petroleum sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff under a contract entered into on or about January 28, 1908, at the rate of 40 cents per barrel.

Defendant denies that plaintiff delivered any petroleum greater in amount than 250,138.24 barrels of oil; denies the alleged indebtedness, or any indebtedness, to plaintiff on account of the first alleged cause of action; denies that it entered into any contract with plaintiff on or about January 28, 1908, or at all; and denies any indebtedness to plaintiff on account of any such contract as is alleged. By way of cross-complaint, defendant alleges the execution of the contract referred to in plaintiff's first cause of action; that plaintiff delivered thereunder 250,138.24 barrels of crude petroleum, and no more, and has failed and refused to deliver the balance due on said contract, to wit, 49,861.76 barrels, to defendant's damage in the sum of $20,443.32.

Plaintiff had findings of fact substantially as set forth in the complaint and judgment as therein prayed for. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

There was considerable evidence taken for the purpose of showing the construction put upon the written contract which is the foundation of plaintiff's first cause of action. The second cause of action rests in parol. Both parties seem to think that the contract needs no extraneous facts in explanation of its true intent. They both, however, resort to the evidence in aid of their argument, and we may feel obliged to follow them.

On August 20, 1902, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as party of the first part, entered into a lease designated "Lease No. G74," with one G. E. Shore, by which it leased and demised to him a certain 80-acre tract of land situated in Fresno county, "To have and to hold the above described lands and premises, with all the appurtenances, unto the party of the second part, for the term of ten years from the 20th day of August, 1902, for the following uses and purposes, to wit: To mine, excavate, bore, drill and sink for and otherwise collect and develop asphaltum, petroleum, natural gas, tar, gypsum, coal or other minerals, substances or products under or upon said lands and premises; also to remove and sell said minerals, substances and products so obtained therefrom;" erect buildings, machinery, dig canals and ditches, and do many other things mentioned in the course of the mining operations; said second party to commence work within a given time and prosecute the same diligently and to dig a certain number of wells within a certain time; if within a time named second party should obtain the mentioned substances in paying quantities, "then the party of the second part shall thereafter faithfully operate all productive wells and shall continue boring as hereinafter provided, and shall pay to the said party of the first part as rent for and during said term hereby granted, the one-sixth (1-6) part of the gross amount of all (naming said substances), or the gross amount of moneys received from the sale of said minerals, substances, and products at the option of the party of the first part exercised whenever settlements are made, as hereinafter mentioned." The share of the first party is to be delivered to it "as rent of said premises, and not otherwise," and the weights and measurements "shall be by the weights and measurements of the railroad company shipping the same, or when otherwise shipped or sold, by actual weights and measurements." Second party is to collect and store said products on the premises in tanks, where the same may be examined by first party and second party shall keep a correct account of all products of said land, which shall be open to the inspection of first party at all times, and "for the purpose of fixing the amount of rent to be paid" second party shall, on or before the 10th day of each month, furnish written statements to first party's land agent of all the said products of said land, "and the delivery of said minerals and substances or payment therefor as rent as aforesaid shall be made on or before the fifteenth day of each calendar month." It was also provided that second party should not let or sublet any of the premises, nor assign the lease, except by the written consent of first party. Second party was given the right to take and use the oil for development work. "The one-sixth part of the oil, minerals or other substances and products reserved herein by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company as rent, shall be delivered on board the cars of said company, free of expense to it at the nearest or most convenient station on the line of the company's railroad. The party of the first part shall have the privilege, if it so desires, of purchasing at the ruling market rate all the oil produced from said land and belonging to the party of the second part, his successors and assigns."

By the consent of the railroad company, Shore made a sublease of a 40-acre tract of the land to plaintiff, on August 23, 1903, and a 40-acre tract to one Myers, at a prior date, each of which sublettings contains the following: "Subject to all the conditions mentioned in lease of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to G. E. Shore marked No. G74, dated August 20, 1902"—copy of which lease was attached and made part of said sublease. The consent of the railroad company was also given, subject to the terms and conditions mentioned in said lease No. G74.

On September 30, 1906, plaintiff and de-defendant entered into a written agreement reciting that, whereas, said seller (plaintiff) holds certain lands, describing them, "and is operating the same and producing crude petroleum therefrom, and has now four wells drilled thereon, and all of which are producing oil, and said seller desires to sell its production to said buyer (defendant); and whereas, said buyer is engaged in the business of producing and marketing crude oils and desires to purchase the production of said seller: * * * Said seller hereby agrees to sell and deliver to said buyer and said buyer agrees to purchase and receive from said seller three hundred thousand (300,000) net barrels of crude petroleum, in bulk, each barrel to contain forty-two (42) gallons; said petroleum to be of a gravity of not less than fourteen (14) degrees Beaume at a temperature of sixty (60) degrees Fahrenheit. Said oil is to be delivered by said seller to said buyer into buyer's storage tanks located on section 18, township 20 south, range 15 east, M. B. D. & M., Fresno county, California, at the rate of a minimum quantity of seven thousand five hundred (7,500) net barrels per month and said total quantity of three hundred thousand (300,000) net barrels shall in any event be delivered in such minimum monthly quantities and completed on or before the 1st day of October, 1909. Said buyer agrees to maintain a pipe line from seller's present wells to storage tanks of the buyer on section eighteen, township twenty south, range fifteen east, M. B. D. & M. In the event that the production from said premises at any time or times during the period of this contract, commencing on the 1st day of June, 1906, and ending on the 1st day of October, 1909, shall exceed said minimum quantity of seventy-five hundred (7,500) net barrels per month, said production shall be delivered by said seller to said buyer as fast as such excess quantity is produced from said premises up to a maximum quantity of thirty thousand (30,000) net barrels per month, it being the true intent and meaning hereof that the total quantity of petroleum produced from said premises up to a maximum quantity of thirty thousand (30,000) net barrels per month shall be delivered as the same is produced from said premises by said seller to said buyer under the terms and conditions hereof. This contract shall in any event terminate and be completed when said total of three hundred thousand (300,000) net barrels have been delivered by said seller to said buyer. Runs are to be made in not less than one thousand (1,000) barrels each. Quantities of deliveries shall be based upon gauge capacities of storage tanks of said seller and run tickets shall be issued by said buyer in duplicate, the original to be retained by the buyer and the duplicate to be delivered to the seller. * * * It is further understood and agreed that this contract is made subject to the terms and conditions of lease G74 and between said Coalinga Pacific Oil & Gas Company and the Southern Pacific Company. Said buyer agrees to pay said seller at the office of the buyer in the city and county of San Francisco in gold coin of the United States nineteen (19) cents per net barrel of forty-two (42) gallons each for all oil delivered hereunder and to make such payments on the twenty-fifth (25th) day of each month for all deliveries made during the preceding calendar month. Run tickets issued to the seller by the buyer shall be surrendered to the buyer as payments are made. Said seller agrees to in good faith operate the wells upon said premises and any that may be drilled thereon during the period hereof for the purpose of producing the quantities of petroleum covered by this agreement and agrees to drill additional wells thereon for that purpose in the event the monthly quantity required to be delivered monthly by said seller to said buyer as hereinbefore stated, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to obligate said seller to deliver to buyer hereunder any oil other than that produced or capable of being produced from the premises hereinabove described."

There is no dispute of the fact that about January 28, 1908, plaintiff had delivered to defendant the 300,000 barrels of oil. But defendant contends that there should be deducted from the deliveries the one-sixth royalty oils belonging, as it claims, to the lessor, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, as provided in the lease No. G74. Plaintiff claims that it had the right as a subtenant to sell all the products of the wells, accounting only to the lessor, the railroad company; that when its deliveries amounted to 300,000 barrels of oil its contract obligations with defendant were fulfilled. At no time during the delivery of oil by plaintiff to defendant did the lessor, the railroad company, make any demand on plaintiff for any of the oil or for any settlement in relation thereto, and all this time it had knowledge of the deliveries being made to defendant.

[1] Without doubt, this lease No. G74 became a part of the sublease to plaintiff and also a part of the contract between plaintiff and defendant, so far as applicable to their mutual engagements. Plaintiff, as subtenant, took its sublease burdened with all the covenants of the lessee, and it also took the sublease with all the rights and privileges given by it to the lessee. Defendant, in its contract with plaintiff, reserved to itself "at its option * * * to enter into the said premises * * * and proceed to operate the wells thereon," should plaintiff "refuse or neglect to operate said property or make deliveries as hereinbefore provided," or if the cost of producing oil from said premises should make it unprofitable to continue the work, but this was only optional with defendant and it did not, by any of the terms of its contract with plaintiff, agree to take up plaintiff's burden as a subtenant or bind itself in any way to perform the contracts undertaken by the lessee; and if it should elect to operate the property it reserved the right to charge the operating expenses to plaintiff "to and including a maximum of nineteen cents per barrel." It seems to us that the main purpose of making this contract subject to the lease, so far as it affected defendant, was that, should the lessor, the railroad company, make its election to take all the oil produced by plaintiff, it would relieve plaintiff from further deliveries to defendant under the contract.

[2] What, then, were the rights or privileges given plaintiff as subtenant under his lease No. G74? The lease seems to answer this question in plain and unambiguous language: "To mine, excavate, bore, * * * sink for and * * * develop * * * petroleum * * * upon said lands; also to remove and sell said minerals, substances and products so obtained therefrom." The right "to remove and sell" is not restricted to the share of the oil to which the lessee is entitled by the terms of the lease; this right the lessee would have without its being given in terms. As we read this clause, the right is given to sell all of the substances mentioned when taken from the wells. This view is strengthened by the provisions that the lessee shall pay as rent "one-sixth part of the gross amount of all * * * petroleum * * * obtained from said land, or the one-sixth part of the gross amount of moneys received from the sale of said minerals, substances and products at the option of the party of the first part (lessor) exercised whenever settlements are made as hereinafter mentioned." There is nothing in the provisions for settlements (given above) which places any limitation or restriction on the right given the lessee to sell all the products of the wells. The lessor was amply protected by having an agent present to whom full returns should be made of oils produced, and it was careful to provide that all shipments should be over its lines. We are unable to discover any question of doubtful construction arising upon the point being discussed. In the absence of an election by the lessor to exercise its option to purchase all the oil produced on said land, and in the absence of any direction given to the lessee as to the disposition to be made of its one-sixth royalty, the lessee had the clear right to sell to defendant all the oil produced on the leased premises.

[3] We are next to discover the intention of the parties plaintiff and defendant as expressed in their contract of sale and purchase. Here, too, the intention seems to be made clear and explicit by the language used, and is easily ascertainable without resort to extraneous facts or circumstances. In their preamble it is declared to be the desire of the seller "to sell its production to said buyer," and the desire of said buyer "to purchase the production of the said seller." We cannot agree with defendant that the terms "its production" refer only to the five-sixths part of the production, which the defendant was by the lease authorized to mine and sell.

It is next provided that, in consideration of the premises, the seller "agrees to sell and deliver to said buyer and said buyer agrees to purchase and receive from said seller, three hundred thousand net barrels of crude petroleum," to be delivered at the buyer's tanks "at the rate of a minimum quantity of 7,500 barrels per month, and said total quantity of 300,000 barrels shall in any event be delivered in such minimum monthly quantities and completed on or before the 1st day of October, 1909;" and it was provided that, "in the event that the production from said premises * * * shall exceed said minimum quantity of 7,500 barrels per month, said production shall be delivered by said seller to said buyer as fast as such excess quantity is produced from said premises up to a maximum quantity of 30,000 barrels per month. * * *" And it was then provided that: "This contract shall in any event terminate and be completed when said total of 300,000 net barrels have been delivered by said seller to said buyer." Clearly, by these provisions, the seller covenanted to deliver this minimum of 7,500 barrels monthly and 30,000 barrels, if so much was produced, though it might require the delivery of the entire products of the property, and though it might require the delivery of the rentals to which the lessor was entitled, unless the lessor exercised its option to purchase, or gave some direction as to the disposition to be made of its royalty. The lease was referred to in the contract and made part of it, by which defendant must have known that plaintiff had the right to sell the entire products of the wells. It was also agreed that plaintiff should operate the wells in good faith, and should drill additional wells if necessary to make the deliveries provided for. We do not see how or why it became necessary to resort to extraneous facts to determine the intention of the parties; nor can we see how or why, having done so, the evidence could or should be held to vary or change or aid in ascertaining the meaning of what is set down in the contracts in plain and unambiguous terms.

[4] The code rule for the construction of contracts is that the language used is to govern, if clear and explicit and does not involve an absurdity (Civ. Code, § 1638); and where the words used are unambiguous it is not permissible to resort to extraneous evidence to determine their meaning. Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 464, 61 Pac. 64, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56; Moreing v. Weber, 3 Cal. App. 14, 84 Pac. 220.

[5] The lessee was to "pay rent" to the lessor "1-6 part of the gross amount" of oil produced, "or the 1-6 part of the gross amount of moneys received from the sale thereof," at the option of the lessor, "exercised whenever settlements are made." Thus the lessee was either to pay in kind or in money, at the option of the lessor, and nowhere in the lease is the lessee required to deliver the rentals in kind, unless, at the option of the lessor, it was required to sell, as contended by defendant. Section 1449 of the Civil Code, it seems to us, is applicable here: "If the party having the right of selection between alternative acts does not give notice of his selection to the other party within the time, if any, fixed by the obligation for that purpose, or if none is so fixed, before the time at which the obligation ought to be performed, the right of selection passes to the other party." The lessor gave no notice to plaintiff that it desired the royalty paid in kind, in the absence of which plaintiff had the right under the lease to sell the oil as its own property.

[6] There is another view of the matter suggested by respondent which has some force. The lease was very careful to define the relation between the parties to it to be that of landlord and tenant, in which case there must be some appropriate words in the lease to indicate that the product of the land is to be held in cotenancy, "or such conclusion will not be reached. If there is nothing in the lease to indicate that intention, then the products to be delivered to the landlord after the harvest by the tenant will be deemed to be the property of the tenant until that time, and treated as rent to be then paid." Clarke v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 597, 54 Pac. 75. If the title to the oil is in the tenant until it is produced and delivered, the right to sell it would follow as a necessary incident, and whatever this right would seem to be a question which the landlord alone could raise, and in this case the landlord is not complaining. However this may be, the contract of lease seems to settle the question definitely, for it expressly gives to the lessee the authority "to remove and sell said minerals, substances and products."

The court found and the evidence was that, on or about January 28, 1908, plaintiff had delivered to defendant 300,000 barrels of oil, and defendant had paid plaintiff for 288,147.60 barrels, at 19 cents per barrel, and no more, leaving due plaintiff $2,251.95 for 11,852.40 barrels. By this time oil had advanced to 40 cents per barrel at the wells, and hence arose the controversy here; defendant claiming that the deliveries under the contracts amounted only to 250,138.24 barrels, on the assumption that it had the right to deduct from the deliveries the 1-6 royalty belonging to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

While we think the contract of the parties needs no extraneous evidence in aid of its correct interpretation of meaning, some facts will help to show how it was executed and how the business was conducted. Plaintiff received from defendant, daily, what are called "run tickets." They read: "Received from tank No. 271, from Coalinga Pacific O. Co. the following crude oil in bulk of 42 gallons per bbl." Then follow certain details of gravity, measurements, etc., ending: "Net amount received 1021.71 bbls." Signed by defendant by its gauger. Also containing the following: "The undersigned certify and guarantee that they are the legal owners of the above described oil, the number of barrels stated being correct." Signed by plaintiff, by its gauger.

There was also received in evidence the form of account rendered by plaintiff. Omitting the immaterial heading, it read:

"Hanford, Cal., October 2, 1907.

"Associated Oil Company. Paid Oct. 18, 1907. Voucher No. 9,411."

Witness Bliss testified that his company received no notice from the railroad company "to pay their royalty in oil or money. I do not know as a matter of fact that the Associated Oil Company was settling with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in some way, whether in oil or money; I understand they settled with them. I never received any notification from the Southern Pacific Company that they were not being settled with. With reference to these letters I wrote, sending run tickets to the Associated Oil Company down to the commencement of this action, I never received any letter from the Associated Oil Company, wherein they objected to the phraseology used in my letter, where I said we had sold them so many barrels of oil. Mr. Short: Did you ever write any letters to them objecting to their accounts rendered to you, showing you they had deducted and credited you with the net quantity? No, sir."

Defendant attaches much importance to these run tickets and monthly accounts as tending to show that the contract did not include the royalty oils. For two years accounts were made up in which the total amount of oil delivered was charged to defendant as sold, and in which plaintiff certified and guaranteed that it was the "legal owner of the above described oil." It is true that in settling with plaintiff the royalty oil was deducted, and it is true that accounts stated that "the S. P. R. R. Co. is entitled to 1-6 royalty on amount sold to A. O. Co." But defendant got the full amount which plaintiff agreed to deliver, and it was immaterial to plaintiff in what way defendant was settling with the lessor, whether it paid the lessor the same price it had agreed to pay plaintiff or some other price, or adjusted the matter in some other way. For plaintiff had no knowledge of the terms on which defendant was dealing with the lessor, or that the lessor ever claimed the right to receive the oil in kind, instead of money; and had the lessor claimed from defendant such right it certainly was not binding on plaintiff in this controversy. In view of the plain provisions of the contract and the lease, it was defendant's duty to notify plaintiff that it did not regard the royalty oil as delivered on the contract. Furthermore, in whatever view these run tickets and accounts may be regarded, they cannot be taken on their face as giving a construction in derogation of the terms of the contract itself, which are free from ambiguity.

On January 22, 1908, S. Guiberson, Jr., who was connected with defendant and signed his letter as "Supt.," wrote defendant as follows: "In looking over the Coalinga Pacific contract I find that they have delivered up to January 1st 288,147.58 bbls. net oil. Since January 1st we have received about 10,000.00, which with another tank, will complete their contract. I understand the Southern Pacific is offering them 40c. on daily runs. I was talking with Mr. Shore and Mr. Parlin (Shore was vice president and Parlin a director of plaintiff company), and they are ready to enter into negotiations for another contract." The receipt of this letter was acknowledged by defendant on January 25th. About the same time Guiberson had a conversation by telephone with Mr. O. Scribner, secretary of defendant company, in which this same matter was discussed. He testified: "So when I called Mr. Scribner up, he said that, pending the S. P. Company receiving the oil or their making a new contract, after the completion of the old contract, they would receive the oil on daily runs at 40 cents." This information was communicated to defendant, and defendant acted upon it. The witness was asked when, if at any time, defendant first objected that the contract between plaintiff and defendant had not been completed, and answered: "I think the first letter I have on that was under date February 27th." It was stipulated that Scribner had authority to give whatever instructions he gave Guiberson. With this understanding, plaintiff continued to make deliveries until notified by the lessor of its election to take plaintiff's oil, which occurred about February 20, 1908, and deliveries to defendant ceased February 20, 1908. On February 5, 1908, plaintiff sent in the run tickets for January, and in the statement was an item of certain oil at 40 cents per barrel for the excess over the amount of the original contract. On February 6, 1908, defendant's secretary, Mr. Sloan, replied: "The writer has no information which would indicate that payment should be made to you for any part of this quantity at any price other than 19c. per barrel." Mr. Guiberson's attention was called to this letter, and he replied: "Oh, that is Sloan. He does not know anything about it. That is all right. That will be all right"—as testified by witness Shore.

It is difficult to reconcile defendant's present contention with its conduct in authorizing deliveries of oil at 40 cents per barrel, after it had been informed that plaintiff's contract was completed in accordance with plaintiff's understanding of what the contract meant.

We have considered some but not all the facts and circumstances relied upon by the parties, respectively, as aids in the construction to be given the contract and lease. It was, perhaps, unnecessary to consider them at all, in view of the explicit terms of these instruments. We fail to find in the record any substantial ground for accepting defendant's contention in the case. From the view we have taken, it follows that there is no merit in the demands of defendant's cross-complaint.

[7] Some errors of law are assigned which will be noticed. Witness Shore testified to certain conversations with witness Guiberson, who represented the defendant. It is claimed that "the letter of Mr. Guiberson to Mr. Scribner was a material part of this transaction, and should have been admitted." The only letter we have found in the transcript from Mr. Guiberson to Mr. Scribner is the letter introduced by plaintiff already quoted. If defendant refers to this letter and means that it ought not to have been admitted, we cannot agree with defendant. It was in line with what the writer had communicated to plaintiff, and was notice to defendant of the important fact that plaintiff's contract was about completed.

[8] The letter of E. T. Dumble, who represented the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, to defendant, of date April 20, 1908, was an expression of Professor Dumble's opinion, and was given after plaintiff had ceased to have any relations with defendant under the contract. It was properly excluded. The dealings between defendant and the railroad company were not binding on plaintiff, and were properly excluded.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. JONES. (Cr. 1,617.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 368*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In the midst of an affray and just before the killing of K., he having, at the direction of another, been turned loose by the person who had grabbed and held him, as he was coming through the crowd, what the person said in giving the direction was admissible as res gestæ, even though not said in defendant's presence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 806, 812, 815, 821; Dec. Dig. § 368.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 672*)—SHOWING RELEVANCY OF QUESTION TO WITNESS.

Where the question asked on cross-examination is permissible and the answer might be material, though the court or the examiner cannot tell whether or what it will be, it should be allowed; and if the answer prove irrelevant or impertinent it can be stricken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1611, 1612; Dec. Dig. § 672.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 672*)—SHOWING RELEVANCY OF QUESTION TO WITNESS.

A witness, who has testified that when a person who had fallen arose he knew him, may, on cross-examination, without foundation for an impeaching question being laid, be asked if, at the preliminary examination, he did not testify that he did not know him till later; it being improper to exclude it as being necessarily an impeaching question, though, according to the answer given, it may be followed by a strictly impeaching question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1611, 1612; Dec. Dig. § 672.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 413*)—SELF-DEFENSE—EVIDENCE—SELF-SERVING DECLARATION.

The theory and evidence of defendant being that he acted in self-defense, and instead of fleeing from the scene of a crime committed by him, retreated from a mob carrying the baseball bat with which he committed the homicide, and when 50 or 60 feet from the place thereof stopped a few moments, with the bat in his hand, it was pertinent and proper for him to show just what he did and how he did it; and evidence of his attitude and the position in which he was holding the bat, as indicating that he was on the defensive, fearing further attack, was not objectionable as a self-serving declaration, the occurrence being immediately after the main event, especially where the prosecution was relying on evidence of his flight as indicative of his guilty mind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 928-935; Dec. Dig. § 413.*]

5. WITNESSES (§ 240*)—EXAMINATION—"LEADING QUESTION."

The question asked by the defense, if it was possible, during the time the flight was in progress, for any man to leave the crowd and go 40 feet and return with a bat without witness seeing him, which question was addressed to the evidence of the state that defendant had done just this thing, is not a "leading question"; a question not being leading because it can be answered "Yes" or "No," but being leading where it suggests the answer desired.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4040, 4041.]

6. WITNESSES (§ 240*)—EXAMINATION—LEADING QUESTIONS.

Leading questions are obnoxious only where there is manifestly an attempt to put answers on material matters in witness' mouth.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 838; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—MANSLAUGHTER—PROVOCATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

While it is proper to instruct that to reduce a homicide from the degree of murder to manslaughter, on the ground of sudden quarrel or the heat of passion, the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions, and, if the provocation was of slight and trifling character, of such a nature as would not be calculated to arouse the passion, the offense would not be reduced, it is error to instruct that any trivial provocation, though amounting to an assault, or even a blow, will not so reduce it; it being a question for the jury in each case whether the assault or blow be sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—FLIGHT AS EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that flight of a person, after the crime has been committed with which he is charged, is a circumstance to be weighed as tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, if given at all, should contain the qualification that he knows he is charged with the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1857; Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—FLIGHT AS EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where defendant has given a full explanation of his flight, it is for the jury to say whether or not that explanation is true, untrammelled by any instructions that the evidence of flight is to be weighed by the jury as indicative of consciousness of guilt.

10. HOMICIDE (§ 146*)—MURDER—MALICE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under Pen. Code, § 1105, providing that on a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves on him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable, malice, which, under section 187, is an essential to murder, is established by proof of defendant's commission of the homicide, putting on him the burden of overcoming it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-271; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

J. C. Jones was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. B. Neville, L. H. Hughes, and White, Miller & McLaughlin, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and M. C. Kerr, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant, informed against for the murder of George King, was convicted of murder in the second degree. From the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he prosecutes this appeal.

Herein he urges certain rulings of the trial court in admitting and refusing to admit evidence and certain instructions given by the trial court as errors justifying his demand for a new trial. There was no question but that the homicide charged was committed by the defendant. His plea was self-defense. The evidence was in sharp conflict. The rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence touching the homicide thus became very important. The circumstances attending the homicide, as shown by the witnesses for the people were substantially as follows: Upon August 15, 1909, at the town of Beckwith, in Plumas county, a baseball game was in progress between the rival teams of the town of Beckwith and of the neighboring town of Loyalton, in Sierra county. Defendant resided at Loyalton, and was an ardent partisan of his home team. He and others of his townspeople had accompanied the home nine to Beckwith. The game was in progress. The Beckwith nine was at the bat. The defendant had taken a position near the side line, between the home plate and first base, where he shouted encouragement to his home team and jeers and gibes at the opposition players. He was a vociferous "rooter" for the Loyalton nine. He seems to have made himself offensive to certain of the supporters of the Beckwith nine. One of these, Yerrington, accompanied by some of his friends, engaged Jones in a wordy altercation. Jones was holding an old axe handle in his hand. Yerrington asked him if he was carrying it for protection and challenged him to throw the axe handle away, which Jones admittedly did. Yerrington seemed disposed to provoke a fight with Jones, and Jones apparently was not unready or unwilling. Yerrington said to Jones, "You could not whip me if you had a gatling gun," and Jones replied that he was "willing to take a chance anyway." Others had gathered about. Middleton, the manager of the Beckwith nine, came up to Yerrington, telling him there must be no fight; that it would break up the game, and Yerrington said, "All right, there will be no fight"; then Yerrington turned away. In the crowd of Beckwith sympathizers which had surrounded Jones was one Jeff Parrish. Immediately following the Yerrington incident, according to the testimony of Parrish, the deceased, King, and Jones engaged in conversation. King was talking quietly to Jones and to the others, endeavoring to pacify them and prevent a disturbance. Upon this scene, according to his own testimony, Parrish intruded himself and to Jones said: "Don't holler and make so much noise, you son of a bitch; you have been hollering your head off ever since you have been here." Jones to Parrish replied: "You are a damned liar." Parrish struck him in the face; Jones endeavored to draw a beer bottle from his hip pocket and to use it as a weapon, but it was knocked from his hands and shattered on the ground. Parrish struck Jones in the face four or five times. Jones retreated from the mêlée. King was acting as peacemaker, endeavoring to quell the disturbance and quiet the crowd. He was so engaged, with his side or back toward Jones, when Jones, who had walked deliberately some 20 or 40 feet to where a baseball bat was lying, picked it up, walked back, and struck the unseeing and unsuspecting King a savage overhand blow with the large end of it, crushing his skull, felling him to the ground, and inflicting injuries from which he speedily died. Jones then made another equally vicious blow at another of the bystanders, who dodged it and escaped. He then fled the scene, running in the direction of Loyalton, was pursued, was intercepted by an armed man on horseback, and surrendered himself into custody.

The version of the fatal affray, as given by Jones and the witnesses for the defense, was that Jones was set upon by a Beckwith mob; that King was in the mob, not as a peacemaker, but as the leader of it; that Jones was beaten about the head by blows, not alone from Parrish, but from others; that the axe handle which he had tossed aside to engage in a fair fist fight with his adversary was wielded in the mob against him; that his futile effort to use the beer bottle was in self-defense; that roughly handled, bleeding, and half dazed, he staggered backward from the blows of his adversaries and fell on one knee; that his hand touched a baseball bat, which instinctively he seized and swung in self-defense; that the first sweep of the bat struck King, who was the foremost of the mob in his pursuit; that he struck wildly again to clear himself of his assailants, and retreated with the bat in his hand some distance into the ball field, where he stood and faced about; that he heard cries of "We will hang you for this;" that, fearing further and greater violence at the hands of the mob, he ran toward his home at Loyalton, and so running was intercepted by an armed man on horseback, who covered him with a rifle and called upon him to surrender, which he promptly did.

Accepting the first version of the affray given by the witnesses for the prosecution, the evidence fully supports a verdict of murder. Upon the other hand, if the evidence offered for the defense were accepted, defendant was acting in self-defense. The testimony for the prosecution is principally that of the participants in the affair—Beckwith partisans. For the defense, the witnesses are not only from Loyalton, but include certain disinterested spectators, residents of Beckwith and vicinity. Through the conflicting versions, certain facts stand forth without dispute. Jones was not the assailant, but the assailed. The crowd about him was composed almost wholly, if not entirely, of Beckwith people, friends and associates of King. Whether or not any blows were actually struck with the axe handle which Jones had cast aside, it was certainly brandished in the affray in hands hostile to Jones. Jones had been struck at least four or five times; blood was flowing from his face; the beer bottle which he sought to use as a weapon of defense had been struck from his hands; and, whatever willingness he may have possessed to do so, he had not delivered any effective blow, either in retaliation or in self-defense. In such sharp conflict is this evidence that the rulings and instructions of the court become of grave consequence.

[1] Clair Thomas, a witness for the people, testified that he saw the deceased, King, who was his friend, "coming through the crowd, a bunch of fellows standing there, like he had been shoved or hit," and "grabbed him and held him away from trouble." Then, "another young fellow said, 'You better turn King loose,' so I let him go. Just a minute or so, something like that, I heard a blow struck. I looked around in time to see King fall." On cross-examination, being asked why he did not hold King, he replied that King was a strong man and was giving him a tussle, and, besides, "another man told me to turn him loose." "Q. Who told you to turn him loose? A. McCloud. Q. Why did you turn him loose? A. He had this axe handle, and he said turn him loose. Q. How did he tell you; give me the language?" To this last question objection was interposed, upon the ground that it was "immaterial, incompetent, and not cross-examination," and the objection was sustained by the court upon the ground that: "It does not appear that it [the language used] was said in the defendant's presence. Further, even if it had, the court does not know what was said, and cannot tell whether it would be material or not, unless it be shown that it was said in the presence or hearing of the defendant." The matter called for was a part of the res gestæ and was admissible, either as to acts or language, whether done or uttered in the presence of the defendant or not. It had to do with the action, conduct, and speech of a member or members of the crowd at the time and in the very midst of the fracas which ended in the death of the man who was being held.

[2] The trial judge very justly said that he could not know "what was said, and cannot tell whether it would be material or not," but this question was on cross-examination. Defendant's counsel, likewise, could not know and could not advise the court of the evidence which they expected to elicit. One of the most important objects of cross-examination, one of the most important purposes for which a liberal range of cross-examination is allowed, is to bring forth from adversary witnesses matters which they have glossed over or suppressed. The question was permissible; the answer might have had an important bearing upon the matter. The question, therefore, should have been allowed, and the answer, if it proved irrelevant or impertinent, could have been stricken out. But to rule out a pertinent question asked on cross-examination, because the court and cross-examiner cannot know what the answer will be, is to destroy every purpose of a cross-examination and render it a vain and empty thing. Where a question is by a party asked of his own witness, which does not seem to have any relevancy or pertinency to the issues, and objection is made upon that ground, it is always within the power of the party producing the witness to state what he expects to prove, and the court can then rule with certainty upon the permissibility of the question. But, upon cross-examination, because of the very fact that it is cross-examination, the interrogator cannot tell the court what evidence he expects to bring forth; and to exclude evidence because such a showing is not made is destructive of the whole theory of cross-examination. For example, supposing the witness had been allowed to answer the question, and had replied: "Turn him loose; he will help us kill Jones"—the evidence would have much bearing upon the conduct and attitude of the deceased, who, according to the prosecution, was a peacemaker, but, who, according to the defense, was the active leader of the assaulting mob.

[3] The same witness, upon cross-examination, having testified that he saw Jones strike at a young man, who dodged by falling to the ground, and that he did not know him when he fell, but knew him as soon as he arose, was asked: "Did you not testify that you did not know the man until later, at the preliminary examination?" An objection was interposed, to the effect that if the question was "meant for impeachment no foundation has been laid," and the court sustained the objection. A misconception seems to exist upon the subject of the permissibility of inquiries such as this. To such a question the objection here stated is usually interposed, and usually the objection is sustained upon the ground that the question is intended to impeach, and being intended to impeach the "proper foundation" of time, place, circumstances, and persons present are not called to the attention of the witness. It is true that when a question is asked for the purpose of impeachment its "foundation" must be laid, to the end that the witness' attention may be called to every circumstance which will tend to refresh his memory and prevent him from falling into error. But it by no means follows that every such question is or is meant to be an impeaching question. Frequently such questions may be properly asked upon collateral matters, where the answer would bind the questioner, without right to impeach. Frequently they are designed to test the recollection of the witness, and frequently, as in the instance before us, the question is proper, though ultimately, and according to the answer which may be made to it, it will or will not be followed by a strictly impeaching question. Thus it was proper to ask the witness if he had so testified. His answer might have been that he did not, when an impeaching question would properly follow. His answer might have been that he did so testify, with explanation of the variance between his answers, in which case no impeaching question would be necessary; and it is an unwarranted curtailment of legitimate cross-examination to exclude such questions, as was here done, upon the ground that they are necessarily impeaching questions, and the proper foundation for them has not been laid. People v. Hart, 153 Cal. 261, 94 Pac. 1042.

[4] Upon the evidence and theory of the prosecution, when Jones fled the scene of his crime, and when, according to the evidence and theory of the defense, he made his retreat from the mob, he was carrying the baseball bat, and stopped for a few moments on the ball field 50 or 60 feet away from the place of the homicide. A witness for the defense, testifying that the defendant stood with the baseball bat in his hand, was asked: "What was he doing with the bat?" and answered: "Just standing there with the bat in his hand. Q. Over his shoulder, on the ground, or where was it?" The objection to this question was improperly sustained. It is insisted by the defense that the answer would have shown that defendant's attitude and the position in which he was holding the bat would have indicated that he was on the defensive, fearing further attack from the mob. In support of the ruling, it is said that, even if this were so, it was after the homicide, and would have been in the nature of a self-serving declaration. In other words, that defendant's conduct and actions could have been assumed and feigned. But the occurrence was, in point of time, too closely and intimately related with the main event to justify the exclusion of the evidence on this ground, and particularly so as the prosecution was relying upon the evidence of defendant's flight as indicative of his guilty mind. It was pertinent and proper, therefore, for the defense to show just what defendant did and how he did it, leaving it for the jury to say what motives and impulses were the actuating causes of his conduct.

[5, 6] A witness for the defense was asked if it was possible, "during the time the fight was in progress, for any man to leave that crowd and go a distance of 40 feet to first base and return with a bat, without your seeing him." The question was objected to as leading, and the objection was sustained. The question was addressed to the evidence offered on behalf of the people to the effect that the defendant had done just this thing. The question was not leading. A question is not a leading question, because it may be answered by "Yes" or "No," and even a leading question is frequently permissible. A leading question is one which suggests the answer desired; but leading questions are obnoxious only when there is manifestly an attempt to put answers upon material matters in the witness' mouth. That the question was important as negating the testimony of the prosecution is, of course, manifest.

[7] Upon the subject of manslaughter, the jury was instructed as follows: "You are instructed that under the information in this case the defendant may, if the evidence warrant, be convicted of manslaughter. This is defined by our statute to be the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, and is of two kinds: First, voluntary, upon a sudden quarrel or heat of passion; and, second, involuntary, in the commission of an unlawful act, which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, and without due cause and circumspection. To reduce a felonious homicide from the grade of murder to manslaughter, upon the ground of sudden quarrel or heat of passion, the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions, and it must appear that the party acted under the smart of this sudden passion and resentment. If, however, the provocation was of slight and trifling character, of such a nature as would not be calculated to arouse the passion, or if sufficient time had elapsed between the provocation and the fatal blow for passion to subside and reason to resume its empire, the offense will not be mitigated, but the slayer will be guilty of murder." This instruction was unobjectionable. People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476, 29 Pac. 26. The court then proceeded to give another instruction in the following language: "You are instructed that any trivial provocation which, in point of law, amounts to an assault, or even a blow, will not reduce the crime of the party killing from murder to manslaughter. For when the punishment inflicted for a slight transgression of any sort is outrageous in its nature, either in the manner of its continuance or beyond all proportion to the offense, it is rather to be considered as the effect of malice than of human frailty, and the crime will amount to murder, notwithstanding such provocation." This instruction is a garbled extract from a quotation from East's Pleas of the Crown, which quotation is employed argumentatively in People v. Bruggy to show the soundness of the instruction first above given, which instruction itself was given in the Bruggy Case. Besides, the fact to which this court is all too often compelled to call attention, that argumentative discussion by this court is not the proper subject-matter for instructions to juries (Davis v. Hearst, 116 Pac. 530, decided June 6, 1911), the instruction actually given in this case does violence even to the language quoted by this court. The language quoted was: "It must not, however, be understood that any trivial provocation which in point of law amounts to an assault, or even a blow, will, of course, reduce the crime of the party killing to manslaughter. This I know, has been supposed by some, but there is no authority for it in law." Here, it will be seen, that the discussion is addressed to the legal contention that an assault or a blow will, in point of law, as matter of course, reduce the crime to manslaughter, and the argument is advanced to show that, as matter of law, it will not do so, because it is not a matter of law, but a matter of fact for the jury in each case to determine, under the circumstances of the case whether the assault, or whether the blow, or whether the indignity, or whether the affront, or whatever the act may be, was such as is naturally calculated to arouse the passions, and so lessen the degree of the offense by relieving it from the element of malice. Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711. The instruction, as given, omits this all-important qualification, and instructs the jury, as a matter of law, that which has always been for them a matter of fact. It instructs them that an assault, or even a blow, will not reduce the crime of the party killing from murder to manslaughter. According to the circumstances, the assault or the blow may or may not be sufficient in the minds of the jury so to reduce the crime; but it is for the jury to determine this, and not for the court to declare such to be the law.

[8] As has been pointed out the defendant admittedly fled the scene of the homicide. By his testimony, he fled in ignorance that he had killed King, and to save himself from further attacks of the mob. The prosecution sought to have his flight associated with guilty knowledge that he had committed a crime, and the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that the flight of a person immediately after the commission of a crime, or after a crime has been committed with which he is charged, is a circumstance to be weighed by the jury as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt, and is entitled to more or less weight, according to the circumstances of the particular case. Evidence of flight is received, not as part of the res gestæ of the criminal act itself, but as indicative of a guilty mind; and, if you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant did try to escape by flight, it is a circumstance to be weighed by you as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt. It is not sufficient of itself to establish the guilt of the defendant; but the weight to which that circumstance is entitled is a matter for you to determine in connection with all other facts and circumstances called out in this case." This court has for a long time discountenanced the giving of such instructions, and has refused to reverse cases where they have been given only when it could be seen that the instruction as given was not prejudicial. Thus, where a defendant flees "immediately after the crime has been committed with which he knows he is charged," and the reason for his flight remains unexplained, this court has, in effect, said that it would not reverse cases for an instruction, in substance, declaring to the jury that this evidence can be by them considered and given such weight as they thought fit as tending to indicate a guilty mind. People v. Lem Deo, 132 Cal. 199, 64 Pac. 265. But this court, as has been said, has frowned upon the giving of any such instructions, because it is a clear invasion of the jury's province in weighing evidence, and may work much injury and prejudice to a defendant's case. The instruction here given is typical. In the first place, it omits the essential qualification that, where flight can be indicative of a guilty consciousness, the defendant must know that he is charged with the crime.

[9] But more important even than this, we have before us a case where the flight of the defendant was explained, where it was in evidence that he feared mob violence and fled to avoid it, and where it was in evidence that, when away from the mob he was called upon to surrender, he promptly did so. Here, certainly, it was for the jury to determine what prompted the flight, and if it was prompted by fear of mob violence, as defendant says, then no element of guilty consciousness entered therein. And yet the jury is told that if the defendant "did try to escape by flight" (a fact which was admitted) that that was a circumstance to be weighed as tending in some degree to prove a consciousness of guilt. Where flight is unexplained, the giving of such an instruction may be excused, though not justified, because it is within the power of the defendant to explain it, and he has not done so; but where the defendant has given a full explanation of his flight, it is for the jury to say whether that explanation is true or not, untrammelled by any instructions from the court to the effect that the evidence is to be weighed by them as indicative of guilt.

[10] The court instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that in determining the intention of the defendant at the time of the transaction complained of it is important to consider the means used to accomplish the killing. The intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense, and the sound mind and discretion of the accused. All persons are of sound mind who are neither idiots, nor lunatics, nor affected with insanity. A person is presumed to intend to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and must also be presumed to intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own acts. Therefore, if you are satisfied to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did assail, on the date mentioned, one George King, violently with a dangerous weapon, likely to kill, and which did in fact destroy the life of said George King, the natural presumption is that such assailant intended death or great bodily harm, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary this presumption must prevail." It is contended that this instruction does violence to the law, in that the law is that whenever a specific intent is an element of an offense no presumption of law can arise, and that the specific intent is a fact to be shown like any other fact in the case. People v. Landman, 103 Cal. 580, 37 Pac. 518; People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 295, 39 Pac. 622; People v. Flannelly, 128 Cal. 89, 60 Pac. 670. The rule of law is as appellant declares in all crimes saving that of murder. In the case of murder, the law has made provision peculiar to the crime. To the crime of murder, malice is an essential. (Pen. Code, §§ 187, 188); but by section 1105 of the Penal Code, when the homicide by the defendant has been proved, the murder is established, and, of course, to establish murder the malice must be established. We have thus, in our law, the peculiar situation touching murder that proof of the homicide alone establishes the crime, with its necessary ingredient of malice, and immediately the burden is transferred to the defendant of proving circumstances in mitigation to lessen the degree of the crime, or in justification or excuse show that no crime has been committed. Thus the effect of section 187 and of section 1105 of the Penal Code, construed together, is as though the law had expressly declared that, while murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, every killing is murder, unless the defendant proves the contrary. To illustrate this peculiarity of our law, reference may be made to People v. Knapp, 71 Cal. 1, 11 Pac. 793, where the subject is discussed. It is pointed out that in the state of New York there is no section corresponding to section 1105 of our Penal Code, and consequently no rule of evidence similar thereto. In New York, therefore, it is held that there is never a presumption of malice in the case of a homicide, and that an actual intent to kill must be shown affirmatively; whereas, by virtue of section 1105 of our Code, the existence of malice is presumptively proved by proof of the killing. So in People v. Kernaghan, 72 Cal. 613, 14 Pac. 568, this court distinguishes between murder of the second degree and manslaughter, quoting People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 96, to the following effect: "In the former cases [second degree murder], the slayer is presumed to be actuated by an intent which may not exist; in the latter [manslaughter], out of forbearance for the weakness of human nature, the slayer is presumed not to be actuated by an intent to kill, although such intent may in fact exist." But, wherever the crime falls short of homicide, even if it be the crime of assault with an intent to commit murder, this shifting of proof does not arise, and it is necessary for the prosecution to show as a fact the specific intent which is essential to the particular crime charged. Thus, in People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 Pac. 80, the charge was an assault with intent to commit murder. The jury was instructed, as here, that every person is presumed to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his act, and therefore, if the jury believed that the defendant did shoot "at said Henry Coffey as charged in the indictment, and that the natural and ordinary consequences of such shooting would be the death of said Henry Coffey, then the presumption of law is that the defendant so shooting did shoot at said Henry Coffey with intent to kill him." This court in condemning the instruction said: "In homicide cases, where the killing is proved, it rests on the defendant to show justification, excuse, or circumstances of mitigation, subject to the qualification that the benefit of the doubt is to be given to the prisoner; but this is because the statute expressly shifts the burden of proving circumstances in mitigation upon the defendant in homicide cases. The rule is confined to murder trials." People v. Cheong Foon Ark, 61 Cal. 527. See, also, People v. Gordon, 88 Cal. 422, 26 Pac. 502. As this was a case of homicide, it forms, as we have shown, an exception to the general rule that, where a specific intent is an essential element of a crime, the existence of that intent must be established as a fact. The instruction was therefore proper.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE by WEBB, Atty. Gen., v. CALIFORNIA SAFE DEPOSIT & TRUST CO. (HYLEN et al., Interveners). (S. F. 5,379.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 309*)—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES BETWEEN DEPOSITORS—CONTRACTS.

A corporation, doing both a savings bank and a commercial bank business, does not give its savings depositors a preferential lien over the commercial depositors by the provision in the books of the savings depositors, "The reserve fund, together with the guarantee capital and the assets of the corporation, shall form an absolute security to all depositors for their deposits and declared dividends. In consideration of the security thus afforded, each depositor * * * expressly waives all claim * * * on the individual stockholders * * * for any losses, and consents to look for * * * security solely to the guarantee capital, to the reserve funds and the assets of the corporation"; but its purpose is to work a waiver by the depositors of the stockholders' liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 309*)—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES BETWEEN DEPOSITORS—CONTRACTS.

Savings depositors of a corporation, doing both a savings bank and a commercial bank business, not being given by law any preferential lien over commercial depositors, an agreement therefor between the corporation and savings depositors, not known of and consented to by the commercial depositors, could not have that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 309*)—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES BETWEEN DEPOSITORS.

The provision of Civ. Code, § 573, "The capital stock and the assets of a savings and loan corporation are a security to depositors and stockholders, depositors having the priority of security over stockholders, but the by-laws may provide that the same security shall extend to deposits made by stockholders," does not give a preferential lien to savings depositors over commercial depositors, in the case of a corporation doing both a savings bank and a commercial bank business.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Liquidation proceeding by the People, by U. S. Webb, Attorney General, against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company. I. N. Hylen and another filed an intervening petition, which being denied, they appeal. Edward J. Le Breton, the receiver, being respondent. Affirmed.

H. W. Hutton, for appellants. J. V. de Laveaga and E. De Los Magee, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, being insolvent, its assets in the hands of a receiver and its affairs in process of liquidation, I. N. Hylen petitioned the court upon his own behalf as a savings depositor, and on behalf of others similarly situated, to have it declared that the savings depositors were entitled to have their claims paid in advance of the commercial depositors of the banking corporation. The court denied the petition, and this appeal is taken for the determination of this question.

It is conceded that the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company, under its articles of incorporation and by-laws, was entitled to do, and was in fact doing, both a savings bank and a commercial bank business, having depositors of both kinds. Appellants' contention is that the savings depositors acquired a preferential lien, first, by virtue of their contract with the bank, and, second, by virtue of the law. The asserted preferential lien of contract arises out of the seventh section of the contract printed in each savings depositor's bank book as follows: "Seventh. The reserve fund, together with the guarantee capital and the assets of the corporation, shall form an absolute security to all depositors for their deposits and declared dividends. In consideration of the security thus afforded, each depositor, by signing these conditions, expressly waives all claim—whether founded upon the statutes or upon the Constitution of this state—upon the individual stockholders of this corporation, or any of them; or his, her, or their heirs, executors or administrators for any losses, and consents to look for his or her security solely to the guarantee capital, to the reserve funds and assets of the corporation."

[1] Analyzing this section, it becomes apparent that all the preliminary part of it is mere words used to darken understanding. The purpose of the section is to work a waiver by the depositors of the stockholders' liability. The somewhat grandiose language to the effect that the reserve fund together with the guarantee capital and the assets of the corporation "shall form an absolute security to all depositors," really gave them nothing more than what the law accorded them. "Absolute security" is a high-sounding phrase, but "absolute," as here employed, has little meaning, and is apparently used merely as an impressive epithet. But whether "absolute" was designed to mean "sole," or "the entire," or "the total," or "all," or "adequate," or "only," it is not important to consider, though it may be said after scanning the last sentence where the declaration is that the depositor consents to look for his security solely to the guarantee capital, etc., that the idea really intended to be conveyed by the use of the word "absolute," would make it synonymous with "only" or "sole." But, viewing the section as a whole, it must be apparent that it does not, either in terms attempt to create, nor in law effect the creation of, any preferential lien in favor of savings depositors.

[2] Nor if the attempt were shown, could

it be given validity against commercial depositors in ignorance of, and not assenting thereto, for the effect would be as to such depositors to deprive them of their rights to a return of their own funds, or to their ratable share of the assets of the corporation, without knowledge of the secret lien attempted to be created by the bank in favor of another class.

[3] The contention that the law gives to savings depositors this preferential lien over the commercial depositors is by appellant declared to exist by virtue of section 573 of the Civil Code, to the following effect: "Sec. 573. * * * The capital stock and the assets of the corporation are a security to depositors and stockholders, depositors having the priority of security over the stockholders, but the by-laws may provide that the same security shall extend to deposits made by stockholders."

But while establishing liens and priority of liens, this section does not pretend to favor savings depositors over commercial depositors. It simply gives a preference to all depositors who are not stockholders over like depositors who are stockholders, with a provision that the same security may by the by-laws be extended to stockholding depositors. Such is the construction of the law unmistakably set forth in such cases as Murphy v. Pacific Bank, 119 Cal. 339, 51 Pac. 317; s. c., 130 Cal. 542, 62 Pac. 1059; Laidlaw v. Pacific Bank, 137 Cal. 392, 70 Pac. 277.

For these reasons the order appealed from is affirmed.

BENDER v. HUTTON, Presiding Judge of Superior Court. (S. F. 5,940.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1911.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 34*)—TO JUDGE—ORDER FOR SERVICE BY PUBLICATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 412, providing that where the person to be served resides out of the state, and the fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge, it or he may make an order for service of summons by publication, a judge may not, except where there has been a manifest abuse of discretion, be compelled by mandate to make such an order, where the affidavit, though formally sufficient, did not satisfy him as to the fact of residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

2. PROCESS (§ 96*)—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—APPLICATION—AFFIDAVIT.

A judge, who under Code Civ. Proc. § 412, may order service of summons by publication where the person to be served resides out of the state, and this fact appears by affidavit to his satisfaction, may refuse the order as not satisfied because the affidavit merely states that the last known address of defendant was and is a certain place in another state, and that defendant now resides there; and does not state the grounds on which affiant relies for his belief as to such residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 108-120; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

In Bank. Petition of Robert B. Bender for writ of mandate to George H. Hutton, Presiding Judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles. Denied.

E. M. Barnes, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate requiring a judge of the superior court to make an order for the publication of the summons in an action for divorce. The application for the order was based upon the ground that the defendant resided out of the state (Code Civ. Proc. § 412) and it was supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff alone, who merely deposed "That the last known address of said defendant was and is Clovis, New Mexico, and this defendant now resides at Clovis, New Mexico."

The judge refused to make the order, and it is said that his only ground for such refusal was—as stated by him—that the affidavit was insufficient to satisfy him that the residence of defendant was at Clovis, New Mexico, and this because it failed to state the grounds upon which the affiant relied for his belief that her residence was at that place.

[1] The petitioner cites in support of his petition certain cases in which this court has refused to set aside default judgments based upon summons by publication, in which it was contended that the orders for publication were made upon too slight evidence of the essential facts. It is true that this court has been extremely liberal in sustaining such judgments, but the principle of those decisions—as of many others involving similar considerations—is that in matters confided to the discretion of the trial courts or judges—where in other words, they are to act upon evidence satisfactory to them—their orders will not be invalidated when found to be supported by substantial evidence as to the essential facts. Upon the same principle, and a fortiori, we cannot compel those courts or judges to make orders in such matters where the evidence of essential facts—though formally sufficient—is not satisfactory to them, except in cases where there has been a manifest abuse of their discretion. There is a wide distinction between the affirmance of an order based upon slight evidence which has satisfied a judge and a peremptory mandate compelling him to make the same order upon similar evidence which has not satisfied him, and in the latter case especially it cannot be deemed an abuse of discretion to demand other and corroborative evidence which the party claiming relief may easily produce.

[2] When the plaintiff in an action pending in Los Angeles makes an affidavit that the defendant is now a resident of Clovis, N. M., the judge who is asked to make an order for the publication of summons for that reason may justly assume that the averment is based upon information derived from third parties, or upon the recollection of the affiant as to the former residence of the defendant at a time more or less recent, or upon the receipt of letters, or upon other circumstances from which the fact of present abode may be reasonably inferred. He is entirely justified, therefore, in requiring a statement of the grounds of the affiant's belief in order to determine whether they are sufficient to satisfy the mind and conscience of a reasonable man that the fact is as alleged. This involves no hardship to the plaintiff, for in making his showing he is not limited to his own affidavit, and if he or his witnesses have good grounds for their belief it will always be easy to state them, and if they have not he has no right to the order. The practice, therefore, of requiring reasonably strict proof of the place of residence of the defendant when publication of summons is sought upon the ground that he resides out of the state, so far from deserving reproof is much to be commended. It is certain that a more general observance of it would have spared the courts of this state much trouble and some painful doubts as to the validity of default judgments by which important rights have been foreclosed without a hearing of the parties interested.

The writ of mandate is denied.

BROOK v. CITY OF OAKLAND.
(S. F. 5,895.)(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 31, 1911.)1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 290*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 407*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—HEARING ON EXTENT OF ASSESSMENT DISTRICT FOR SEWER.

Act Feb. 13, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 40), conferring on a city council power to create a sewer district for special taxation for payment of a sewer to be constructed therein, without any provision for persons interested having a hearing on the question of limits of the district, and the exclusion of their property therefrom, if found not benefited, the only hearing vouchsafed them being one, under Pol. Code, §§ 3673-3682, before the city board of equalization, as to their property having been properly valued, contravenes the provision of the Constitution against taking property without due process.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 859*)—REPEAL—INCONSISTENT ACTS.

Act Feb. 13, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 40), as to sewer districts in cities, if conflicting with St. 1891, p. 84, as to the limit of indebtedness a city may incur for public improvements, to that extent repeals the earlier statute.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 954*)—MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS—INTEREST ON OBLIGATIONS.

The provision of the charter of Oakland, limiting the rate of interest on obligations of the city incurred for acquiring or constructing municipal works, applies only to works undertaken by the city itself as a municipal corporation, and not to local improvements made within a special assessment district to be paid for by taxation of the property in the district.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by F. W. S. Brook against the City of Oakland. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied in bank; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Reed, Black & Reed, for appellant. Ben F. Woolner (Snook & Church, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and others as taxpayers within a certain part of the city of Oakland, described as Sewer District No. 1, to enjoin the issuance and sale of certain bonds of the city of Oakland to be paid by a special tax upon the property within the district. Defendant had judgment in the court below, and the plaintiff appeals.

The bonds have been authorized by proceedings taken under the act of February 13, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 40), providing for the creation of sewer districts in cities, the construction of sewers therein, the issuing of bonds to raise the funds necessary for the construction thereof, and the payment of such bonds. The plaintiff claims that this act is unconstitutional.

The act provides that the city council of any city may from time to time create, within such city, separate sewer districts, whenever it may be necessary or convenient in the judgment of the council for the proper sanitation of such district to construct a sewer therein, and may provide for the issuing of bonds to pay the cost of such sewer. The proposition to issue bonds must be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors of the district created, and they can only be issued when authorized by the votes of two-thirds of all the votes cast at such election. When issued, the bonds are to be paid by means of taxes levied and assessed upon the property within the district, the same to be levied, assessed, and collected in the same manner and at the same time as other taxes for municipal purposes are levied, assessed, and collected. The act contains no provision whatever for any notice or hearing upon the question of the limits of the sewer district. No property owner is given any opportunity to be heard upon the question whether the proposed sewer will benefit his property, or the question whether his property should be included in the district to be taxed for its construction. The only hearing vouchsafed to him is the hearing with respect to the regular annual valuation of his property by the city assessor before the city board of equalization under sections 3673 to 3682 of the Political Code, which the city charter makes applicable to assessments for city purposes. At such hearing he would be permitted to show that his property was not subject to taxation for general city purposes, or that the valuation was too high, but there is no provision allowing him to show at that hearing that it was not benefited by the sewer, or that it should not have been included within the sewer district, or that it was not benefited in the same proportion as other property of like value.

[1] 1. If, under the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of his property except by due process of law, it is not within the power of the Legislature to confer upon a city council, or other local body, the authority to create local assessment districts for taxation to pay for local improvements, without some provision for notice to the persons interested and a hearing upon the question of the limits of the district and the exclusion of their property therefrom, if it is found not to be benefited thereby, then the act in question is unconstitutional and void. It clearly does not provide for such notice or hearing.

The Constitution of California provides that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. Article I, § 13. This is also declared by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The question whether or not this act operates to deprive persons of property without due process of law is therefore a federal question, upon which the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are the controlling authority.

It is thoroughly settled by the decisions of that court that the Legislature itself has the power to fix by statute the limits of a local taxing district, such as the sewer districts contemplated by this act, without a formal notice or hearing, and that, when it has done so, the courts will not inquire into the matter of a hearing before the Legislature, nor into the legislative decision as to the property benefited and properly included in the district, but will regard that determination as final and conclusive. These decisions were recently reviewed and followed upon this point by this court in People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 386, 103 Pac. 214, wherein it is said: "Where the Legislature has itself spoken in the creation of a district such as this, and, where the legislative determination may be deemed to depend on a question of fact, it is conclusively presumed that the Legislature took evidence in its determination, and the decision which it has reached will not be subject to review by the courts." The opinion quotes the following from Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 174, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 69, 41 L. Ed. 369: "The Legislature, when it fixes the district itself, is supposed to have made proper inquiry, and to have finally and conclusively determined the fact of the benefits to the land included in the district, and the citizen has no constitutional right to any other or further hearing upon that question. The right which he thereafter has is to a hearing upon the question of what is termed the apportionment of the tax; i. e., the amount of the tax which he is to pay." Accordingly it was held in the Sacramento Drainage District Case that the statute there involved was not rendered void by reason of the fact that it did not provide for a hearing with respect to the limits of the district to be taxed, but arbitrarily fixed it by the terms of the act itself.

Upon the converse question of the right to and the necessity for a hearing where the Legislature does not itself fix the bounds of the assessment district, but commits such determination to some local tribunal, the city council in this case, the decisions of that court are equally decisive to the effect that at some stage in the proceedings the landowner must be accorded a hearing upon the question whether or not his land is benefited by the proposed public improvement, in order to constitute due process of law. In the Fallbrook Case the court, after the passage above quoted, proceeded to discuss this phase of the question, saying: "But when, as in this case, the determination of the question of what lands shall be included in the district is only to be decided after a decision as to what lands described in the petition shall be benefited, and the decision of that question is submitted to some tribunal (the board of supervisors in this case), the parties whose lands are thus included in the petition are entitled to a hearing upon the question of benefits, and to have the lands excluded if the judgment of the board be against their being benefited. Unless the Legislature decide the question of benefits itself, the landowner has the right to be heard upon that question before his property can be taken." In Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 8 Sup. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763, the Legislature had declared in the act that certain lands were benefited and should be taxed for the improvement. The court held this determination conclusive upon the courts, but added that, if the determination is committed to commissioners, the landowners "may be entitled to notice and hearing upon the question whether their lands are benefited and how much." In Parsons v. District of Columbia, 170 U. S. 52, 18 Sup. Ct. 524, 42 L. Ed. 943, the court said: "Where the Legislature has submitted these questions for inquiry to a commission, or to official persons to be appointed under municipal ordinances or regulations, the inquiry becomes in its nature judicial in such a sense that the property owner is entitled to a hearing, or to a notice and an opportunity to be heard." In Londoner v. Denver, 210 U. S. 385, 28 Sup. Ct. 714, 52 L. Ed. 1103, the latest decision of the United States Supreme Court upon the subject, the court says: "Where the Legislature of a state, instead of fixing the tax itself, commits to some subordinate body the duty of determining whether, in what amount and upon whom it shall be levied, and of making its assessment and apportionment, due process of law requires that at some stage of the proceedings before the tax becomes irrevocably fixed, the taxpayer shall have an opportunity to be heard, of which he must have notice, either personal, by publication, or by a law fixing the time and place of the hearing."

What is meant by these statements is illustrated by the two cases of Voigt v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 115, 22 Sup. Ct. 337, 46 L. Ed. 459, and Goodrich v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 432, 22 Sup. Ct. 397, 46 L. Ed. 627. The statute of Michigan authorized the common council of a city to assess the whole, or a part, of the cost of opening a new street upon the property of the district benefited thereby, the limits of which were to be fixed by the council. No hearing was provided at or before the passage of the resolution fixing the limits of the district and declaring the amount to be raised by assessment upon the property situated within it. But after thus fixing the bounds of the district and the amount to be raised the council was required to apportion said amount upon each parcel of property in the district in proportion to the benefits accruing thereto from the opening of the street, and another provision of the statute provided that there must be a hearing, or a notice and opportunity for a hearing, upon this assessment, before it could be confirmed or enforced. The Supreme Court of Michigan had held that no separate notice or separate hearing upon the questions of the bounds of the district and the amount to be charged thereon was necessary. It seems that it was also of the opinion that the hearing upon the assessment did not authorize an inquiry into the question of whether the lands within the district were or were not benefited, for it said: "It is very clear that the Legislature itself might have established the special assessment district. Had it seen fit to do so, would it be claimed that its right to do so could be questioned as unconstitutional, because no notice was given to the property holders affected thereby that it was intended to establish such a district? If the answer to this question should be in the negative, why, when the Legislature has delegated to the common council of the city the right to establish the special district, should it be said that the law delegating this power is unconstitutional because notice is not required? The establishment of the special assessment district, in the one instance by the Legislature, and in the other instance by the common council, is the exercise of a legislative power, with which the courts will not ordinarily interfere." Voigt v. Detroit, 123 Mich. 552, 82 N. W. 255. Upon this last question, the Supreme Court of the United States did not agree with the Michigan court. It held that the hearing upon the assessment was in effect a hearing upon the whole question, and that at that hearing inquiry must be allowed not only as to the proper proportion charged upon the respective tracts of land, but also upon the question whether any particular tract was benefited at all and should not be excluded from the district, notwithstanding the resolution of the council including it. Upon this construction only did it hold the assessment valid. In the Voigt Case, upon this point, that court said: "He is given a thoroughly efficient opportunity to be heard to test the legality of the charge upon him. And it is only with the charge upon him that he is concerned, and of that alone he can complain. In the legality of that charge is necessarily involved the legality of all which precedes it and of which it is the consequence. The Supreme Court of the state decided, as we have seen, 'that the amount of the taxes which may be assessed upon the district or upon any given parcel of land cannot exceed the benefits.' On the hearing given, therefore, the property owner can show a violation of the rule, if a violation there be, and the showing will take his land out of the district and relieve it from the tax." 184 U. S. 122, 22 Sup. Ct. 340 (46 L. Ed. 459). (The italics are ours.) In the Goodrich Case, 184 U. S. page 440, 22 Sup. Ct. 400, 46 L. Ed. 627, speaking to the same point, the court said: "Upon such hearing the property owner may insist that his property was not benefited to the amount assessed, or that it was not benefited at all, and thus obtain every advantage which he might obtain were he informed of every step of the proceedings. The terms of the resolution that each lot be assessed 'in accordance with the amount of benefits derived from such improvements,' open the whole question of the amount of benefit derived by the lot, even to showing that no benefit whatever was occasioned by the improvement. It does not follow, however, that he had a right to be heard upon the extent of the territory to be embraced within the assessment district." The last sentence of this quotation is apparently addressed to the claim that the owner was entitled to a separate hearing upon the extent of the district.

The opinions in the Detroit cases say nothing upon the point that the exercise of a legislative power should be held as effective and conclusive when it is exercised by a local body to which it is delegated, as when it is exercised by the Legislature itself. But there is no uncertainty in their effect. They determine positively that when a local improvement is to be paid for by a tax assessed upon a local assessment district, embracing only territory benefited by the improvement, and the determination of the bounds of the district and, consequently, of the property to be assessed, is delegated by the statute to a subordinate body, such as a city council, the constitutional requirement of due process of law is not fulfilled, unless there is provided a notice and an opportunity to be heard to the property owner, upon the question whether or not his property is in fact benefited by the improvement, and whether or not it shall be, in effect, excluded from the district, although within its territorial limits.

No inquiry of this character is provided or contemplated by the provisions of the Political Code for the equalization of taxes. The Constitution and Statutes of this state have conclusively determined what property is subject to general taxation and where it is to be taxed. The provisions of the Political Code referred to concern general taxation only. The inquiry of the board of equalization is confined to the question of the proportionate valuation of the respective parcels of property taxable by law within the territory concerned. It may, of course, determine whether or not a particular parcel or article of property is situated within the city, but, if the decision is that it is so situated, it can enter into no inquiry upon the question whether or not it is benefited by the uses to which the money raised by the taxation is to be applied. The act of February 13, 1911, does not purport to confer any special authority upon the board of equalization with respect to the sewer district tax or the property benefited thereby. That board has nothing to do with the question of benefits.

It may be, as was said in Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 13 Sup. Ct. 750, 37 L. Ed. 637, that the constitutional provision requiring due process of law is, in effect, automatically incorporated into every statute, so far as may be necessary to give it validity, and that, in view of this consideration, the city council, under the statute and the Constitution taken together, might have passed a valid resolution creating such sewer district, by itself providing for and giving a reasonable notice fixing a time and allowing an opportunity to each property owner to be heard on the question of benefits to his property, before the resolution creating the district was passed. It is not necessary to pass upon this question, for no such notice or hearing was given or had before the council, or at all. In view of later decisions, it is doubtful if the Paulsen Case would now be followed by the Supreme Court of the United States. For the reason that we have given, and upon the authority of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States above cited, we can come to no other conclusion than that the resolution creating the district in question is invalid and that the bonds proposed to be issued will be void, for the reason that the property owners will be deprived of their property to the extent of the taxes they may be compelled to pay if the proceedings are carried out, without due process of law, in that they will be afforded no opportunity to be heard with respect to the question whether or not their property is benefited by the sewer and was therefore properly included in the district to be taxed.

We have thought it proper to raise and consider this objection, although it is not discussed or presented in the briefs of counsel. We understand that this case is brought here with a view of obtaining a decision of this court as to the validity of the bonds, preparatory to and as a foundation for a sale of the bonds. Bond buyers who were properly advised would probably refuse to purchase these bonds, although we should hold that the other objections were unfounded and affirm the judgment without mentioning this objection. It is not desirable that unwary buyers should be induced to purchase them on the faith of a decision which failed to consider a fatal objection to their validity.

[2] 2. It is claimed that the bonds are invalid because the statute provides that the city of Oakland shall not be responsible for the payment of the bonds. This position appears to be founded on the theory that the bonds should be obligations of the city of Oakland. The theory of the statute is that of a local improvement to be paid for by an assessment raised upon the property of the district benefited thereby. Such bonds do not become obligations of the city in which the district may be situated. Meyer v. S. F., 150 Cal. 131, 88 Pac. 722, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 110; Union T. Co. v. State, 154 Cal. 716, 99 Pac. 183, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1111. We know of no constitutional provision requiring that the city should become liable thereon and none is cited to us.

[3] 3. Another objection is that the act of 1911 conflicts with the provision of the act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 84) to the effect that no city shall incur an indebtedness for public improvements exceeding 15 per cent. of the assessed value of the taxable property therein. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to say that the bonds herein involved are authorized by the act of 1911, and that, if that act is in conflict with the provision of the act of 1891, the first statute is, to that extent, repealed by the later one.

[4] 4. The objection that the rate of interest upon the bonds allowed by the statute is not in conformity with the provision of the charter of the city of Oakland concerning interest is answered by what we have heretofore said to the effect that these bonds are not the obligations of the city of Oakland, but are obligations imposed upon a certain district to be assessed for the payment thereof. Section 149 of the charter of the city of Oakland, to which this point refers, limiting the rate of interest upon obligations of the city incurred for the purpose of acquiring or constructing municipal works to five per cent. per annum, applies only to obligations of the city for works undertaken by the city itself as a municipal corporation. It has no application whatever to local improvements made within a special assessment district and payable out of funds raised by taxation thereon.

[5] 5. Another objection is that the act does not provide that the bonds issued under it shall mature within 40 years from their date, and that this is a violation of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. The provision of the act on this subject is that the bonds "shall be payable in the following manner: a part to be determined by the legislative body of the municipality, which part shall not be less than one-fortieth part of the whole amount of such indebtedness, shall be payable each and every year on a day and date, and at a place within the United States, to be fixed by the legislative body of the city, town or municipal corporation issuing the said bonds, and designated in such bonds." Section 4. Conceding, for the purposes of the case, that the constitutional provision applies to bonds of a local assessment district, its effect upon the act would be to make it void so far as it purported to authorize the issuance of bonds maturing more than 40 years from the time of contracting the same, leaving it in full force with respect to an issue of bonds maturing within such period, if it was otherwise valid. It does not appear from the record that the proposed bonds are to run longer than 40 years, and hence this question is not presented. We do not deem it necessary even to determine whether or not the language of the act, as above quoted, would authorize an issue of bonds payable more than 40 years after they were contracted. Its terms are not positive and express and, as we have declared the act invalid for the reasons first discussed, it is unnecessary to go further. If future legislation is attempted on the subject, different expressions may be substituted. We remark, however, that further legislation seems unnecessary. The provisions of the Vrooman act, authorizing the construction of sewers in cities, to be paid for by special assessments upon the property within a district fixed by the city council, would enable the persons interested to construct the desired sewer, substantially in the manner attempted to be provided for in the act of 1911, and the Vrooman act makes proper provision for a hearing before the council as to the extent of the assessment district, before it is formed.

Upon the point first discussed we think the court erred in holding the bonds valid.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte HUGHES. (Cr. 1,649.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1911.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 177*)—DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT—DISCHARGE OF PRISONER.

Under Pen. Code, § 1008, providing that the allowance of demurrer to an information is a bar to further prosecution, unless the court directs a new information to be filed, an order allowing a demurrer and reciting that the court was of the "opinion that a new information should be filed," being an exercise of judicial authority, was good, and did not entitle the defendant to a discharge, even though the minutes only gave leave to file another information.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 313-319; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

In Bank. Application by John Hughes for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed against W. F. Sibley, sheriff of San Joaquin county. Writ refused.

A. H. Carpenter, for petitioner. Max Grim, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The petitioner shows: That the minute order of the superior court sustaining his demurrer to the information was in the following language: "The demurrer of the defendant to the information on file herein having been heretofore argued and submitted to the court for its decision, it is by the court ordered that the demurrer to the information be, and the same is, hereby sustained, and leave is granted to the district attorney to file another information." That upon the presentation of a second information his motion to quash, annul, and set it aside, was denied. Wherefore he has sued out this writ, contending that the second information was filed against him, and is being prosecuted against him without authority of law. Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499; People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 Pac. 490.

The return to this writ, however, shows that the minute order here assailed did not correctly set forth the order which the court actually made in the premises, and that the order actually made was in substantial conformity to the provisions of section 1008 of the Penal Code. The minute order, as entered, omitted a very essential feature of the order which the court actually made, to the effect that it (the court) was of the "opinion that a new information should be filed, which would do away with the objection and be sufficient in all respects." Here was the exercise of the judicial power, which, as has been said, the law contemplates the court—and not the district attorney—should make. This judicial power having in fact been exercised by the court, a substantial compliance with the statute is shown.

The writ is therefore discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. But I wish to suggest to the court below that it should correct its minutes, so that they may show the order directing the filing of a new information.

SLOSS, J. I concur in the judgment. The ruling of the court seems to be based upon a supposed distinction between this case and Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499. I do not, however, see that there is any substantial difference between the orders in the two cases. I think that too strict a rule of construction was applied in the Williams Case, and I should prefer to have the court expressly overrule that case, rather than attempt to distinguish it upon insufficient grounds.

MORRISSEY et al. v. GRAY et al. (Sac. 1,825.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 587*)—FORECLOSURE—PERSONS CONCLUDED—MINORS' INTEREST—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Where a mortgaged homestead was set apart to the widow and eight minor children, the interest of each child could not be affected by foreclosure without service on them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1685-1688; Dec. Dig. § 587.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 587*)—FORECLOSURE—MINORS' INTEREST—CONVEYANCE.

Where a mortgaged homestead was set apart to a widow and minor children, and the mortgage was sought to be foreclosed by a service on the widow as administratrix only, and not on the children, their interest was not affected either by a sheriff's deed to the purchaser or by deeds executed by the purchaser to others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 587.*]

3. JUDGES (§ 47*)—DISQUALIFICATION—PRIOR ACTS OF ATTORNEY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 3, disqualifies a judge to act in any action or proceeding, where in any previous action or proceeding involving any of the same issues he has been attorney or counsel for either party. Held, that where defendant G., prior to his elevation to the bench, had prepared a widow's petition for letters of administration on her husband's estate, he was not thereby disqualified from sitting as judge in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on property belonging to the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 214-223; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 441*)—ACTIONS—SERVICE—RETURN.

A return of service personally by delivery to M. of a copy of the summons attached to a copy of the complaint did not show service on M. as administratrix of her deceased husband's estate, but only as an individual.

5. PROCESS (§ 164*)—SERVICE—JURISDICTION—RIGHT TO AMEND.

Jurisdiction is obtained from the existence of the fact of proper service of process, and not from the proof of the fact by the return of service or otherwise.

6. PROCESS (§ 164*)—SERVICE—RETURN—AMENDMENT.

Since amendments of a return necessary to show proper service affect the record, they may not be made as of course, but only on leave of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-248; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

7. PROCESS (§ 164*)—AMENDMENT—PERMISSION TO AMEND.

Amendment of a return of service of process will not be allowed when its effect is to avoid a judgment to render it erroneous or subject to reversal; such amendments being permitted only in support of a judgment actually given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-248; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

8. PROCESS (§ 164*)—AMENDMENT—OBJECTION—LAPSE OF TIME—EXPIRATION OF OFFICE.

Mere lapse of time or the fact that the officer making a return of service is, at the time of a proposed amendment, out of office does not affect the court's right to order the amendment of the return so as to make it speak the truth.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-248; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

9. JUDGES (§ 42*)—DISQUALIFICATION—INTEREST.

A judge who had purchased certain real estate under mortgage foreclosure proceedings, which were defective in that the return of service was improper, was disqualified to grant leave to the officer to amend the return.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 190-200; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

10. PROCESS (§ 141*)—RETURN—CONCLUSIVE-NESS—CORRECTION.

A mortgage on property having been foreclosed pursuant to a defective return of service, the property was conveyed by the purchaser to a judge of the superior court, and, on its being subsequently discovered that the return of service was defective, the judge directed the officer to amend his return to conform to the truth. Held that, though such order was invalid because of disqualification of the judge to make it, such fact did not prevent the court, presided over by another judge, in a subsequent action to quiet title, from taking testimony to establish the fact that service was actually made and granting leave to file an amended return of service or, without the filing of such amended return, sustaining the judgment of foreclosure on proof of due service.

11. QUIETING TITLE (§ 44*)—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

Where, after foreclosure of a mortgage on property a part of which was the homestead of a widow and minor children, it was conveyed by the purchaser at the sale to a judge of the superior court, the fact that he thereupon took a deed from the widow and minor children of all their interest in the property, and as a part of the same transaction immediately conveyed to the widow all the land affected by the homestead, was not indicative of fraud on his part; it appearing that neither he nor his subsequent grantees claimed any rights to the property under such deeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

12. QUIETING TITLE (§ 52*)—JUDGMENT.

Where an action was instituted to quiet plaintiffs' title to a 300-acre tract of land, certain of which had been sold in parcels, the court properly gave separate judgments touching the rights of the separate defendants.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; E. P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by T. E. Morrissey and others against John C. Gray and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Morrissey, for appellants. Mr. Carlin, Charles Gray, and A. E. Boynton, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The action is to quiet title. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial. In July, 1887, Timothy Morrissey died intestate. He left surviving him Johanna Morrissey, his widow, and eight minor children. His estate consisted of a ranch of 300 acres, which was community property, incumbered by a mortgage to one Moses Wick. The widow was appointed administratrix of the estate, her petition for appointment being signed by Gray & Sexton, attorneys at law, the firm consisting of Warren Sexton and John C. Gray, defendant and respondent herein. In March, 1888, upon petition, a parcel of the ranch, consisting of about 50 acres, was by the court set apart to the widow and minor children as a homestead. In January, 1891, defendant John C. Gray became judge of the superior court of Butte county, and, saving for an interval of a few months, which interval has no bearing upon the matters here involved, has continued in that judgeship ever since. Warren Sexton acted as attorney for the administratrix. Efforts were made from time to time, but without result, to sell the incumbered ranch, and finally, in April, 1892, when the mortgage promissory note was about to expire by limitation, action of foreclosure was brought against the widow, all the children, and the administratrix of Timothy Morrissey's estate. Admittedly none of the children was served in this action. Johanna Morrissey, the widow, was served; whether in her individual or representative capacity is a question for future consideration. Suffice it here to say that she made default, that her default as administratrix was entered, and in due course a decree of foreclosure was made and given. The decree recited the service upon "Johanna Morrissey, administratrix of the estate of Timothy Morrissey, deceased," the entering of her default for nonappearance, and the decree found the amount due under the terms of the note and mortgage, and that the estate of Timothy Morrissey was liable for the whole thereof. It then proceeded in regular form to foreclose against Johanna Morrissey, administratrix, and the estate of Timothy Morrissey, deceased. Defendant John C. Gray was judge in the foreclosure proceeding and signed the decree. The land was sold under order of sale, and the plaintiff in the foreclosure action, Charles F. Wick, became the purchaser and received his certificate of sale in 1893. No redemption was attempted. The sheriff in February, 1894, executed his deed to the purchaser. On the day when Wick so received the sheriff's deed, he, in turn, executed his deed, transferring all the land to the defendant John C. Gray, and here, for the first time, defendant John C. Gray appears as having any interest in the land. Judge Gray immediately made his conveyance to Johanna Morrissey of the 50 acres of the ranch covered by the homestead, and remained in possession of the other lands until subsequently when he sold 80 acres thereof, which 80 acres, by mesne conveyance, have passed to the ownership of defendant W. P. Hammon. After defendant Gray conveyed the homestead premises to Johanna Morrissey, she sold a portion thereof to the defendants Blackwood and Higgins. Their rights thereto were tried in this action, together with the rights of defendant Gray. The rights of defendant Hammon were separately tried, and are the subject of a separate appeal.

[1] The probate homestead having been set apart to the widow and eight minor children, each child's interest was an undivided one-sixteenth thereof. Those interests, of course, could not be foreclosed without service upon the minors, and admittedly no such service was had. The rights of the elder children seem to have been forfeited by their laches after attaining majority. The plaintiffs are the three youngest minors who, having attained majority, prosecute this action to quiet their title to all of the ranch, including the homestead 50 acres. [2] The homestead rights of the minors not having been concluded by the foreclosure and sale, the sheriff's deed to Wick did not affect or impair those rights, and Wick's deed, in turn, to Gray did not and could not include those rights. Gray's deed to Johanna Morrissey, for the same reason, was abortive as to those rights, and so also was Johanna Morrissey's deed to defendants Blackwood and Higgins. In recognition of this, as to the defendants Blackwood and Higgins, the court decreed to plaintiffs each a one-sixteenth interest in the land claimed by them. The soundness of this decree was recognized, defendants Blackwood and Higgins compounded and settled their differences with the plaintiffs, and do not appear on this appeal. This appeal is directed against the court's decree confirming title to the lands claimed by defendant Gray, which lands, it is to be borne in mind, do not include, and form no part of, the homestead.

[3] It is contended that the decree in foreclosure, through which the defendant Gray deraigns title, is void because the Wick mortgage was drawn by defendant Gray, and because defendant Gray, as attorney, signed the widow's petition for letters of administration and afterward sat as trial judge in the foreclosure action. The fact that the defendant Gray as an attorney at law and before his elevation to the bench drew the mortgage contract which was subsequently brought to suit before him is without significance. His only connection with the estate of Timothy Morrissey as an attorney at law was in procuring for the widow letters of administration. In no other matter does he appear to have acted. Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 3, prescribes the disqualification of a judicial officer to act "in the action or proceeding, or in any previous action or proceeding involving any of the same issues, when he has been attorney or counsel for either party." The only action or proceeding in which defendant Gray participated in the matter of the estate was the proceeding to secure letters of administration for the widow. It cannot be successfully argued that there is any legal or ethical relationship between this proceeding and the proceeding to foreclose a mortgage subsequently brought against the estate. Not only was there no kinship between the proceedings, but the issues in the two matters were equally separate and distinct.

[4] Appellants make a further contention that the foreclosure judgment is void, which contention grows out of the following facts:

The original return of service of summons in the foreclosure action was as follows: "Sheriff's Office, Oroville, County of Butte—ss.: I hereby certify that I received the within summons on the 17th day of April, A. D. 1893, and personally served the same on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1893, by delivery to Johanna Morrissey a copy of said summons, attached to a copy of the complaint, personally in the county of Butte; and that upon orders from plaintiff's attorney, none of the other defendants were served. Dated, this 19th day of April, 1893. R. A. Anderson, Sheriff, by T. A. Atchison, Deputy. Filed, April 19th, 1893. C. L. Stilson, Clerk."

This return, of course, afforded no evidence of a service upon Johanna Morrissey as administratrix of the estate. But it is to be remembered, as above stated, that the complaint appropriately charged the estate and her as administratrix thereof, the summons was directed to her as administratrix of the estate, and the decree in terms foreclosed through her as administratrix of the estate the interest of the estate of Timothy Morrissey in the land. This condition of the record having been discovered apparently in June, 1895, the following proceedings were had: T. A. Atchison, the deputy sheriff who made service, testified that his return was defective, and did not state the facts of service. Thereupon the judge ordered that the return of service of summons be corrected to show the truth, and that the return be filed nunc pro tunc as of April 19, 1893. This order was made by defendant Gray as judge of the superior court. Thereupon the sheriff filed the following: "Return of Service of Summons. Sheriff's Office, Oroville, County of Butte—ss.: Under and by virtue of an order of the superior court aforesaid, duly made on motion of Warren Sexton, attorney for plaintiff, made and entered the 22nd day of June, 1895, I hereby make the following corrected return of service of summons in said action, to wit: I hereby certify that I received the within annexed summons on the 17th day of April, 1893, and personally served the same upon Johanna Morrissey, as administratrix of the estate of Timothy Morrissey, deceased, one of the within named defendants, by delivering to and leaving with the said defendant, personally, in Butte county, state of California, the 19th day of April, 1893, a copy of said summons attached to a copy of the complaint in said action, and that order of the plaintiffs' attorney, none of the other within named defendants were served with summons or complaint. Dated at Oroville, Cal., June 22, 1895. [Signed] R. A. Anderson, Sheriff, by T. A. Atchison, Deputy." This order was made and this amended return filed when defendant Gray claimed ownership of the lands under the foreclosure decree. Upon the trial of this cause the court ruled that Judge Gray was disqualified from making the order in question by reason of his interest, and that the order permitting the filing of the amended return was therefore void. But the court itself took the testimony of the deputy sheriff, Atchison, and upon that testimony permitted the filing of the amended return, and decreed its sufficiency to show jurisdiction obtained over the administratrix. Appellants' contention is that this ruling and this determination were erroneous, that the return was complete in itself and not susceptible of amendment, either before Judge Gray or before the trial court in this action. The argument herein is that a court will not, after a judgment has become final, allow an amendment to a return which will vary, impair, or destroy the judgment actually given; that by the return it is shown that jurisdiction was acquired over Johanna Morrissey only as an individual, and not in her representative capacity as administratrix; and that the only judgment which the court could and did render was a judgment foreclosing such rights in the property as Johanna Morrissey possessed in her personal and not in her representative capacity.

[5] It is the fact of proper service, and not the proof of the fact, which gives to a court jurisdiction. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146. Therefore, when the facts conferring jurisdiction exist, but the record of them by way of return is defective, great liberality is allowed by the courts in permitting amended returns to be filed.

[6] But, as these amendments affect the record, they may not be made as matter of course, but under permission of the court in the exercise of its sound discretion. Scruggs v. Scruggs, 46 Mo. 271.

[7] Such amendments, however, are not permitted when their effect would be to avoid a judgment, to render it erroneous, or subject it to reversal. Chicago Planing Mill Co. v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 97 Ill. 294; White River Bank v. Downer, 29 Vt. 332.

The amendments are permitted in support of the judgment actually given. The amendment is not designed or permitted to change or impair a decision or judgment, but is permitted only to support such decision and judgment by the new evidence. Petition of Lake, Deputy Sheriff, 15 R. I. 628, 10 Atl. 653.

[8] Mere lapse of time or the fact that the officer making the return is at the time of the proposed amendment out of office does not affect the right of the court to order the return to speak the truth. Petition of Lake, supra; Scruggs v. Scruggs, supra; Shenandoah Valley R. R. Co. v. Ashby's Trustees, 86 Va. 232, 9 S. E. 1003, 19 Am. St. Rep. 898; Briggs v. Hodgdon, 78 Me. 514, 7 Atl. 387; Wilkins v. Tourtellott, 28 Kan. 825; Luttrell v. Martin, 112 N. C. 593, 17 S. E. 573; Herman v. Santee, 103 Cal. 519, 37 Pac. 509, 42 Am. St. Rep. 145; Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108. In Jones v. Gunn, 149 Cal. 687, 87 Pac. 577, defendants claimed title under a purchase at foreclosure sale. In an action to quiet title subsequently brought—a proceeding very similar to the one here at bar—when reliance was sought to be placed on the judgment roll in the foreclosure proceedings, it was discovered that the return of service was unsigned. The sheriff during whose term of office service had been made was no longer in office. Yet the deputy sheriff who actually made the service was permitted to testify to the fact of service, the trial court allowed the amendment to be made in accordance with the fact, twelve years after, and ordered it filed nunc pro tunc as of the date when actual service had been made. The action of the trial court was upheld, and it was by this court declared that it was immaterial whether an amended return of service was filed or not because “the court had the unquestioned right to take evidence upon the fact of the service, since upon this fact, and not upon the return, the jurisdiction of the court in foreclosure depended, and if it found the fact of service to exist, as here it did, then to admit the judgment roll in evidence regardless of the defective return of service.”

We do not understand that appellant seriously questions any of the foregoing principles. Indeed, so well settled are they that argument against them would be futile. Appellant, however, contends that the court has no power to modify or vary the judgment actually given, and, as we understand his argument, to allow an amended return to be filed is, in effect, a modification of the judgment. Herein reliance is placed upon such cases as Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 Pac. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226, and Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 55, 65 Pac. 139. In both of those cases, however, the amendment was a direct amendment of the judgment itself. In the first instance the amendment made provision for a deficiency judgment—a provision which the original judgment did not contain. In the second, the decree was amended to award a personal judgment—a provision which the original judgment did not contain. And this court held, under the facts of each case, that the power so to amend the judgment did not exist. But in the case at bar there is no attempt, direct or indirect, to amend the judgment actually given, and that judgment, as has been pointed out, is a judgment against the administratrix of Timothy Morrissey's estate, foreclosing the interest of the estate in the property. Not only is this the judgment, but it is the judgment prayed for under appropriate pleadings. Appellants' real contention is that, because the original return showing service upon Johanna Morrissey does not show service upon her as administratrix, the court, no matter what the facts may be, has no power either to permit the return to be amended, or, as in the case of Jones v. Gunn, supra, to take evidence of the fact that service was actually had and made upon Johanna Morrissey as administratrix. But it will at once be seen from the foregoing that the contention of appellant in this regard is at variance with all reason and all authority. 23 Cyc. 872; Alderson Jud. Rights & Process, par. 192.

[9] It necessarily follows, therefore, that the trial court was correct in its rulings upon the matter. The formal order made by Judge Gray permitting the amended return to be filed in conformity with the fact being void for the reasons above stated, the return based upon that order necessarily fell, since an amendment to a judgment roll cannot be made excepting under the supervision and permission of the court.

[10] This circumstance, however, did not forbid the trial court in this case from doing as was done in the Jones Case—taking testimony to establish the fact that service was actually had, permitting an amended return of service in accordance with the fact, or, without the filing of such an amended return, sustaining the judgment in the foreclosure suit, upon proof of the fact of due service.

[11] It appears that Judge Gray, after judgment in foreclosure, took a deed from the widow and minor children of all their interest in the property. When that deed was actually executed is unimportant, since the defendant Gray neither deraigned nor attempted to deraign title through it. Evidently, as part of the same transaction, whatever it was, Judge Gray immediately deeded to Mrs. Morrissey all of the land affected by the homestead. Appellant in his brief seeks to establish some sort of fraud upon the part of Judge Gray in this transaction, and argues that this asserted fraud is in some way cumulative upon the question of the judge's disqualification. The matter could be disposed of by the unanswerable declaration that, as no reliance is placed by any of these defendants upon the deed, it was properly excluded from and has no bearing on this case. But in justice to Judge Gray, who is thus attacked, it is proper to add that it is not conceivable that he could have attempted to gain any advantage by the transaction. The rights of none of the parties were affected by it. No reliance is placed upon it. Everything which the widow and children could claim was immediately by him conveyed back to the widow. The rights of none of the minors were in any way affected or impaired, and the transaction seems to have been conceived in a spirit of friendship to the widow rather than in the spirit of hostility, by conveying back to her the homestead, relieved from any possible cloud which the foreclosure proceedings might be thought to have cast over it. And, finally, it may be added that these parties are accorded by the judgment of the trial court their interest in the homestead without the payment of any part or portion of the mortgage debt to which the homestead was subject, and from the burden of which it escaped solely by defective service of summons upon the original parties to the foreclosure action.

[12] Appellants contend that, as the action was by plaintiffs to quiet their title to the 300-acre tract, it was error upon the part of the court to try the case piecemeal and give separate judgments touching the rights of separate defendants, but, under the nature of the action, this was not only the proper, but the only, course for the court to pursue. Certain of the lands had been sold in parcels. The rights of the holders of those parcels might be, and, as the trial proved in fact were, very different. Certain rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting testimony are objected to. They go to evidentiary matters already discussed, and what has thus been said relieves from the necessity of detailed consideration of them.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

MORRISSEY et al. v. GRAY et al.
(Sac. 1,868.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 30, 1911.)

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by T. E. Morrissey and others against John C. Gray and others. From the judgment and from an order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Morrissey, for appellants. W. H. Carlin, Charles Gray, and A. E. Boynton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appellants upon this appeal are the same as those in T. E. Morrissey et al. v. John C. Gray et al., Sac. No. 1,825, 117 Pac. 438. The respondent upon this appeal, W. P. Hammon, holds title from defendant John C. Gray, through mesne conveyance, to a portion of the Morrissey ranch not affected by the homestead. The questions involved upon this appeal are identical with those considered and decided in Sac. No. 1,825, 117 Pac. 438.

For the reasons therein given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. CONTEMPT (§ 5*)—MISCONDUCT BY ATTORNEY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The amendment in 1891 of Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, subd. 13, to provide that no statement concerning a court shall be treated as contempt unless made in the immediate presence of such court, does not qualify subdivision 3, making violation of an attorney's duty to a court contempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. CONTEMPT (§ 8*)—UNTRUTHFUL AND SCANDALOUS MATTER CONCERNING COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 282, requiring attorneys to maintain respect due to courts and judicial officers, and under section 1209, subd. 3, making violation of an attorney's duty contempt, an attorney is punishable for writing an untruthful and scandalous letter, stating that one in whose name he wrote had had a conversation with the justices of the Supreme Court in which they expressed opinions concerning a pending suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Beatty, C. J., and Angellotti, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Frank Shay was cited for, and adjudged guilty of, contempt.

Guy V. Shoup and C. W. Durbrow, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. It having come to the knowledge of the court through publication in the newspapers that a letter dated March 28, 1910, purporting to be addressed to J. W. McKinley, and signed, "W. F. Herrin, by M.," a copy of which is hereinafter included, was recently introduced in evidence in a proceeding then pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county, and Mr. Frank Shay, an attorney of this court, having admitted that he dictated said letter in the absence of Mr. Herrin from the state of California, and caused it to be signed in his name, and the statements contained in said letter being within the knowledge of the court untrue, as they are scandalous, it is ordered that said Frank Shay show cause before the Supreme Court in bank at the city of San Francisco, on Monday, the 5th day of June, at 10 o'clock a. m., why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt of court and punished therefor.

The following is a copy of the letter referred to: "Dear Sir: I have just wired you copy of order this day entered by the Supreme Court in the case of Duncan versus the Superior Court, Imperial County, et al. I enclose copy of the order. I also enclose the Court's copy of petitioners' points and authorities on application for writ of prohibition. Please make copies for your use and return to me as soon as possible. As stated in my second telegram of this date, the reason why the order to show cause was issued was because of the weakness of paragraph 5 of the complaint in the foreclosure suit. The Supreme Justices, in conversation with me to-day all seemed to be of the opinion that this paragraph should be amended so as to state the facts, as required under the decision in the case of the Bank of Woodland versus Stevens, 144 Cal. page 660,¹ and to have an order made reappointing the receiver. It was suggested that if this could be done between now and Monday it would be an answer to the application. The Justices, without exception, were of the opinion that the appointment of the receiver would be reversed by direct appeal, although it might not be subject to collateral attack. As stated in my second message above referred to, it seemed to be the consensus of opinion among the Justices that inasmuch as the court has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in action of foreclosure, the certificates heretofore issued would be a first lien upon the property, even though the order making the appointment should be reversed on direct appeal. W. F. Herrin, by M."

Ordered further that a copy of this order be served upon said Frank Shay forthwith.

On Hearing on Merits.

SHAW, J. This proceeding was instituted in consequence of the fact coming to the knowledge of the court that the following letter, dated March 25, 1910, had been written at San Francisco and sent to J. W. McKinley at Los Angeles, to wit: "Dear Sir: I have just wired you copy of order this day entered by the Supreme Court in the case of Duncan versus the Superior Court, Imperial County, et al. I enclose copy of the order. I also enclose the Court's copy of petitioners' points and authorities on application for writ of prohibition. Please make copies for your use and return to me as soon as possible. As stated in my second telegram of this date, the reason why the order to show cause was issued was because of the weakness of paragraph 5 of the complaint in the foreclosure suit. The Supreme Justices, in conversation with me to-day all seemed to be of the opinion that this paragraph should be amended so as to state the facts, as required under the decision in the case of the Bank of Woodland versus Stevens, 144 Cal., page 660,¹ and to have an order made reappointing the receiver. It was suggested that if this could be done between now and Monday it would be an answer to the application. The Justices, without exception, were of the opinion that the appointment of the receiver would be reversed by direct appeal, although it might not be subject to collateral attack. As stated in my second message above referred to, it seemed to be the consensus of opinion among the Justices that inasmuch as the court has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in an action of foreclosure, the certificates heretofore issued would be a first lien upon the property, even though the order making the appointment should be reversed on direct appeal. W. F. Herrin, by M."

Each of the justices of this court well knew that no such conversation as that referred to in the letter had ever occurred, either with W. F. Herrin or any other person. The truth is that W. F. Herrin did not see or talk with the justices of this court, or either of them, upon any matter mentioned in said letter, that they did not, nor did any of them, state to any person that the complaint referred to in the letter or any part or paragraph thereof "should be amended so as to state the facts," or that such amendment "would be an answer to the application" for prohibition, or that an order should then "be made reappointing the receiver," or that the order appointing the receiver "would be reversed upon direct appeal, although it might not be subject to collateral attack," or that "the certificates heretofore issued would be a first lien upon the property, even though the order making the appointment should be reversed on direct appeal," or anything of like effect as to any of these matters. Knowing these facts, and being wholly unable to account for the writing of such a letter by any person, and upon learning further that the letter was written by Frank Shay, an attorney of the law department of the Southern Pacific Company, the court deemed it advisable to set on foot some proceeding which would bring about an investigation concerning it. To that end, Frank Shay was cited to show cause why he should not be punished for the writing of said letter, as for a contempt. He appeared and answered, avowing the authorship of the letter, and admitting that the statements therein were false as above stated.

The investigation showed that the facts giving rise to the letter were as follows: In December, 1909, an action was begun in the superior court of Imperial county by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against California Development Company, Southern Pacific Company, and others to foreclose a trust deed executed by the California Development Company to secure its bonds to the amount of $500,000. The property conveyed as security included lands, water rights, canals, and personal property comprising the irrigating system of the Development Company, by means whereof it takes water from the Colorado river and supplies the same to the farmers of the large irrigated region constituting practically all of the cultivated lands in Imperial county. In that action a receiver was appointed by an order made at the time of the filing of the complaint ex parte and without notice to the defendants. In January, 1910, one Boaz Duncan, a holder of said bonds to the amount of $165,120, obtained leave to intervene in the action, and filed a complaint in intervention therein. In March, 1910, the receiver filed a petition therein for authority to issue receiver's certificates in the action to the amount of $344,752.12, the same to become a first lien upon the property. J. W. McKinley appeared as attorney for the receiver in that behalf. That court was proceeding to the hearing of said petition, whereupon, on March 24, 1910, Boaz Duncan filed in the Supreme Court an application for a writ of prohibition against said superior court and said receiver to prevent said court from proceeding further in the matter of said receiver's petition. This application was based on the claim that the order appointing the receiver was void because the complaint in said action, and the affidavit in support thereof, did not state facts sufficient to give that court jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. Upon the filing of this application, this court, deeming the jurisdiction of the superior court doubtful, and the question sufficiently important, forthwith issued an alternative writ of prohibition, directing the superior court and the receiver to show cause on April 11, 1910, at Los Angeles, why the writ should not be made permanent. This was done without notice, in accordance with the regular and usual practice, and on the day the application was filed. The alternative writ was served on the receiver on March 25, 1910, at Los Angeles. Thereupon J. W. McKinley, at Los Angeles, on behalf of the receiver, sent a telegram addressed to W. F. Herrin, at San Francisco, as follows: "Los Angeles, March 25-10. W. F. Herrin, S. F. Duncan has obtained order prohibiting superior court from proceeding on issue of receiver's certificates and other matters. Please see papers. Return day April 11th. If possible obtain order shortening time so that motion to dismiss on moving papers or whole matter upon affidavits can be heard earlier. J. W. McKinley."

Mr. Herrin, at that time and for some time before and after that date, was absent from the state of California. Mr. Shay states in his answer herein that Mr. Herrin had no knowledge concerning said prohibition proceedings. The telegram was delivered at the office of Mr. Herrin, and Mr. Shay, as his assistant, took charge of it. What then occurred, and how the letter came to be written, may best be stated in the words of Mr. Shay contained in his answer admitting the charge. We quote as follows: "In the absence of Mr. Herrin, I went to the Supreme Court chambers in the city of San Francisco to submit the request of Mr. McKinley for an order shortening the time for the hearing of the return to the order to show cause issued on ex parte application of said Boaz Duncan. The Honorable W. H. Beatty, chief justice of said court, was absent, and I was directed to the chambers of Hon. F. W. Henshaw, acting chief justice of said court. I had given no personal attention theretofore to the Boaz Duncan matter, or to California Development Company affairs, but knew generally the condition of affairs in Imperial county, and the situation with reference to the matters and things involved in the appointment of said receiver. Mr. Justice Henshaw called in consultation Mr. Justice Shaw and Mr. Justice Lorigan, and submitted to them the request for the order shortening time, in accordance with Mr. McKinley's telegram. I informed the said justices that the request was based upon the ground that any order of court prohibiting the issuance of receiver's certificates, or preventing the receiver from securing funds or from taking such other action as would be necessary to protect the lands in the Imperial Valley from flood water, or that would prevent the doing of work necessary to maintain the irrigating canals and ditches in the Imperial Valley, would cause great and perhaps irreparable damage to the settlers in said valley, and that, as I understood it, the issuance of receiver's certificates was the only way in which said receiver could secure the funds necessary at that time to carry on the work that was absolutely essential to the protection of the property owners in the Imperial Valley, and that, as I understood it, there was grave and imminent danger from flood waters which threatened the entire valley, and that it was therefore essential that the question as to whether the restraining order that had been issued by this court on the application of said Boaz Duncan should be made permanent or set aside should be heard and determined at the earliest possible date. Because of these representations on my part to said justices of the said court, an order was made and entered by Justices Henshaw, Lorigan, Shaw, and Sloss, as follows: 'By the Court. Good cause appearing therefor, it is hereby ordered that the former order heretofore entered in the matter of the above-entitled proceeding, setting the same for hearing in Los Angeles, California, on Monday, the 11th day of April, 1910, at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of said day, be and the same is hereby vacated, and the said matter is set for hearing before the Supreme Court sitting in bank, at San Francisco, upon Monday, the 4th day of April, 1910, at 10 o'clock a. m. Due notice of this order to be given forthwith.' Inasmuch as there was but little time intervening between March 28th and April 4th, I asked and obtained permission to take the points and authorities that had been filed in support of said Boaz Duncan's petition, and send them to Mr. McKinley for his information, upon my promise that such points and authorities would be returned to the clerk on the day set for the hearing. As is customary in cases where the court makes an order on ex parte application, the reasons why such order was made were stated to me by one of the justices. I cannot now recall who it was, but the statement, as I recall it, was to the effect that the application had been issued for the reason that there was a question in the minds of the court as to whether the complaint in the said action in said foreclosure suit was sufficient to justify or support the appointment of a receiver. Upon an examination of the points and authorities that had been submitted by the said Boaz Duncan in support of his petition, I saw that there was some ground for the averment in the petition as to the insufficiency of the allegations contained in paragraph 5 of the complaint in the foreclosure action hereinbefore mentioned. I made the remark at the time that this paragraph could be amended, and that, if such amendment were made, it would be an answer to the Boaz Duncan petition, but none of the justices at any time during my interview with them expressed any opinion concerning the legal questions involved, nor gave any intimation as to what rulings would or would not be made by the court. Upon my return to my office I dictated to a stenographer the letter to Mr. McKinley set forth in the order to show cause herein. When typed it was laid upon the desk of Mr. Murphy, the chief clerk of the law department of the Southern Pacific Company, who signed Mr. Herrin's name thereto, as is the general custom in Mr. Herrin's absence. Mr. Herrin never saw the letter, and his first knowledge of it, so far as I am aware, will be gained upon his return from Europe, where he now is. The said letter was hurriedly dictated, and contains statements which should not have been made. In it my own views and suggestions are given as if coming from the justices."

Mr. Shay is, and was when he wrote this letter, an attorney and counselor at law of this court. The letter was written in the course of his professional business.

[1] The Code declares it to be the duty of an attorney "to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice and judicial officers." Code Civ. Proc. § 282. In section 1209, subd. 3, it is provided that a violation of such duty by an attorney is a contempt of the authority of the court. This provision has been in the section ever since its first enactment in 1872. The section consists of thirteen subdivisions. In 1891 it was amended by adding at the end of subdivision 13, the following clause: "But, no speech or publication, reflecting upon, or concerning any court, or any officer thereof, shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court, unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings." It is suggested that this clause so qualifies subdivision 3 that a violation of duty by an attorney, if done out of the immediate presence of the court, is not a punishable contempt. Mr. Shay disclaims the benefit of this clause. Nevertheless we deem it our duty to consider its effect.

Under the admitted rules of statutory construction we think that the amendment was not intended to modify subdivision 3. That subdivision enumerates the following acts as contempts: "Misbehavior in office, or other willful neglect or violation of duty by an attorney, counsel, clerk, sheriff, coroner, or other person, appointed or elected to perform a judicial or ministerial service." The persons here named are all persons engaged in the service of the court, assisting it in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and in the performance of its functions. They are actually or potentially officers of the court. They stand in confidential relations toward the court, and in consequence thereof they owe to the court the duty of greater fidelity and respect than are due from other persons. It is apparent that such special duties may be violated by acts not done in the immediate presence of the court, and which would not influence the judges nor affect the proceedings, but which would tend to degrade the court in the minds of the people. If the persons thus immediately connected with the court do not observe proper respect toward it, or make statements derogatory to its character, the public regard and confidence would be much more affected than by similar behavior on the part of ordinary citizens not connected with the court or familiar with its proceedings. The court should have greater control of these persons than would be necessary with respect to ordinary citizens. It was for the purpose of giving to the court a means of protection against such attacks upon its character—attacks, as it were, from within—that this subdivision was enacted.

The amendment of 1891 was passed with different acts and persons in view, and to accomplish a different purpose. It was not intended to affect the power of the court to deal with its own officers for acts of disrespect in connection with their official positions. Its purpose obviously was to prevent the punishment of ordinary citizens, not connected with the court nor owing to it any special duty of fidelity and respect, for any "speech or publication," in censure or abuse of the court or the justices thereof, made to other persons, or to the general public, or even to the justices themselves, in the exercise of the common privilege of free speech. The phrase, "speech or publication reflecting upon, or concerning any court," is indicative of this intent and purpose. The amendment is general in its terms, and does not refer to any particular class of persons. Subdivision 3, on the contrary, is special, and is confined to the officers therein named. It is only by implication, and because of the seeming inconsistency, that the amendment can be said to affect subdivision 3. "Repeal by implication is not favored, and the conflict must be irreconcilable, or the intent to repeal very manifest, or both statutes will stand." Malone v. Bosch, 104 Cal. 683, 38 Pac. 517. "It is also the rule that where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter as far as coming within its particular provisions." People v. Pacific I. Co., 130 Cal. 446, 62 Pac. 740. In the light of these rules of construction it is clear that the amendment of 1891 should not be held to work an implied repeal of the special provisions of subdivision 3 regarding the power of the court over its own officers.

[2] That the writing and publication of the letter, if the false statements therein made were believed, would cast discredit upon this court and the justices thereof, cannot be denied. It falsely imputes to the justices of this court improper conduct of which they are entirely innocent. Whether made wittingly, or through sheer inadvertence or carelessness, it was a grave breach of his duty as an attorney on the part of Mr. Shay. Apparently it was not intended to be made public. Its recent publication does not appear to have been made at the instance of Mr. Shay, or Mr. McKinley, but rather against their wish and will. This fact somewhat palliates the offense. But the writing of such a letter made the publication possible. Its untruthful statements are well calculated to create the false impression that the members of this court are on terms of undue intimacy with powerful litigants. Such a false impression is most mischievous, and must tend greatly to impair the confidence of the people in the integrity of the court. To attempt to create such an impression, even to a few individuals, is a serious violation of duty by one upon whom the law enjoins the utmost fidelity and vigilance to preserve the court and its justices from even the appearance of evil.

It is considered by the court that the said Frank Shay is guilty of contempt as charged, and that, as a punishment therefor, he pay a fine of $500, and that in default of payment thereof he stand committed until such fine is paid, at the rate of one day of imprisonment for every $2 of the fine.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I am unable to concur in the judgment. I wholly concur in what is said in the opinion to the effect that the respondent was guilty of a grave breach of duty as an attorney, and have no doubt that he could be proceeded against therefor under section 287 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that an attorney and counselor may be removed or suspended for various causes, including a violation of his duties as attorney and counselor. But in view of the amendment of 1891 to section 1209, Code of Civil Procedure, discussed in the opinion, I am of the opinion that his acts cannot "be treated or punished as a contempt" of court.

The amendment, reading as follows, viz.: "But no speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or any officer thereof shall be treated or punished as a contempt of such court unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings," while made a part of subdivision 13 of section 1209, cannot be restricted in its effect to such subdivision, for, in view of the subject-matter thereof, viz., practicing law or holding one's self out as entitled to practice law, without a license, it would be meaningless and entirely without force if so restricted. It was clearly intended as a general rule, applicable to every possible charge of contempt, prohibiting courts from treating or punishing as contempts any mere speech or publication reflecting upon or concerning any court or officer thereof, unless made in the immediate presence of such court while in session and in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings, and in effect providing that anything to the contrary theretofore appearing in the section notwithstanding, no such speech or publication should be treated or punished as a contempt of court. I cannot perceive in the language used any warrant for a different construction, and if the only "violation of duty by an attorney" (subdivision 3, § 1209, Code Civ. Proc.) is the making of a speech or publication reflecting upon a court and its members, not in the presence of the court while in session and not in such a manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings, the case, to my mind, falls within the purview of the amendment.

It may freely be admitted that this court and the other courts which are established by the Constitution have the inherent authority, under the Constitution and independent of statute, to prevent interference with the exercise of the powers confided to them, and the enforcement of their orders, judgments, and decrees, and that such authority cannot be taken away or unreasonably restricted by the Legislature. It may also be conceded that a speech or publication may be made under such circumstances, although not made in the presence of the court while in session, that it would actually interfere with the proper exercise of its powers by the court in a proceeding pending before it. As to such a case, the power of the Legislature to unreasonably limit the court by prohibiting any punishment of the guilty person may well be doubted. But the case at bar is admittedly not such a case. The letter written by respondent was not designed to affect the action of the court in any matter pending before it, and could not possibly have such effect, or interfere in any degree with the action of the court or the enforcement of any order it might make in any proceeding. It was a mere private communication to another party, and the sum and substance of its offending was that it contained false statements reflecting discreditably upon the members of this court. A court has no inherent power to punish such acts as contempts, for they do not actually interfere with the exercise of the powers confided to it by the Constitution. In the absence of statute authorizing other method, the remedy of a judicial officer who is merely assailed by slanderous or libelous statement is the same as that of any other citizen. It is, however, within the province of the Legislature to provide that acts, speeches, or publications not actually interfering with the exercise of its powers by a court shall constitute a contempt and be punishable as such, but with respect to such acts the Legislature likewise has the power to modify any provision so made in such manner as it sees fit. When such an act is made a contempt by statute, it is a contempt solely because the statute so provides, and any change in the statute removing such an act from the category of contempts divests it of that character. To my mind the amendment of section 1209, Code of Civil Procedure, in 1891, divested such acts as that of which respondent was guilty, of the character of a "contempt of court," and makes it impossible for us to treat or punish it as such a contempt.

1. FINES (§ 11*) IMPRISONMENT FOR NONPAYMENT—COMMON LAW—APPLICABILITY.

The rule of the common law which is in force by Pol. Code, § 4468, so far as not repugnant to the Constitution and statutes, authorized the enforcement of payment of a fine by imprisonment until payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fines, Cent. Dig. §§ 12, 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. CONTEMPT (§ 77*)—PUNISHMENT—COMMON LAW—APPLICABILITY.

The provision in Code Civ. Proc. § 1218, that the court may impose a fine on one adjudged guilty of contempt of court, is consistent with the rule of the common law that the payment of a fine may be enforced by imprisonment until paid, and, in the absence of other statutory provisions, the court may sentence accused to jail on his failure to pay the fine until the fine is paid at the rate of one day's imprisonment for each $2 of fine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. CONTEMPT (§ 77*)—CIVIL CONTEMPT—FINE—COLLECTION.

The payment of a fine imposed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1218, for a civil contempt may be enforced by imprisonment, notwithstanding section 1007, authorizing enforcement by execution against property, that being merely a cumulative remedy.

4. CONTEMPT (§ 77*)—CIVIL CONTEMPT—STATUTES—APPLICABILITY.

Pen. Code, §§ 6, 11, which declare that no act shall be punishable as a crime except where made a crime by statute, and that the Code does not affect any power of any tribunal to inflict punishment for contempt, has no application to a civil contempt, and section 1205 thereof, providing that imprisonment as a means of enforcing the payment of a fine shall not be extended beyond the term for which accused might be sentenced for the offense of which he has been convicted, does not limit the power of the court to commit one convicted of a civil contempt for failure to pay the fine authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1208.

5. CONTEMPT (§ 72*)—CIVIL CONTEMPT—PUNISHMENT—STATUTES.

Whether a particular act is punishable as a criminal contempt under Pen. Code, § 166, is immaterial on any inquiry arising in a contempt proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1209, but where a person has been punished for a civil contempt, and is convicted of the same act as a crime under section 166, the former punishment may, as authorized by section 658, mitigate the severity of the sentence on a subsequent conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 249-256; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

6. CONTEMPT (§ 77*)—CIVIL CONTEMPT—EXCESSIVE PUNISHMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTY.

Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that excessive fines shall not be imposed nor unusual punishments inflicted, is a guaranty against imprisonment for an unlimited period for nonpayment of a fine for civil contempt.

Angellotti and Henshaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Application for a writ of habeas corpus by Louis Karlson against W. A. Hammel, sheriff, for the discharge of petitioner from custody. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

James G. Maguire, Daniel O'Connell, and Fred J. Spring, for petitioner. Gray, Barker, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, Earl Rogers, and W. H. Dehm, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Petitioner has been held in custody by the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles on a commitment for contempt of court consisting of a violation of an injunction issued by the superior court in the case of the Pacific Ornamental Iron Works (a corporation) v. Metal Trades Council, Los Angeles, California (an association) Louis Karlson et al. It is unnecessary to review in detail the acts of Karlson found by the court to constitute the contempt for which he has been fined. It is sufficient to say that they were in violation of the injunction.

Petitioner's principal and only serious objection urged upon the hearing of this matter was directed to the method whereby the fine imposed was to be satisfied. Therefore we need only consider the punishment sought to be inflicted. Under the terms of the commitment a fine of $200 was imposed upon this petitioner, and it was further provided that "upon his failure to pay such fine he be committed to the county jail until such fine is paid at the rate of one day's imprisonment for each two dollars of said fine." When the petition for a writ of habeas corpus was filed, Karlson had been in custody for nonpayment of his fine under this commitment for a period of more than five days, but not long enough entirely to satisfy the fine by imprisonment. The question for us to determine, therefore, is this: May a court enforce payment of a fine imposed upon one found guilty of contempt by commitment to prison for more than five days?

Petitioner concedes that the court had jurisdiction to impose a fine of $200 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1218), and that such fine may be enforced by an execution as is a judgment in a civil action, but he insists that sections 1218, Code of Civil Procedure, and 1205 of the Penal Code, are binding upon the court and determinative of the whole matter. The former section provides that a court has jurisdiction to punish for contempt by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment for not more than five days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, but section 1205 of the Penal Code ordains that imprisonment as a means of enforcing the payment of a fine shall not "extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced for the offense of which he has been convicted." Petitioner's position would be impregnable if we were bound by the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code.

Before the amendment to that section limiting the term of imprisonment for satisfaction of a fine to a period equal to the maximum term for which the court might commit to prison without alternative, this court, speaking of the action of the lower court in a case very similar to the one at bar, said (In re Tyler, 64 Cal. 438, 1 Pac. 887): "In the punishment inflicted, the court did not exceed its jurisdiction. It had jurisdiction to punish by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding five days, or by both. Section 1218, Code Civ. Proc. In the exercise of its jurisdiction, it imposed a fine of $500, and that exhausted its statutory power of punishment; but the committal was not an additional punishment. It was simply the written mandate or process by which the court undertook to enforce its judgment. A judgment of fine is enforceable by an execution, as on a judgment, in a civil action (section 1214, Pen. Code; section 1006, Code Civ. Proc.), or by commitment under the criminal law (section 1205, Pen. Code). A person against whom such a judgment has been pronounced has, therefore, the privilege, under the law, of paying it either by money or by imprisonment. If he pays in money there can be no commitment. If he refuses to pay in that way, the commitment follows, as an incident to the judgment, until the judgment has been complied with according to law." If the measure of imprisonment for the collection of a fine in such a case was section 1205 of the Penal Code before its amendment, then, petitioner insists, the same section as amended, with the limitation which has been added, should now prescribe the maximum imprisonment for the collection of a part of this fine. But in Ex parte Amos Abbott, 94 Cal. 333, 29 Pac. 622, the Chief Justice held that section 1205 of the Penal Code had no application to cases of contempt because section 11 of the same Code expressly declares that "this Code does not affect any power conferred by law upon any * * * tribunal, or officer, to impose or inflict punishment for a contempt." Speaking of the measure of punishment for contempt of court, he said in that case: "The power to punish for contempt of court, and its limitations, must therefore be sought elsewhere than in the Penal Code, and they are found in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1209 et seq. The limit of punishment there prescribed is a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding 5 days, or both. Code Civ. Proc. § 1218. The power conferred by this section is not affected by any of the provisions of the Penal Code. In Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 535, it was held that the court imposing a fine for contempt has the power to make and enforce a judgment such as that in question here, and that, as I understand the decision, without reference to or aid from section 1205, or any other provision of the Penal Code. That decision has never been overruled or questioned to my knowledge, and remains the law by which I must be bound in deciding this application."

It will be noted that in the opinion In re Tyler, supra, the court made no reference to section 11 of the Penal Code, and doubtless that section was not called to the attention of Mr. Justice McKee, who wrote the opinion from which some of the language quoted above is called to our attention by petitioner's counsel. In that opinion, however, and in the concurring opinions signed by four other justices, Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 535, is expressly affirmed, and no case has been called to our attention changing the rule there announced. In that case the court said: "But it is claimed that it was not competent for the court to imprison the petitioner under an order or judgment simply imposing a fine. In the case of New Orleans v. Steamship Co., 20 Wall. 392 [22 L. Ed. 354], the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. The imposition of the fine was a judgment in a criminal case. That part of the decree is as distinct from the residue as if it were a judgment upon an indictment for perjury committed in a deposition read at the hearing. * * * In Crosby's Case, 3 Wils. 188, Mr. Justice Blackstone said: 'The sole adjudication for contempt, and the punishment thereof, belongs exclusively and without interfering to each respective court." The question of contempt of court and the punishment thereof has recently undergone a thorough examination in the case of Fischer v. Hayes (C. C.) 6 Fed. 71. In that case Blatchford, J., says: "It is suggested that section 725 [Rev. St. (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 583)] provides for the punishment of a contempt by a fine or imprisonment, and that, therefore, a commitment for nonpayment of the fine is unlawful, because such commitment is "imprisonment." There is, however, no commitment or imprisonment if the fine be paid. There is no commitment and fine. The punishment by a fine is fully inflicted, under the terms of the order, if the fine be paid as the order directs, and in such case there can be no commitment. So, if there be a commitment for nonpayment of the fine, there must be a discharge as soon as the fine is paid. The payment of the fine is the punishment. The awarding or infliction of the fine is no punishment. The commitment is an incident of the fine. It is not in any manner the "imprisonment" allowed by the statute. The payment of the fine and a commitment for not paying it cannot coexist. The commitment is not a separate punishment or imprisonment added to the payment of a fine. It is in this view that it has always been held that where a statute authorizes or prescribes the infliction of a fine as a punishment, either for a contempt of court or for a defined offense, it is lawful for the court inflicting the fine to direct that the party stand committed until the fine be paid, although there be no specific affirmative grant of power in the statute to make such direction." The language quoted from Fischer v. Hayes, by the way, is not found in the report of that case in (C. C.) 7 Fed. 96, but in (C. C.) 6 Fed. 71.

[1] The common law of England is the law of this state, so far as it is not repugnant to our own statutes and Constitutions. Pol. Code, § 4468. The rule of the common law that the payment of a fine might be enforced by imprisonment until the fine is paid was the uniform practice of the common law courts in England, time out of mind, as may be seen by a perusal of the decisions of the Court of Kings Bench. "Directing that the prisoner shall stand committed till the fine, or till the fine and costs are paid, is not adding to the legal punishment, but simply a mode of enforcing obedience to the sentence of the law. The usual form of the common-law judgment is that the prisoner stand committed till the fine is paid." Dodge v. State, 24 N. J. Law, 466. There is abundant authority to this effect in addition to the cases already cited. See 8 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 961; Rex v. Waddington, 1 East, 166; Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2574; Harris v. Commonwealth, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 280; Brock v. State, 22 Ga. 100; McMeekin v.

State, 48 Ga. 335; Hathcock v. State, 88 Ga. 91, 13 S. E. 959; In re Newton, 39 Neb. 760, 58 N. W. 436; State v. Manning, 14 Tex. 402; Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1310.

[2] The provision of the Code of Civil Procedure that courts may punish a contempt by imposing a fine is consistent with this rule of the common law as to the method of enforcing its payment.

[3] The provision of section 1007, Code of Civil Procedure, that an order for the payment of money may be enforced by execution against property, is merely a cumulative remedy. In many cases an execution would be an ineffective means for the collection of a fine. The property of persons of wealth is often beyond reach of execution. At common law payment of a fine could be enforced both by a capias ad satisfaciendum—that is, imprisonment—and by a levari facias—that is, an execution against property. 2 Tidd's Prac. 1042; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 1303. The two methods are not inconsistent. Section 1007 is general in its terms, and applies to all orders. It may apply to a judgment imposing a fine, but there is nothing indicating an intent to make it exclusive or to take away the common-law power to enforce a fine by imprisonment.

[4] The Penal Code declares, in effect, that the provision that no act shall be punishable as a crime except such as may be made a crime by statute, and then only in the manner prescribed or authorized by statute (section 6), shall not apply to contempts punishable under section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 11). It necessarily follows that the Penal Code has no application to a civil contempt, and that the question whether the particular act is punishable as a criminal contempt or not, under section 166 of the Penal Code, is immaterial to any inquiry arising in a contempt proceeding under section 1209.

[5] If, after such punishment in such civil proceeding, a person is convicted of the same act as a crime under said section 166, the former punishment may mitigate the severity of the sentence upon the subsequent conviction. Pen. Code, § 658.

[6] The danger that persons may be imprisoned for an unlimited period for nonpayment of a fine for contempt is, as we think, completely removed by the constitutional guaranty that "excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed; nor shall cruel or unusual punishments be inflicted." Section 6, art. 1. There would be also perhaps recourse to the pardoning power in extreme cases.

It follows herefrom that there is no merit in petitioner's contention. Therefore the writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. It is practically held by the opinion that, section 1205 of the Penal Code having no application to proceedings for contempt under section 1209 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, any court imposing a fine upon a person as a punishment for contempt may direct that he be imprisoned until such fine is paid. The limitation of section 1205, Penal Code, not being applicable, and no limitation being elsewhere made by our statute law, such imprisonment may be continued indefinitely, and as it is held with practical unanimity that imprisonment for mere nonpayment of a fine is not imprisonment for debt, and it being reasonably clear that the contempt in such a case as this is a criminal as distinguished from a civil contempt and that mere inability to pay the fine will not be a sufficient warrant for discharge from imprisonment under sections 1143 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure (see In re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580, 17 Pac. 698), such imprisonment may be continued indefinitely, even though the imprisoned party is without any property from which to pay such fine. Such imprisonment may be ordered by any court of justice, including a justice's court. This is the necessary effect of the opinion. And this conclusion is reached although there is no provision in the law applicable to such contempt proceedings that expressly or impliedly authorizes imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine.

In my opinion, if section 1205, Penal Code, has no application in such cases, it follows that a court is without power to imprison for mere nonpayment of a fine imposed by it as a punishment for contempt of court in proceedings had under section 1209 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure.

The punishment that may be prescribed for such contempts is expressly specified in the statute. "A fine may be imposed on him not exceeding five hundred dollars, or he may be imprisoned not exceeding five days, or both." Section 1218, Code Civ. Proc. Section 1219, Code of Civil Procedure, specifies the only case in which other imprisonment may be required, being as follows: "When the contempt consists in the omission to perform an act which is yet in the power of the person to perform, he may be imprisoned until he have performed it, and in that case the act must be specified in the warrant of commitment." The contempt in the case at bar was not of this character, and the section is without application. Section 1007, Code of Civil Procedure, which undoubtedly is applicable to such contempt proceedings, provides: "Whenever an order for the payment of a sum of money is made by a court, pursuant to the provisions of this Code, it may be enforced by execution in the same manner as if it were a judgment." This section affords a remedy by execution in such cases, which, to my mind, is the only method authorized by law for the enforcement of such a fine, if section 1205, Penal Code, is not applicable.

This being the condition of the statutory law in this state, the opinion necessarily proceeds upon the doctrine declared in Fischer v. Hayes (C. C.) 6 Fed. 71, "that where a statute authorizes or prescribes the infliction of a fine as a punishment, either for a contempt of court or for a defined offense, it is lawful for the court inflicting the fine to direct that the party stand committed until the fine be paid, although there be no specific affirmative grant of power in the statute to make such direction." It is to be observed that no distinction is made here between contempts of court and other offenses. In any case, the power to impose a fine carries with it the power to adjudge imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine and until the fine be paid.

I do not think that the doctrine of this case can properly be held applicable in this state. It is generally recognized that a judgment imposing a fine in a contempt matter, where the fine is solely punitive and in no way remedial, stands on the same plane as a judgment imposing a fine in the case of an ordinary criminal prosecution. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 67. The fine is simply a punishment for an offense. The Supreme Court of Ohio in Brown v. State, 11 Ohio, 277, where a defendant was convicted of crime and judgment of fine given, with a commitment to imprisonment until the fine and costs were paid, held that the commitment was unauthorized, saying: "When common-law jurisdiction is entertained, and courts proceed according to its course, this power exists; but, when offenses are statutory, punishments regulated by statute, and no such authority of commitment is declared, it is a power not inferred, does not exist, and cannot be exercised." In Lougee v. State, 11 Ohio, 72, the same court said: "Unless it is so provided by statute, the court has not power to order that a criminal stand committed for the nonpayment of a fine." The correctness of the view stated in Brown v. State, supra, will not, I think, be doubted. Is it not applicable in California? In the absence of statute, no act or omission is here punishable as a public offense, and only such punishments can be awarded as are authorized by statute. Our Codes and other statutes undertake to cover the whole field of public offenses and the punishments that may be imposed therefor. By section 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is declared that "the Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates." It has always been recognized by our Legislature that statutory authorization for imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine is essential to its exercise, as is shown by sections 1205 and 1446 of the Penal Code, where such authority is conferred, to be exercised with certain prescribed limitations. In Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 372, by the judgment pronounced on conviction of a public offense, both imprisonment and fine were imposed, as was authorized by law, and it was further adjudged that, in the event of the nonpayment of the fine, the defendant be further imprisoned until the fine be satisfied at a certain rate per day. This court concluded that section 1205, Penal Code, had no application to a judgment by which both imprisonment and fine were imposed, and, having so concluded, held that, as there was no statutory authority for imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine in such a case, the judgment to that extent must be held void and the prisoner discharged. It was said: "Unless it (the Legislature) has clearly conferred upon the court authority therefor, it is our duty to hold that the additional penalty cannot be imposed." This case has been followed several times, and clearly decides that express statutory authority is essential to warrant imprisonment for mere nonpayment of a fine. There is, as already said, no material difference in the case of the imposition of a fine on conviction for a criminal contempt of court under section 1209 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure.

It has been held in New York that where a statute authorizing a fine on conviction of a public offense prescribes a particular method for the enforcement, as by docketing the fine and issuing execution thereon, the court has no authority to sentence the defendant to imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine (People v. Stock, 26 App. Div. 564, 50 N. Y. Supp. 483, affirmed in 157 N. Y. 681, 51 N. E. 1092). We have seen that our Code of Civil Procedure prescribes such a remedy for the enforcement of a fine (section 1007), and this is the only remedy expressly prescribed unless the Penal Code sections are applicable.

There is no opinion of this court that contains anything in conflict with the foregoing other than the opinion in Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 534. The decision in Ex parte Abbott, 94 Cal. 333, 29 Pac. 622, was by the Chief Justice in a matter heard and decided by him alone, and he very properly considered himself bound, as expressly stated in his opinion, by the opinion of the court in Ex parte Crittenden, supra. The whole discussion of the question at bar in the opinion of the court in the case last mentioned consists of the quotation from Fischer v. Hayes, supra, set forth in the main opinion herein, and no question appears to have suggested itself as to the applicability of the doctrine therein enunciated in view of such statutes as we have in this state. As already indicated, I believe that the opinion in Ex parte Crittenden, supra, is erroneous, and that it is directly in conflict with Ex parte Rosenheim and kindred cases, and that the views therein expressed should be disapproved by this court.

I do not desire to be understood as assenting to the view that section 1205, Penal Code, has no application in such cases as this. It has never been so held by this court; the only decision to that effect in our reports being Ex parte Abbott, supra, a decision made by a single justice. It may be that section 11, Penal Code, on which that decision is based, can reasonably be held to have no reference to such contempts as are purely criminal as distinguished from civil. If section 1205, Penal Code, does apply, the time during which the petitioner may be imprisoned for mere nonpayment of the fine had expired. If it does not apply, there was never in my opinion any authority for his imprisonment at all for such nonpayment.

The decisions from other states cited in the majority opinion, with the exception of the Georgia decisions, will each be found upon examination to be based upon the conclusion that a statute of the state either expressly or by necessary implication authorized imprisonment for the nonpayment of the fine. The only Georgia decision in point is that of Brock v. State, 22 Ga. 100, decided in the year 1857. The other Georgia decisions cited do not involve the point under discussion.

For the reasons stated, I am of the opinion that the petitioner should be discharged from custody.

I concur: HENSHAW, J.

Ex parte GOODRICH. (Cr. 1,625.)

1. STATUTES (§ 185*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION OF LEGISLATURE.

There can be no intent in a statute not expressed in its words; and there can be no intent upon the part of the framers of the statute which does not find expression in its words.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 264; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 216*)—AIDS TO CONSTRUCTION—LEGISLATIVE DEBATES.

Legislative debates are not appropriate sources from which to discover the meaning of the language of the statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 292; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 120*)—ORDINANCES—AIDS TO CONSTRUCTION—OPINIONS OF OFFICIALS.

The testimony or opinions of individual members of a legislative body are not admissible to show what in fact was intended or meant by an ordinance; and hence the opinion of a chief of police as to the purpose of a city council in passing an ordinance fixing rates to be charged for electricity, and that a later ordinance not referring to it was intended to aid and supplement it, and the opinion of a city engineer who furnished information and recommendations to the council, before the passage of the ordinance, are not admissible to show the intent of the council, since that must appear from the ordinance itself.

4. STATUTES (§ 215*)—AIDS TO CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE BEFORE LAWMAKING BODY.

It is permissible in certain cases as tending to show the meaning of language used in a statute to show what evidence the lawmaking body had before it while framing the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 291; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

5. ELECTRICITY (§ 11*)—SUPPLIED FOR LIGHT OR POWER.

The duty of a quasi public corporation engaged in supplying electricity for light and power to the general public is to supply it in safe and convenient form, and to charge no more than the reasonable maximum rate, which may be fixed by municipal ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

6. ELECTRICITY (§ 11*)—CHARGES—MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS.

A municipality has the power to pass ordinances reasonably regulating public service corporations in matters of safety and convenience and touching the manner of the supply and the prices to be charged, such power being a matter of supervisory control over the business, administration, and functions of the corporations in its dealings with the public, but beyond these matters the regulations cannot go; and the fact that as a matter of private arrangement a corporation has been doing a particular thing not pertaining to its public functions does not justify the municipality in an attempt to make the continued doing of that thing compulsory.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 298*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—FURNISHING ELECTRIC LAMPS FREE.

The city of Los Angeles passed an ordinance, complete in itself, fixing the rates to be charged by companies furnishing electricity for light and power, which imposed no duty or burden as to furnishing lights free of charge, and later enacted an ordinance, containing no reference to the rate-fixing ordinance, which made it unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, or agent thereof, supplying electric current for lighting purposes to the city or its inhabitants, to make any charge or to demand any payment, deposit, or advance for furnishing, installing, or renewing any carbon filament incandescent lights of eight or more candle power; and further provided that the refusal or neglect to furnish on demand free of charge for original installation or for renewal of lights which had burned out a sufficient number of lights for all the fixtures belonging to, or used by, any person or corporation to whom electric light was supplied was unlawful. Held, that such ordinance imposed a duty on the corporations which did not pertain to their public functions, and was invalid as a confiscation of property without due process of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 847; Dec. Dig. § 298.*]

8. ELECTRICITY (§ 11*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATION—REQUIRING FURNISHING OF LIGHTS FREE OF CHARGE—VALIDITY.

The city of Los Angeles, with knowledge that the various electric companies either by contract with consumers or by practice had been furnishing incandescent lights free of charge, passed a rate-fixing ordinance, complete in itself, which imposed no duty or burden as to furnishing such lights, and later, in a separate ordinance containing no reference to the rate-fixing ordinance, made it unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, or agent thereof, supplying electric current for lighting purposes to the city or its inhabitants, to make any charge or to demand any payment, deposit, or advance for furnishing, installing, or renewing incandescent lights of eight candle power or more, and made it unlawful to refuse or neglect to furnish on demand, free of charge, either for original installation or for renewal of lights that had burned out, a sufficient number of lights for all the fixtures belonging to or used by each person or corporation to whom electric current was supplied. Held, that the ordinance attempted to impose on the lighting corporations a burden and a duty in no way pertaining to or growing out of its public functions, and was beyond the powers of the city council and void, and hence that an agent convicted under the ordinance would be discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Electricity, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

In Bank. Habeas Corpus by F. B. Goodrich against Alexander Galloway, chief of police, city of Los Angeles. Petitioner discharged.

W. A. Cheney, H. H. Trowbridge, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, for petitioner. John W. Shenk, City Atty., and Guy Eddie, City Prosecutor, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner is one of the officers and agents of the Pacific Light & Power Company. The Pacific Light & Power Company is a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying electricity for light and power to the general public in the city of Los Angeles. Petitioner was convicted criminally of a violation of Ordinance No. 20,455 (new series) of the city of Los Angeles. He seeks his discharge under this writ, contending that the ordinance is void. The ordinance in terms declares it to be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, or agent thereof, supplying electric light or electric current for lighting purposes to the city of Los Angeles, or to the inhabitants thereof, "to make any charge or to demand, collect or receive any compensation or consideration, or any payment, deposit or advance for furnishing any carbon filament incandescent light of eight or more candle power to or for installing the same * * * or for renewing any such lamp that shall have burned out." The ordinance further provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, or the agent thereof so furnishing or supplying electric light or electric current "to fail, refuse or neglect to furnish on demand free of charge, either for original installation or for renewal of lamps that have burned out, a sufficient number of carbon filament incandescent lamps to light all electric light fixtures belonging to or used by each person, firm, or corporation, to whom electric light or electric current for lighting purposes is furnished or supplied." It is for petitioner's refusal, as the agent of the Pacific Light & Power Company, so to furnish incandescent lamps free upon demand that he has been convicted and adjudged to suffer imprisonment, as provided by the terms of the ordinance.

The return to the writ is made by Alexander Galloway, chief of police of the city of Los Angeles. Besides the usual statement that he holds the body of the prisoner by virtue of a commitment under a criminal judgment which he believes to be legal, the return sets forth many allegations of evidentiary matter which will hereinafter be considered. The return is accompanied by an affidavit of Theodore B. Comstock, the contents of which affidavit is also a matter for later consideration.

It will facilitate the understanding of the questions if a narrative résumé be given of the facts. The various companies and corporations supplying electric light and power to the inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles filed with the city council, as the law requires them to do, itemized statements of their respective incomes, expenses, and physical properties. The information derived from these statements, with such other knowledge and information as the city council of Los Angeles might acquire, was to be used in the performance of the duty and power imposed and conferred of fixing the rates which could be charged consumers for the use of electricity. No question arises over the right, duty, and power of the city council in this regard. The statements filed by these companies with the council showed the cost to the companies of furnishing free of charge to their consumers incandescent lamps. No ordinance or other law at this time compelled, or attempted to compel, the companies so to furnish these incandescent lamps free of charge, but it appears from affidavit, and is undisputed, that the practice of so furnishing incandescent lamps to consumers free of charge was one that grew up amongst the electric companies, owing to competition, in their efforts to retain old consumers and to secure new ones, and thus increase the sale of their fluid. The matter rested in each instance upon contract between the company and the private consumer.

In the performance of its duty to fix rates for electricity the council by Ordinance No. 20,327 (new series) fixed such rates for the year commencing July 1, 1910, and ending June 30, 1911. This ordinance made no attempt to impose upon the electric companies the duty of furnishing incandescent lamps. Subsequently, by a separate and independent ordinance, in no way referring to the rate-fixing ordinance, the council passed the penal ordinance here in question, making it mandatory upon all electric companies to furnish incandescent lights upon demand free of charge.

Such is the case shown by the record. The contention of petitioner is that the council had not the power to impose upon the quasi public companies and corporations supplying electricity the burden of furnishing free incandescent lamps, and that the attempt to do so was a confiscation of property; that, treated as a regulatory provision, it was equally in excess of the powers of the company and void, first as being foreign to any of the functions of the corporation over which the council could exercise regulatory power; that the council's regulatory powers could only go to the rates charged and to the methods of safety and convenience by which electricity was conveyed to the consumer, whereas this so-called regulation commanded them to do a thing in no respect pertaining to their public business of purveying electricity for general use; and, second, because, if treated as regulatory, it was mere confiscation under the guise of regulation.

Respondent undertakes to meet these objections by the return of the chief of police and the affidavit of Theodore B. Comstock. The chief of police declares that the city of Los Angeles in fixing the price of electricity by Ordinance No. 20,327 (the rate-fixing ordinance) "took into consideration and allowed in said valuation the cost of furnishing and equipping the customers of said persons, firms and corporations with carbon filament incandescent lights of eight or more candle power," and that the city of Los Angeles "allowed as a part of the expenditure charges" of electric companies the "specific expenditure for renewing to the customers of said persons, firms and corporations supplying electric light and electricity the furnishing free upon demand to the said customers the carbon filament incandescent lamps." The chief of police further asserts "that the city, when so fixing said rates as aforesaid for the year commencing July 1, 1910, and ending June 30, 1911, contemplated and intended that the said custom of furnishing and supplying said carbon filament incandescent lamps free and without charge should and would be continued without change by said persons, firms and corporations;" etc. Further, the chief of police deposes that the city of Los Angeles, after the passage of Ordinance No. 20,327, new series (the rate-fixing ordinance), ascertained that the electric companies proposed to charge for incandescent lamps, "and that, after so ascertaining the intention of the aforesaid persons, firms, and corporations, the said city of Los Angeles further exercised its power to regulate the sale and use of electric light, and fixed and determined the price to be charged for the same in the city of Los Angeles, by enacting Ordinance No. 20,455, new series (the ordinance under which petitioner was convicted)." It is then alleged that this last-named ordinance "was enacted by the city of Los Angeles for the purpose of reinforcing and aiding said Ordinance No. 20,327, by prohibiting persons, firms, and corporations * * * from defeating or evading the rate provisions of said Ordinance No. 20,327 (new series), by making the aforesaid additional charge for furnishing carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power."

Theodore B. Comstock in his affidavit joins the chief of police in declaring what the members of the city council of the city of Los Angeles had in mind when they legislated, and what their legislation means. He makes affidavit that since the 5th of January, 1910, he has been the executive officer and engineer of the board of public utilities of the city of Los Angeles. Amongst the duties of the board of public utilities is to make each year a thorough investigation into the affairs of all persons, firms, or corporations supplying electricity for public use, and to gather data upon this subject to present to the consideration of the city council in aid of their rate-fixing powers and processes. Further, the board of public utilities is "to analyze the statements made to the city council by said persons, firms and corporations bearing upon their income and expenses and physical properties relating to the business of furnishing electric current for lighting purposes." Mr. Comstock deposes that the board of public utilities entered upon the discharge of these duties, and that he, as executive officer and engineer, has been in direct charge of the work of collecting such information and data. As part of this work he has examined the statements filed with the city council by the Pacific Light & Power Company and by other persons, firms, and corporations dealing in electricity; that those statements "include in the inventory of the plant and property thereof, the value and cost of the carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power furnished by said persons, firms and corporations to consumers and customers free of charge during the year 1909, and said statements also include in the expense accounts of said persons, firms and corporations the cost of renewing and replacing such lamps free of charge to consumers for said year." Mr. Comstock then deposes that the board of utilities made its recommendation to the city council, which recommendation included a schedule of charges for the service of supplying electricity, and that the board of utilities "took into consideration and allowed in the said plant and property valuation above mentioned the item of expense of furnishing to consumers free of charge carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power, and took into consideration and allowed in the disbursements the item of expense for renewing said carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power free of charge to the customers of said persons, firms and corporations." Mr. Comstock next deposes that the council "adopted the rates and schedule of charges for such service so recommended by said board of public utilities." He proceeds further to depose that he believes, after careful study and consideration, that the revenues of the companies furnishing electricity in obedience to Ordinance 20,327 (new series), and 20,455 (new series), will be equal to or greater than the revenue received by such companies in the preceding year; further, that he has made a careful investigation of other cities, and states that "50 important cities of the United States have reported on the subject, and that in 36 thereof the persons, firms, and corporations furnishing electric current for lighting purposes supply and furnish to customers and consumers carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power free of cost to consumers, and in 14 of said cities a charge is made for such lamps," and, finally, that his investigations show that the Los Angeles electric companies "for many years prior to the passing of said Ordinance No. 20,455 (new series) furnished, supplied, and renewed carbon filament incandescent lamps of eight or more candle power to consumers free of charge."

In thus setting forth the declarations of the chief of police and of Mr. Comstock, it is not to be assumed that this court will disregard all the principles of law governing the interpretation of statutes. The exposition is made so as fully and fairly to present the contentions of respondent.

[1] But it still remains true, as it always has, that there can be no intent in a statute not expressed in its words, and there can be no intent upon the part of the framers of such a statute which does not find expression in their words. 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Construction, § 388.

[2] It still remains true that even legislative debates are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of the statute. U. S. v. Trans-Missouri Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 290, 17 Sup. Ct. 540, 41 L. Ed. 1007; American Net & Twine Co. v. Worthington, 141 U. S. 468, 12 Sup. Ct. 55, 35 L. Ed. 821.

[3] And it still remains true that even the testimony or opinions of individual members of the legislative body are not admissible for the purpose of showing what in fact was intended or meant by an act. State v. Burk, 88 Iowa, 661, 56 N. W. 180; Richmond v. Supervisors, 83 Va. 204, 2 S. E. 26; People v. Smith, 78 Hun, 179, 28 N. Y. Supp. 912. It is neither permissible nor possible, therefore, for either the chief of police or Mr. Comstock to say what was in the mind of the city council in framing their rate-fixing ordinance, or what by it the city council intended to include or exclude, other than as these facts shall appear from the face of the ordinance itself. Nor is their testimony admissible to establish that any relationship or interdependence exists between Ordinance 20,327 (new series) and Ordinance 20,455 (new series), for, if such interdependence or relationship does in fact exist, it must be shown from an inspection of the laws themselves, or it cannot be shown at all.

[4] So, for the same reason, it is permissible in a proper case to show what evidence the council had before it, but the conclusions which it reached from that evidence are to be found alone from the expressions in the ordinance and are not a subject for extrinsic evidence. Thus, it is permissible to show that the statements of the electric companies established that they had been furnishing incandescent lamps to consumers without charge, and the cost to which the companies were put by so doing. It is a fair inference that this evidence was weighed and considered by the city council in fixing the rates, but not even the members of the city council themselves, and, of course, not the chief of police or Mr. Comstock, attempting to speak for them, would be permitted to say what they meant or intended concerning this matter in the ordinance which they framed and adopted. The ordinance itself must speak upon this matter, or no one can speak. Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Grat. (Va.) 457.

What, then, is the legal presentation of this matter? It is that the city council had before it evidence that by private convention and contract between the various electric companies and their consumers these electric companies had been in the practice of furnishing to their consumers free of charge, under certain restrictions, incandescent electric lights. With this knowledge they passed a rate-fixing ordinance, complete in itself, prescribing the compensation which such companies might exact of consumers who used their electricity. This ordinance in no way attempted to impose any duty or burden upon the companies in the matter of furnishing incandescent lamps. Subsequently, by a separate ordinance, containing no reference whatsoever to the rate-fixing ordinance, the city council declared that every company furnishing electricity must furnish free incandescent lamps, or be subject to fine and imprisonment in every case of failure so to do. In point of law these ordinances are independent and unrelated. The second ordinance does not in matter, substance, form, time, or term deal directly or indirectly with the rates which had theretofore been fixed. But, if it did, if it had made express reference to the rate-fixing ordinance and declared that it was amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, which is the utmost for it which respondent can or does claim, the legal situation would not be different.

[5, 6] What is the legal situation? The duty of these public service corporations was to supply their commodity in safe and convenient form to the general public. Over these matters of safety and convenience the city council had the unquestioned power to pass regulatory ordinances. It was also the duty of these companies to charge no more for their commodity than the maximum rate which might be fixed by the council. The correlative rights of the council in the matter were to pass reasonable regulations touching the mode and manner of the supply, and reasonable regulations touching the price.

The argument of respondent is that the sole question of the compulsory supplying of incandescent lights by the companies free of charge is the question of the reasonableness of the provision as a regulatory measure. He demonstrates to his satisfaction that it is reasonable, and concludes that this is an end of the discussion. His argument here follows: "Does the requirement of furnishing incandescent lamps place it within the definition of being reasonable and of being natural to and consistent with the kind of business which is required to furnish them? Its reasonableness is obvious: First, it is an unmistakable convenience to consumers; second, it is a necessity and should be supplied to the consumer at the least possible cost and least possible trouble to himself; third, it is a necessary incident to the supplying of electric light; fourth, it is no more foreign to or inconsistent with the business than supplying the electrical manufacturing machinery, the wires to conduct electricity, the poles to sustain the wires, or the meters to measure the quantity consumed; fifth, it is already the practice of the companies supplying electric light, in accordance with one method or another, to supply these incandescent lamps. That furnishing these incandescent lamps is natural to and consistent with the business of electric lighting companies has been answered by the foregoing remarks on reasonableness." But every word of this, except the fifth specification, which is without legal value upon the question of reasonableness, would apply as well to an ordinance compelling electric companies to wire the houses, since, first, the wiring is unmistakably a convenience to consumers; second, it is a necessity which should be supplied to the consumer at the least possible cost and trouble to himself; third, it is a necessary incident to the supplying of electric light; and, fourth, it is no more foreign to or inconsistent with the business than supplying electrical manufacturing machinery. Indeed, the same could be said of an ordinance requiring gas companies to put in the gas plumbing and fixtures free of charge, or to an ordinance requiring water companies to do the same with water plumbing and fixtures. The primary question is not at all one of reasonableness, but one of legislative power. Only after the existence of the power is shown does the question of the reasonableness of its exercise arise. Thus there was a time under earlier republics when sumptuary laws to restrain reckless expenditures were deemed important and even essential to the existence of the government. In this extravagant age the reasonableness of a law limiting women's expenditure in the matter of attire, or men's expenditure in the indulgence of their appetites, could be sym-ported with much plausibility. But the argument would never reach the question of reasonableness, since it would cease and the question would be determined solely by consideration of the want of legislative power.

The power and the limitations upon the power of the council in dealing with these public service corporations has been indicated. That power is a power of supervisory control over the business, the administration, and the functions of the corporation in the latter's dealings with the public. Beyond these matters the city council cannot go. The whole subject is epitomized in the following language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co. v. Manning, 186 U. S. 238, 247, 22 Sup. Ct. 881, 885, 46 L. Ed. 1144: "A railroad company may, if authorized by its charter, carry on not simply its strictly railroad business, but also an establishment for the manufacture of cars and locomotives." The fact that it is engaged in these two different works would not in itself subject the manufacture of cars and locomotives to the supervision of the Legislature, although such body would have the right to regulate the charges for railroad transportation." The city council can no more compel a public service corporation to do or abstain from doing anything not pertaining to the public service itself than it can compel a private individual; for, outside of its public functions, the corporation is a private corporation. Nor does the fact that as a matter of private arrangement the corporation has been doing a particular thing, not pertaining to its public functions, justify the legislative body in an endeavor to make the continued doing of that thing compulsory under the law. This argument was completely answered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Lakeshore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 173 U. S. 684, 19 Sup. Ct. 565, 43 L. Ed. 858, in the following language: "What the company may choose voluntarily to do furnishes no criterion for the measurement of the power of a legislature. Persons may voluntarily contract to do what no legislature would have the right to compel them to do. Nor does it furnish a standard by which to measure the reasonableness of the matter exacted by the Legislature. The action of the company upon its own volition, purely as a matter of internal administration, and in regard to the details of its business which it has the right to change at any moment, furnishes no argument for the existence of a power in a legislature to pass a statute in relation to the same business imposing additional burdens upon the company." See, also, Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S. 403, 17 Sup. Ct. 130, 41 L. Ed. 489; Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Nebraska, 217 U. S. 196, 30 Sup. Ct. 461, 54 L. Ed. 727.

[7, 8] No one can seriously assert that the furnishing of incandescent lamps is a part of the public duty of a quasi public corporation supplying electricity for light or power.

No law of the state attempts in the remotest extent to impose such a duty. The public duty of such a corporation is fully performed when it has brought its commodity safely and conveniently to the door of the consumer. Within that door the company is not by law obliged, and may not by law be compelled, to go for any purpose foreign to the public service it is called upon to render, and that the purpose here contemplated is foreign is abundantly established. Snell v. Clinton Electric L. H. & Power Co., 196 Ill. 626, 63 N. E. 1082, 58 L. R. A. 284, 89 Am. St. Rep. 341; Burke v. Mead, 159 Ind. 252, 64 N. E. 880. So that, aside from the fact that the execution of this criminal ordinance would work an unconstitutional confiscation of property, a fact itself conclusive against the validity of the ordinance, it attempts by law to impose upon a public service corporation a burden and a duty in no wise appertaining to or growing out of its public functions. It has been said that, the fact that these companies were furnishing incandescent lights to the consumers free of charge being in evidence before the municipal council, it is a legitimate inference that this fact was considered by the council in fixing the rates. This is true, but the determination which they reached, after such consideration, must be discovered from the ordinance itself. As has been pointed out the rate-fixing ordinance contains no expression upon the subject. What is to be deduced from its silence, therefore, is solely by way of argument, and if, as respondent argues, the city council did in fact make an allowance to these companies because of the gifts which they were making to their consumers, the answer is that this was a very improper thing for the council to do. The council has no right to recognize and allow for gifts, donations, or charitable bestowals made by public service corporations, however commendable from the ethical point of view these things may be. A gas company may furnish the gas and the gas fixtures to a hospital free of charge. It might donate $50,000 a year to the maintenance of some worthy charity, but the council could not allow a return to a company for such donations. Still less could it exact that their continuance for succeeding years should be compulsory.

As has been said, to treat the penal ordinance as amendatory of the rate-fixing ordinance does not relieve the difficulty. It would then amount to a declaration by the city council that the companies could collect the fixed sum for supplying electricity, provided that they furnish the consumers with free incandescent lamps. This would be, again, but the imposition of an illegal condition upon the right to transact a public business, and it would be a failure to fix rates at all, as to all companies which were unwilling to conform to the condition.

No case cited by respondent in any wise supports his contention that the Legislature may regulate or control a public service corporation in its private affairs as distinguished from its public duties, or that it may compel such a corporation to do or abstain from doing anything not pertinent to its public functions as a condition precedent to its right to perform those functions. One and all the cases are addressed to the familiar principle herein repeatedly announced, that the Legislature may pass reasonable rules and regulations touching the performance of these public functions. They do not, therefore, call for extended review, but, as typical of them, may be instanced State v. Gas Co., 34 Ohio St. 572, 32 Am. Rep. 390, where the gas company, under a special charter, was invested "with franchises to be exercised to subserve the public interest," and it was held that under express law the regular rates which the gas company could charge for the use of meters was subject to regulation. Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 36 L. Ed. 247, a case in which respondent finds a strong resemblance to the case at bar, is simply this: A declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States that the business of grain elevating is a business charged with a public trust, and therefore subject to rate regulation; that the public business consisted, first, in shoveling grain to the leg of the elevator to keep the elevator buckets full; and, second, the hoisting, transferring, and weighing of the grain elevated by the buckets; that it was not unreasonable in fixing a rate not exceeding five-eighths of a cent a bushel for the performance of the latter duty, to prescribe also that the former duty should be done at actual cost, since the reasonable purpose of the provision was to prevent collusion between the elevator owners and the shovelers' union, whereby the rate fixed could be evaded and the amount charged greatly increased. It should be apparent, we think, that these principles and this decision have nothing in common with an ordinance requiring a public service corporation to engage in the private enterprise of making gratuitous distribution of incandescent lamps to their consumers upon demand.

The ordinance in question, therefore, being plainly in excess of the legislative powers of the city council of the city of Los Angeles, and therefore void, it is ordered that the prisoner be discharged.

In re WALKER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 5,491.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1911.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—
TRUSTS (§ 94½*)—WILLS (§ 203*)—PROBATE
AFTER DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE AS INTES-TATE.

Though a decree of distribution of an estate as intestate is not subject to attack after it has become final, yet a will, being thereafter discovered, is properly established by the probate court, that those entitled to take under it may be in a position to prosecute their rights in equity against the distributees as their involuntary trustees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1305-1309; Dec. Dig. § 315;* Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 144; Dec. Dig. § 94½;* Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 502, 503; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

Sloss and Angellotti, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William Walker, deceased. From an order admitting a will to probate, appeal is taken. Affirmed.

Joseph H. Skirm, for appellant. Benjamin K. Knight, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. William Walker died in September, 1906. He was a resident of the county of Santa Cruz and left real and personal property therein. He was thought to have died intestate. Letters of administration were issued to the public administrator and administration upon the estate was duly had. The decree of final distribution was made and entered in August, 1908. The property was delivered to the distributees, and the administrator was discharged in February, 1909. More than eight months after the decree of distribution, and after the discharge of the administrator, Frank D. Ennor filed an alleged will of the deceased and petitioned for its probate. The distributees contested and in their contest set forth the facts above related. Petitioner demurred to this contest, the demurrer was sustained, the contest overruled, and the will after proof admitted to probate. This appeal is from the latter order. It is argued that the decree of final distribution is a conclusive adjudication of the title to the property of the estate which prevents the probate court from taking any further action in regard thereto. It is further argued that the admission of the purported will of William Walker to probate is in the nature of a collateral attack upon the decree of distribution and that the decree is immune from such attack.

Respondent's position is that neither the order admitting the will to probate, nor the effect of that order, is in any wise an attack, direct or collateral, upon the decree of distribution; that if through accident, fraud, or mistake the distributees are holding property under the decree, to which they are not entitled, equity will do justice, not by overthrowing the decree of distribution, but by declaring the distributees to be involuntary trustees of the rightful owners of the property. This principle is, of course, well established. Civ. Code, § 2224; State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 81 Am. Dec. 118; Wingerter v. Wingerter, 71 Cal. 105, 11 Pac. 853; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 419, 77 Pac. 1007; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 481, 89 Pac. 317; Insurance Co. v. Hodgson, 7 Cranch, 332, 3 L. Ed. 362; Case of Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. 503, 22 L. Ed. 599. Respondent further argues that only in the probate court can the status of the instrument offered for probate be established as a will (McDaniel v. Pattison, 98 Cal. 86, 27 Pac. 651, 32 Pac. 805; Estate of Christensen, 135 Cal. 674, 68 Pac. 112), and that in the absence of the establishment of the status of the instrument as a will the devisees and legatees named therein could have no standing in a court of equity. Therefore it was right and proper, if adequate proof of the execution and character of the instrument were established, for the court to grant it probate.

This reasoning, we think, is indisputably sound. The sanctity and immunity of a decree of distribution which has become final attaches to the decree itself, and not to those who under it may have derived an unconscionable advantage through fraud, accident, or mistake. Such questions the probate court does not possess the requisite machinery to try. They belong in a court of equity. Estate of Hudson, 63 Cal. 454; Dean v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 473; Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358. Nor are we here called on to anticipate the decision of any such question which may in future arise. It is sufficient on this appeal to say that it was proper for the probate court to establish the last will of the deceased to the end that those entitled to take under that will might be in a position to prosecute their rights in equity.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, but I do not think it was essential or appropriate to offer the will for probate in the probate court as such. The exclusive jurisdiction of the probate court is a jurisdiction in rem, the res being the estate of the decedent which is to be administered and distributed with due regard to the rights of creditors, heirs, devisees, legatees, and all the world. For this purpose a method of procedure is provided appropriate to a proceeding in rem, and if it has been regular, and has resulted in a final decree of distribution of the residue of the estate to the heirs of the decedent under a decree which declares that he died intestate, there is no longer any res for the probate court to deal with, and its function is ended. But if it turns out that there was a will, which was suppressed, by an heir for the purpose of defrauding devisees or legatees, or, as in this case, lost and undiscovered until after distribution, the remedy of the devisee or legatee against the heir who has received what was rightfully his is in equity to charge the heir as his trustee, and to require him to account and to transfer what he has acquired through the fraud, accident, or mistake. The action in such case is not in rem, but inter partes, and the proper court of equity may determine as between the parties before it whether the will is genuine and duly executed or not, and may in an action between the devisee and a fraudulent spoliator establish the will as against him, upon slighter evidence than would suffice to establish it against all the world in the probate court. I know that what is here said is contrary to what a bare majority of this court decided in McDaniel v. Pattison, 98 Cal. 86, 27 Pac. 651, 32 Pac. 805, but I am nevertheless convinced that it is the law and supported by the weight of reason and authority.

The court, however, and the parties in this case were bound by the decision in the McDaniel Case to prove the will in the probate court, and since the same person is judge of the probate court and of the court of equity in which, according to my opinion, the question of the validity of the will should properly have been tried, and since the parties in interest had notice and appeared, the irregularity of the proceeding, if irregular, was without prejudice and for that reason, if for no other, the order appealed from should be affirmed.

SLOSS, J. I dissent. I quite agree that a court of equity may, in the cases supposed in the majority opinion, give relief by declaring the distributees to be trustees for the rightful owners of the property. But I do not see that the probate of the will is a necessary, or even a proper, prerequisite to the granting of such relief.

The judgment of the probate court is final with respect to the question of testacy or intestacy as well as with respect to the succession to the decedent's property. An action in equity to charge the distributees as trustees does not question the validity of the decree of distribution. It recognizes that decree as adjudicating that the legal title has passed to certain persons, but impresses such title with a trust. As the majority opinion itself points out, this is not an attack upon the finality of the proceedings in probate. The right to have a trust declared depends upon the very fact that the probate court has, as the result of some fraud or mistake, conclusively adjudicated the title to be in some one other than the true owner. It is not claimed by any one that the decree of distribution should or can be set aside or supplanted before equity can give relief. Why, then, is it necessary as a preliminary to such equitable suit to have the will proved in probate? The court has in this very proceeding adjudged that the decedent died intestate. It cannot, after such judgment has become final, again take jurisdiction of the same question and decide it the other way. If the case of McDaniel v. Pattison, 98 Cal. 96, 27 Pac. 651, 32 Pac. 805, decides anything in conflict with these views, I think it should not be followed.

I concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 231*)—MATERIALMEN—RIGHT—PARTIAL DESTRUCTION OF BUILDING.

Where, after a fire which destroys a building under construction, a substantial part of the structure remains, a lien exists for work done and material furnished on the building, even though the language of the mechanic's lien law contemplates a lien upon the structure as well as the land.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 231*)—MATERIALMEN—OWNERS' LIABILITY.

Where a contract between the original contractor and owner is filed, the right of materialmen to enforce liens against the owner depends on whether the original contractor had a money demand against the owner arising out of the contract, and where, when the building was destroyed by fire, the owner owed the original contractor a certain sum, materialmen were entitled to satisfy their liens out of such sum.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 113*)—MATERIALMEN—RIGHTS.

5. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 304*)—OWNER'S LIABILITY TO MATERIALMEN—PERSONAL JUDGMENT.

The service by materialmen of notice upon the owner to withhold from the original contractor an amount sufficient to satisfy their claim, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, operated as a garnishment or equitable assignment in favor of the materialmen of the amount due the original contractor, so that the materialmen were entitled to a personal judgment against the owner; there being an indebtedness due from him to the original contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 632-635; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

6. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 231*)—INSURANCE OF BUILDING.

A provision in a contract for the erection of a building that, if it was wholly or partially destroyed by fire before completion, the loss should be sustained by the owner, who thereby agreed to carry insurance for the amount of labor and material as the work progressed, obviated the usual rule, which places the risk of fire upon the contractor, and required the owner to insure for the mutual benefit of himself and the contractor to the value of the labor and material rendered useless by fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 413; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS FINDINGS.

Where the evidence in a materialman's proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien is sufficient to warrant a finding that the contract between the owner and original contractor was abandoned by mutual consent, the Supreme Court must presume that the trial court so found, especially where the contract was abandoned immediately after the fire following the great California earthquake, which fire partially destroyed the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

8. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—MATERIALMAN—PROCEEDINGS TO ENFORCE LIEN—AMOUNT DUE CONTRACTOR.

Evidence in a materialman's proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien held to sustain a finding that $5,500 was due from the owner to the original contractor when the contract was abandoned by the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

9. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 280*)—MATERIALMAN—PROCEEDINGS TO ENFORCE LIEN—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to enforce a materialman's lien for work and material after the contract had been abandoned by the original contractor, evidence was not admissible that after the fire, which partially destroyed the building before it was completed, the original contractor carried away nearly all of the material on the lot, not tending to show that the abandonment of the contract was due to the original contractor's fault, or that the amount due him was less than that claimed by the materialman.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Thomas Butler against Ng Chung and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against part of defendants, and an order denying a new trial, such defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John A. McGee and F. J. Drum, for appellants. Thomas Butler and Roger Johnson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action to foreclose liens of materialmen and subcontractors. The court gave the plaintiff as assignee of the original claimants a judgment against the owners for $2,988.40, with interest, and also for the foreclosure of a lien upon the property for said amount. The said owners appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint is in six counts, each setting up the claim of one of plaintiff's assignors. The plaintiff alleged the due execution and filing of a written contract between the appellants, as owners, and the defendants Jordan & Cram, as contractors, for the erection of a four-story and basement brick building for the agreed price of $14,000. It is averred that Jordan & Cram proceeded with the construction of the building until on or about the 17th day of April, 1906, when said contract was abandoned, but no notice of cessation of labor has ever been filed. The assignors of plaintiff filed their respective claims of lien, and each during the progress of the work served upon the owners written notice of the furnishing of materials and the performing of labor in the amounts claimed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1184. Each count alleges upon information and belief that at the time of so serving notice, and at all times since, there was and now is due and unpaid from the owners to the contractors on account of the contract price more than $5,000, "which is applicable to the aforesaid claim, and the lien therefor." The answers of the owners undertake to deny (although the denial is perhaps insufficient in form) that at the time of the service of the notices, or thereafter, anything was due from the owners to the contractors. They deny the furnishing of labor or materials by the respective assignors of plaintiff, and allege affirmatively that the building was on the 18th day of April, 1906, destroyed by fire. They allege, further, that the contract has never been completed, and that no money is due or owing to the original contractors. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint (except the third count thereof) were true. With reference to the affirmative matter pleaded, there was a finding "that on the 19th day of April, 1906, a general conflagration took place in the above city and county, by which said building was partially destroyed, without any fault of defendants, but that a material part thereof, of the value of $5,000 remained intact; that at the time of said fire said building was almost but not entirely completed, and had not been accepted, but there was then due to the contractors, Jordan & Cram, by said owners, pursuant to the terms of said contract between them for the erection of said building, the sum of $5,500, no part of which has ever been paid." Judgment followed as above stated.

The briefs of counsel are in large part devoted to a discussion of the question whether the rule declared in Humboldt Lumber Mill Co. v. Crisp, 146 Cal. 686, 81 Pac. 30, 106 Am. St. Rep. 75, is applicable here. In that case it was decided that a mechanic's lien for work and materials furnished for the construction of a building could not attach where the building had without the fault of the owner been destroyed before it was completed and before the claim of lien was filed. This conclusion was based upon the "peculiar language of our mechanic's lien law," providing for a lien, not only upon the building, but also upon the land covered by it and so much other land as may be required for its convenient use and occupation, a mode of expression which, as the court says, "looks to an existing house that can be occupied in the future, and not to a vacant lot upon which no house exists." A further reason for denying a lien in case of the destruction of the structure was found by the court in the view that the true consideration for the lien is the benefit conferred upon the owner by placing labor and materials in his building, and that, where the building is destroyed before completion, no such benefit can be enjoyed by the owner.

[1] We think neither of these grounds is applicable where the destruction is only partial and a substantial part of the structure remains to the owner. There can be no insurmountable difficulty in determining the amount of ground necessary for the convenient use and occupation of a building which has been damaged, but which may be restored and completed so as to be fit for occupancy. Nor is the owner, by such partial destruction, necessarily deprived of all benefit of the labor and materials which have gone into the structure of which a material part remains.

[3] "The liability of an owner, who has on his part complied with all the terms of a valid contract, is limited to the price which by his contract he has agreed to pay." Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 97 Pac. 152; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 179, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588; Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 68 Pac. 481, 57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116; Latson v. Nelson (Cal.) 11 Pac. C. L. J. 589.

[4] But up to this limit of liability the claimants by filing their liens acquire a right to share in any money owing from the owners to the original contractors on account of the contract, and their right, to this extent, is secured by a lien on the property. The court in this case found that at the time of the fire there was due from the owners to the contractors under the contract the sum of $5,500, no part of which has been paid. The effect of the filing of the liens was to transfer from the contractors to the lien claimants the right to receive this money, so far as necessary to satisfy the liens. If the owners are liable for the amount, it does not concern them whether they pay it to the contractors or to the lienors. There being a substantial structure to which the liens may attach, they should be held good to the extent of the amount due from the owners to the contractors.

[5] The finding that this balance was due from the owners to the original contractors justified also the personal judgment against the owners. The service of notices to withhold pursuant to the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, operated, in effect, as a garnishment or equitable assignment of the amounts due or thereafter becoming due to the contractors under the contract, and entitled the persons serving the notice to receive so much of said amounts as would satisfy their claims. Bates v. Santa

Barbara Co., 90 Cal. 543, 27 Pac. 438; Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 24, 56 Pac. 610. The appellants attack, as unsupported by the evidence, this finding that $5,500 was due from the owners to the contractors and was applicable to the payment of the liens. The twelfth clause of the contract, so far as material, is as follows: "In case said work herein provided for shall, before completion, be wholly or partially destroyed by fire, * * * then the loss occasioned thereby shall be sustained by the owners, and the owners agree to carry an insurance for the full amount of labor and material as the work progresses."

[6] This clause does away with the rule in ordinary cases, that the risk of fire is upon the contractor, and that he must rebuild if, before completion, the building is burned. It puts such loss upon the owner, and, in effect, requires him to insure for the mutual benefit of himself and the contractor to the full value of the labor and material that may be subject to destruction by fire during the progress of the work. The owners in this case had taken out a policy of insurance for this purpose in the sum of $10,000. If the progress payments had been made promptly and were sufficient to repay the contractors the full cost of the structure destroyed, the contractors would not have been entitled to any share in the insurance money. But these payments do not usually equal such cost, and in the form in which this contract was drawn it is apparent that they would be insufficient to reimburse the contractors. The parties must be deemed to have contemplated this and to have contracted accordingly for insurance for their mutual benefit.

[7] The pleadings, findings, and evidence do not show the reasons which led to the abandonment of the contract. The owners made no attempt to show that it was by reason of the fault of the contractors, nor was there any attempt by the plaintiffs to prove that it was because of the owners' default in the payments or otherwise. The familiar circumstances following the great fire of April, 1906, which destroyed not only this building, but a vast area of buildings comprising the entire business district and a large part of the residence section of San Francisco, and interrupted for months every enterprise in the city, are a part of the history of the country, and, in connection with the facts of this case, are sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the abandonment was by the mutual consent of the parties. We must presume that the court below found this to be the fact. This would leave the rights of the owners and contractors to be adjusted in accordance with the principles of equity, justice, and the terms of the contract, so far as they can be applied. The contract price of the building was $14,000, and extra work had been done of the value of $2,147. The building required only four days' work and the expenditure of about $800 to complete it. The contractors had received $5,250 on the contract price and $520 on the extra work. This left a balance of $9,577 unpaid on the work done by the contractors at the contract price at the time of the fire. This sum represented the contractors' loss from the fire. Under the circumstances, the contractors would, in justice and equity, be entitled to demand of the owners a much larger sum than the $5,500 found due by the court.

[8] The finding is therefore sustained by the evidence, and it affords an adequate basis for the judgment of foreclosure, as well as for the personal judgment against the owners.

The finding as to the value of the part of the building remaining after the fire is supported by the evidence of one of the contractors which it is not necessary to discuss further.

[9] It is urged that the court erred in refusing to permit the appellants to show that after the fire the original contractors had carried away all materials remaining on the lot except the foundation and the part of the walls which had not fallen. The evidence was properly excluded. Unless it had some tendency to show that the abandonment of the building was due to the fault of the contractors, or to reduce the contractors' loss to less than $5,500, it was immaterial. There was no proposal to show that their conduct in taking away these materials was without the consent of the owners, or that it was not done pursuant to the agreement of abandonment. With these facts it might have a slight tendency to prove that the abandonment was the act of the contractor alone, but without these additional facts we cannot perceive that any inference to that effect could be drawn. No evidence that they had any value whatever was offered.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LITCH v. WHITE, City Marshal, et al.
(Sac. 1,895.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 173*)—CITY MARSHAL—LIABILITIES—OFFICIAL BONDS.

Under a city ordinance which declared that all porches or roofs in a fire district should be kept in a safe condition, and that whenever dilapidated or unsafe, so as to menace the safety of firemen required to go thereon in case of fire, should be made safe on five days' notice by the city marshal, and that on neglect to make safe they should be declared nuisances, which the marshal should abate after five days' notice to the owner, the marshal is not bound to make an inspection of all structures in a district, but must give the notice required only when he has notice of the dangerous or unsafe condition, and he or the surety on his official bond is not liable for injuries to a fireman caused by the falling of a porch on which he had been required to go to extinguish a fire, where it is not shown that there was any patent defect in the porch or that the marshal had actual knowledge or notice of its unsafe condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 48*)—CONDITION OF BUILDING—OWNER'S KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECT OR DANGER.

Under an ordinance which declared that porches and roofs in a fire district should be kept in a safe condition, and that, if they became unsafe for firemen required to go thereon in case of fire, they should be made safe on notice from the city marshal, or, if not made safe, should be declared nuisances, an owner is only required to put his roof or porch in such a condition as may be specifically required of him by the city authorities with a view to the proper protection of firemen, so that an owner is not liable to a fireman injured by the falling of his porch, where it is not shown that he had any notice or knowledge of its dangerous condition or of facts from which such notice or knowledge might be inferred.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by A. G. Litch against Harry D. White, Marshal of the City of Chico, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company (a corporation), and L. Van Vlack. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lon Bond and W. H. Carlin, for appellant. Guy R. Kennedy, Richard White, Thomas Gerstle, and Frick & Beedy, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendants, in an action for damages for personal injuries, given upon sustaining the demurrers of defendants to his complaint, and his failure to file an amended complaint.

The complaint substantially states the following facts: During the whole of the year 1906, the defendant Van Vlack was the owner and in the possession of a lot of land with a one-story building situated thereon, fronting on Broadway street, in the city of Chico, known as 218 Broadway street, "together with that certain porch or awning connected with said building, and being approximately 12 feet in width and 20 feet in length, and approximately 14 feet above and extending over the sidewalk along Broadway street at said place." This property was within the limits of a fire district of said city lawfully created by the board of trustees thereof. The said "awning or porch * * * was not in or kept in a safe or substantial condition, but, on the contrary, was in an unsafe and dangerous condition, and was, and during all the said times continued to be, in such an unsafe and dangerous condition as to menace and it did menace, and was a menace to, the safety of firemen or any fireman required to go thereon in case of fire." On July 23, 1906, a fire broke out near said premises of Van Vlack. Shortly thereafter, plaintiff, a member of the fire department of Chico, "was required to, and did in the exercise of his duties as such fireman and for the purpose of extinguishing such fire, go upon said porch or awning," and while so upon such porch or awning, "because of and owing to the said unsafe, dangerous, and unsubstantial condition of said porch or awning, the same fell to the sidewalk beneath it, precipitating plaintiff down to and upon" the sidewalk beneath, injuring him seriously, to his damage, it is alleged, in the sum of $20,000. There was an ordinance of the city of Chico, section 9 of which was as follows: "All awnings, porches, sheds or roofs in said fire district [the district including Van Vlack's property] shall be kept in a safe and substantial condition, and wherever the same or any part thereof shall become dilapidated or be in a dangerous or unsafe condition, so as to menace the safety of pedestrians passing on the sidewalks or firemen required to go thereon in case of fire, the same shall be put in a safe state of repair on five days' notice by the city marshal, and in case the owner or agent of said awning, porch, roof or shed refuses or neglects to so repair the same, it is hereby declared to be a nuisance and shall be abated or removed in the manner provided in section six of this article." Said section 6 authorizes and directs the marshal to himself abate a nuisance after five days' notice to the owner, etc. During the whole of the year 1906, defendant White was the city marshal of said city, and the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company was the surety on his official bond as such marshal. "Notwithstanding said dangerous and unsafe condition of said porch or awning during said time, neither said owner, said Van Vlack, nor said Harry D. White, marshal of said city of Chico, because of their, and each of their, negligence and failure to perform their duties in the premises, did anything whatever, neither gave nor served any notice, nor took, nor caused to be taken, any steps to repair, or cause the same to be repaired, or put in a safe or substantial state or condition, or removed or abated."

[1] The complaint fails to state a cause of action against White, the city marshal, and consequently against the Fidelity & Guaranty Company, his surety. It is nowhere alleged therein that White had any notice or knowledge that the "porch or awning" was in such a condition "as to menace the safety of pedestrians passing on the sidewalk or firemen required to go thereon in case of fire," nor are any facts alleged from which it may be concluded that he should have had such knowledge. There is absolutely nothing to show that there was any patent defect therein, or, indeed, any defect that would have been discovered upon a reasonably careful inspection of the premises. We do not, however, think that the ordinance should be construed as making it the duty of the marshal to make an inspection of all the structures mentioned with a view to ascertaining their condition in the respects mentioned. Certainly that duty is not in terms imposed by any provision of the ordinance, and we think that the utmost that can be claimed in regard thereto is that the marshal must give the notice required whenever he has notice of the dangerous or unsafe condition. Such notice might perhaps be inferred from the appearance of the structure in certain cases, but where there is nothing in the appearance of the structure to indicate that the same is in a dangerous or unsafe condition, and actual knowledge of such condition has not been acquired by the marshal in any other way, there is no liability on his part for failure to give the notice to the property owner or to otherwise proceed under the ordinance. It follows that knowledge or notice by the marshal of the defective condition must be alleged in order to state a cause of action against him. The case of Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171, is not opposed to this view. In that case the duty of maintaining a highway in good repair was expressly imposed upon the marshal and trustees, and they were directly charged with negligence in the performance of that duty.

[2] As to defendant Van Vlack, the owner of the premises, the complaint is also without any allegation of notice or knowledge of any defect, or of facts from which such notice or knowledge must be inferred. The building is alleged to be a one-story building, and, as we read the complaint, the "porch or awning" extended from the top thereof over the sidewalk below, and was nothing more than a covering designed simply to protect from the sun or weather, and was obviously not intended for occupancy by human beings. Nothing to oppose this theory appears in the complaint, which must be taken here as stating plaintiff's case as strongly as it can be stated. The sum and substance of the charge made by the complaint in relation to the condition of the "porch or awning" is that it was not substantial enough to support the weight of a person going thereon. In the absence of some valid law expressly providing otherwise, there was, of course, no duty resting on the owner to make such a "porch or awning" substantial enough to support a human being. No person was invited or could reasonably be expected by him to go thereon. The whole effect of section 9 of the ordinance, as we construe it, is to require the property owner to put his awnings, porches, sheds, and roofs in such a condition as may be specifically required of him by the city authorities with a view to the proper protection of pedestrians and firemen, failing to do which his structures will become a nuisance, abatable in the manner provided in the ordinance. In other words, the section imposes no obligation upon him in the absence of the five days' notice specified therein that does not exist independent of the ordinance.

It follows from what we have said that the complaint does not state facts showing a liability on the part of Van Vlack independent of the ordinance, and that the facts alleged are not sufficient to make him liable to plaintiff under the provisions of the ordinance. We have assumed without deciding the question that the ordinance is in all respects valid.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by H. A. Weller against R. M. Brown and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. W. Preston and Preston & Preston, for appellants. Mannon & Mannon, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action to quiet title to a parcel of land 200 feet in length and 60 feet in width, situated in the city of Ft. Bragg, county of Mendocino. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendants appeal.

The complaint contained the usual allegations that the plaintiff was the owner of the property in question, that the defendants claimed an adverse interest therein, and that their claim was without right. The answer admits that the defendants claim an interest in the land, and alleges that they are the owners of an easement therein, to wit, the privilege of ingress and egress over the same as a public highway or street and an easement for a right of way appurtenant to the lands of the defendant Louisa M. Brown adjoining the lands described in the complaint. As a separate defense the defendants allege that on July 7, 1906, defendant Louisa M. Brown owned a lot or block of land and that the parcel described in the complaint constituted a strip of land 60 feet in width running through the center of said land; that the land on either side of said strip belongs to the defendants; that on said July 7, 1906, the plaintiff took a deed from Louisa M. Brown for the parcel in controversy, with the understanding and agreement that said land should not be used as a building lot; and that it should be and become a public street or highway for public use, and likewise that it should be and become an easement appurtenant to the remaining lands so owned by the defendant Louisa M. Brown for the purpose of ingress and egress to and therefrom. It is alleged that the right and privilege to use the said land is necessary and convenient for the use and occupation by said defendant of her adjoining land, and that she owns an easement or right of way over and upon said

WELLER v. BROWN et al. (S. F. 5,289.)

1. DEEDS (§ 165*)—CONDITION—COMPLIANCE WITH COVENANTS.

In the absence of a provision that title shall revert in case of a breach of a covenant as to the use of land conveyed, such covenant will not be construed as creating a condition, so that a provision of a deed, executed by defendant to plaintiff, of land lying between other lands of defendant, that it was mutually agreed that the land conveyed should be used as a public street and not as a building lot, was not a condition so as to make title to revert to defendant on plaintiff's failure to comply with the covenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 521; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

2. COVENANTS (§ 70*)—COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND—IMPOSING BURDEN.

A covenant in a deed by defendant to plaintiff of land located between defendant's other lands that the strip conveyed should be used as a public street, and not for a building lot, was not a covenant running with the land, not being made for the benefit of the lot, but imposing a burden thereon; Civ. Code, § 1461, providing that only the covenants specified in the title and those incidental thereto shall run with the land, and section 1462 providing that every covenant in a grant which is made for the direct benefit of the property runs with the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 70, 71; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. EASEMENTS (§ 12*)—CONTRACTS.

While easements are usually acquired by grant or prescription, they may be acquired by contract where it is evident from the nature of the subject-matter that the parties contemplated that privileges intended for the permanent use of the property should be an incident of the principal contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-41; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

4. EASEMENTS (§ 14*)—RIGHT OF WAY—CONTRACTS.

Where the grantor of a strip, when the deed was executed, owned land lying on either side thereof, an agreement in the deed that the strip conveyed should be used as a public street and not for a building lot was a reservation to the grantor of such rights in the strip conveyed as he would have in a public street, and a negative easement prohibiting the erection of a land, which easement is appurtenant to her adjoining lands.

The court found that the plaintiff is, and ever since the 7th day of July, 1906, has been, the owner in fee of the land in controversy; that on and prior to July 7, 1906, the defendant Louisa M. Brown owned the block of land described in her answer, including the strip in controversy, and that the defendants now own the lands adjoining said strip on either side; that on July 7, 1906, the defendants had executed and delivered to plaintiff a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the land described in the complaint, which deed contained, after the granting clause, the following covenant: "It is hereby mutually agreed between the parties of the first part (defendants) and the party of the second part (plaintiff) that the above described land is to be used as a public street and not as a lot for building purposes." The plaintiff accepted said deed and paid as consideration therefor the sum of $450, which was the full value of said land. At the time of the execution and delivery of the deed the plaintiff verbally agreed with the defendants that he would pay them the full value of said land and hold possession of the same, and that, if the city of Ft. Bragg could be induced to buy said land for street purposes, the plaintiff would deed said land to the city on receipt of the amount he paid the defendants therefor, and thereupon the same might become a public street. It was found that there was no other or further agreement between the parties respecting the lands in controversy; that the right to travel and use the lands in controversy is not necessary, but is convenient for the use and occupation by the defendant Louisa M. Brown of the lands she owns that adjoin the land in controversy. It is then found that Louisa M. Brown does not and never has owned an easement over said land, and that her claim to such easement is without right. Upon these findings, conclusions of law followed to the effect that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the land and that defendants have no right, title, or interest therein, and judgment quieting plaintiff's title was entered.

The evidence is brought up in a bill of exceptions, and we shall set forth so much of it, in addition to the facts disclosed by the foregoing findings, as may be necessary to the consideration of this appeal. As above stated, the plaintiff derived title to the strip in controversy by means of a grant, bargain, and sale deed from the defendants, the deed containing a covenant whereby the parties agreed that the land conveyed was to be used as a public street and not as a lot for building purposes. The strip, as appears from a plat introduced in evidence, runs east and west. A street, known as Main street, runs north and south across the westerly end of the strip, and bounds, as well, the remaining land of Mrs. Brown in the same block. A street named Bush street intersects the westerly line of Main street directly opposite the end of the strip in controversy, in such manner that the strip, if opened, would form a continuation eastward of Bush street. The question to be decided is whether the deed, read in connection with these circumstances existing at the date of its execution, reserved to the grantors any interests in the land conveyed.

[1] It is quite clear that the grant to plaintiff was not conditional upon his compliance with the terms of the covenant. In the absence of a provision that title shall revert in case of breach of a covenant regarding the use of the land, such covenant is not construed as creating a condition. Behlow v. Southern Pacific Co., 130 Cal. 16, 62 Pac. 295; Los Angeles Terminal Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 68 Pac. 308; Hawley v. Kafitz, 148 Cal. 393, 83 Pac. 248, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 113 Am. St. Rep. 282.

[2] Nor is the covenant one running with the land. "It was not made for the benefit of the lot conveyed but purported to impose a burden thereon by restricting its use; and, while a benefit will pass with the land to which it is incident, a burden will adhere exclusively to the original covenantor, unless a privity of estate or tenure subsists or be created between the covenantor and the covenantee at the time the covenant is made." Los Angeles Terminal Co. v. Muir, supra; Civ. Code, §§ 1461, 1462. Then, too, the covenant in question does not purport to bind the successors in interest of the grantee or inure to the benefit of the successors of the grantor. Viewed as a covenant, it is a purely personal one, and would not be enforceable at law except as between the parties. In that aspect it creates no limitation upon the absolute title conveyed. Under the form of the present action, we are not called upon to consider whether such covenant would be specifically enforced in equity as against the covenantor or one succeeding to his interest with notice of the covenant. The defendants are not seeking to enjoin the violation of the covenant, but are asserting that they are the owners of an interest in the land conveyed.

Apart, however, from the various considerations above suggested, there still remains a way by which the restrictive words of the deed may be given effect; that is, by construing them as intended to reserve an easement in the land granted for the benefit of the remaining and adjoining land of the grantors.

[3] "While easements are generally acquired by grant or prescription, it is also true that they may be acquired by contract, where from the nature of the subject-matter it is evident that the parties intended that privileges designed for the permanent use of the property should form an incident of the principal contract." Jones on Easements, § 104; Hogan v. Barry, 142 Mass. 538, 10

N. E. 253; Shannon v. Timm, 22 Colo. 167, 43 Pac. 1021. In Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 395, 19 Atl. 190, 193, Vice Chancellor Van Fleet used this language: "That when it appears to be the true construction of the terms of a grant that it was the well-understood purpose of the parties to create or reserve a right, in the nature of a servitude or easement in the property granted, for the benefit of other land owned by the grantor, no matter in what form such purpose may be expressed, whether it be in the form of a condition, or covenant, or reservation, or exception, such right, if not against public policy, will be held to be appurtenant to the land of the grantor and binding on that conveyed to the grantee, and the right and burthen thus created and imposed will pass with the lands to all subsequent grantees."

Thus in Hathaway v. Hathaway, 159 Mass. 584, 35 N. E. 85, the deed contained a clause providing that as part of the consideration the grantee agreed to open and construct a public way to lead in a certain direction across her land and the land therein conveyed, and to prepare and keep the same open for travel until accepted by the city. It was held that this agreement operated by way of reservation or implied grant, and created an easement over the land then conveyed for the benefit of the grantors of the remaining land.

[4] The case last cited is in its essential facts not distinguishable from the one at bar. It is here alleged and found that the grantors of the strip in question were at the time of the grant, and have ever since remained, the owners of the land on either side of the strip. The deed contains an agreement or covenant that the strip conveyed is not to be used for building purposes, but is to be used as a public street. The natural and reasonable conclusion to be drawn from these facts is that the covenant or agreement was required by the grantors for the benefit of their remaining land. It is true that this agreement would not in and of itself effect a dedication of the strip as a public street. It was, however, sufficient as between the parties to constitute a reservation in favor of the owners of the adjoining land of such rights as they would have in a public street, and, further, to reserve to them a negative easement prohibiting the erection of any building upon the strip. The circumstance that the defendants received from the plaintiff the full value of the land conveyed is in no way inconsistent with this conclusion. It is not claimed that the transaction was induced by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, or that the deed did not truly express the agreement of the parties. If the instrument, correctly interpreted, reserves an easement which lessens the value of the property conveyed, the fact that the purchaser may have made a disadvantageous bargain does not justify a court in destroying the reservation. Likewise, the oral testimony to the effect that plaintiff agreed to hold the land and to convey it to the city for a street upon payment to him of the amount he had paid shows no more than that an immediate dedication to the public was not contemplated. Such agreement (assuming that evidence of it may be considered as against the written terms of the deed) may be given full effect without setting aside the covenant restricting the grantee's use of the land pending a purchase by the city. A private easement, equivalent to that of an abutter on a public street, may exist, although the public has acquired no right.

[5] We see no force in the contention that the covenant must fall as being irreconcilable with the granting clause. Civ. Code, § 1070. There is no repugnancy between a conveyance of the fee and a reservation of an easement affecting the land conveyed. In accordance with these views, we think the finding that the plaintiff never had any agreement or understanding with the defendants that "the lands in controversy should be or become an easement appurtenant to the remaining lands conveyed by the defendant Louisa M. Brown for the purpose of ingress thereto or egress therefrom" must, if not regarded as a mere conclusion erroneously drawn from the other facts found, be held to be contrary to the evidence. So, too, the findings that the defendant Louisa M. Brown does not and never did own an easement over the land in question, and that she had no right, title, or interest in said lands, are unsupported by the evidence.

Upon the facts shown in the record, the court below should have found that the defendant Louisa M. Brown was the owner of an easement in the land as above stated, and should in its decree have declared the plaintiff's title to be subject to such easement.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

OSBORN v. HOPKINS. (S. F. 5,632.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1911.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 183*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF ALLEGATIONS.

The defense of the statute of limitations is sufficiently pleaded by an answer, though the section and subdivision of the statute are not alleged, where the facts showing the bar of the statute are pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 683-692; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—MOTION—STATEMENT AS TO GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The specification in a motion for new trial, under the heading, "Specification of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict," was that the evidence showed that the statute of limitations had run as to the services alleged to have been rendered by plaintiff's assignor in certain legal proceedings. Held, that the specification of insufficiency of evidence as to the question of limitations as a ground for new trial was sufficient, since a specification is sufficient where it is of such a nature as to fully inform the trial court and the opposing party of the point to be made as to the insufficiency of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 43*)—ACCRUAL OF RIGHT OF ACTION.

The statute of limitations begins to run upon the accrual of the right of action; that is, when a suit may be maintained, and not until that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-219; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 50*)—ACCRUAL OF RIGHT OF ACTION—SEPARATE OR CONTINUING CONTRACTS—ATTORNEY'S PROFESSIONAL SERVICES.

An attorney was retained and employed by defendant, who anticipated that several suits would be brought against him by his wife, to represent him in any and all litigation which his wife might prosecute against him arising out of their marital relations and the enforcement of their marital rights and obligations, including any action or actions she might bring for divorce, or for separate maintenance for herself and a minor child, or for the custody of said child. The contract was not in writing, and there was no understanding as to the amount of compensation, or as to the time when the right to it should accrue. An action against defendant for divorce was terminated in 1902, and an action of prohibition instituted by the wife was terminated the same year, and the wife's action for maintenance was undetermined and pending when the attorney's assignee, after demand in November, 1906, began an action to recover for services. Held, that the services were not rendered upon an entire or continuing contract, but that at the termination of the separate divorce and prohibition proceedings the attorney's right of action for services accrued, and the statute was set in motion, and that, as to services in those proceedings, his right of action was barred.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by William C. Osborn against William F. Hopkins. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel M. Shortridge, for appellant. C. H. Wilson, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,500 as the reasonable value of legal services rendered by plaintiff's assignor to defendant. The services rendered by plaintiff's assignor were rendered by him (1) in representing the defendant, as his attorney, in an action for divorce brought against him by his wife in the latter part of the year 1901 or the early part of the year 1902, which action was finally terminated in the early part of the year 1902 by a dismissal by plaintiff of her action; (2) in representing the superior court of San Francisco, on behalf of defendant, in a proceeding instituted in this court by defendant's wife to prohibit said superior court from proceeding with the trial of said divorce action after her dismissal thereof, which proceeding in prohibition was terminated by judgment of this court on June 13, 1902; and (3) in representing defendant, as his attorney, in an action brought against him by his wife for maintenance and support, commenced shortly after the termination of the prohibition proceedings, and pending undetermined at the date of the commencement of this action, which was December 31, 1906. The action for maintenance was terminated by the death of defendant's wife on February 18, 1907, plaintiff's assignor continuing to represent defendant therein until that date. On November 17, 1906, plaintiff's assignor sent to defendant a bill for his services already rendered, specifying $1,000 as the amount due for services in the divorce action and the prohibition proceedings and $500 for his services in the maintenance action, and subsequently commenced this action therefor. Defendant, among other defenses, interposed the plea of the statute of limitations as to all services rendered by plaintiff's assignor in the divorce action and the prohibition proceeding. The jury gave a verdict in plaintiff's favor for $1,125. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was ordered granted unless plaintiff remitted $625 of said verdict and the judgment entered thereon. Plaintiff refused to consent to such reduction, and the court thereupon made its order granting a new trial "upon the sole and only ground that as to the said six hundred and twenty-five ($625.00) dollars, the cause of action set up in the complaint is barred by the statute of limitation." This is an appeal by plaintiff from such order.

In view of the specification in the order as to the sole ground upon which the motion was granted, it must be assumed here, in accord with the allegations of the amended complaint, that defendant, prior to the commencement of the divorce action and in anticipation of litigation with his wife, "retained and employed" plaintiff's assignor "as his attorney to represent him in any and all litigation which his said wife might institute and prosecute against him, arising out of their relationship of husband and wife, for the enforcement of their marital rights, duties, and obligations, including any action or actions she might bring for divorce or for separate support and maintenance for herself and a minor child or for the custody of said child." The jury found, in response to special interrogatories submitted, that such a contract of retainer and employment was then entered into that defendant then anticipated that there would be more than one suit brought against him by his wife and intended to contract with reference to more than one suit, and that such contract of employment extended to and covered service other than such service as might be rendered in the divorce suit. The contract was not in writing, and there was no understanding between the parties as to the amount of compensation, or as to the time or times when the right to compensation should accrue.

[1] There is no basis for the claim that the defense of the statute of limitations was not sufficiently set up in the answer. It was not necessary to plead the section and subdivision of the statute, if the facts showing the bar of the statute were alleged. It was alleged in the answer that as to all services rendered in the action for divorce and in the prohibition proceeding the statute of limitations had run against any claim for compensation, that all such services were rendered prior to the 13th day of June, 1902, and "that plaintiff's cause of action for compensation for said services did not accrue within two years next before the commencement of this action." This is a sufficient pleading of the facts showing the defense. Adams v. Patterson, 35 Cal. 124; Caulfield v. Sanders, 17 Cal. 571; Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 45, 87 Am. Dec. 146; Hartson v. Hardin, 40 Cal. 264.

[2] It is claimed that there is no sufficient specification of insufficiency of evidence in the statement on motion for new trial to have enabled the trial court to consider the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence on the question of the statute of limitations in determining the motion for a new trial. The specification on that subject was contained under the heading, "Specification of Particulars in which the Evidence is Insufficient to Justify the Verdict," and was as follows: "The evidence shows that the statute of limitations has run as to the services alleged to have been rendered by the attorney Linforth for the defendant in the matter of the case of Hopkins v. Hopkins, originally commenced in Alameda county, including the services in the Supreme Court on the writ of prohibition growing out of said suit." We have no doubt that this specification should be held to be sufficient. It certainly fulfilled the purpose of the statute requiring specifications of insufficiency of evidence, viz., "the bringing directly before the mind of the court the particular point the aggrieved party desires to be reviewed, and also to give notice to the adverse party of the point of attack, and thereby enabling him to produce any additional evidence found in the record which may tend to support the finding of fact assailed by the specification." Brenot v. Brenot, 102 Cal. 297, 36 Pac. 672. The plain effect of the language of this specification was that the conclusion of the jury upon the issue of the statute of limitations was not sustained by the evidence—that the evidence was not sufficient to support such conclusion, and such language could not be understood by any reasonable person as meaning anything else. The mere form is of no consequence if such was the plain meaning. To hold otherwise would be to sacrifice substance to form in a case where any particular form is not made essential by written law. It is true that such a specification has been held insufficient (see De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 548, 52 Pac. 825, and cases there cited), but this ruling has been repudiated by the later decisions of this court. See Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 675, 72 Pac. 142; Drathman v. Cohen, 139 Cal. 311, 73 Pac. 181. As was said in Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 194, 74 Pac. 776, the strict rule of some of the earlier decisions of this court in regard to specification of insufficiency of evidence has by the later decisions been much relaxed "in harmony with the more liberal view which will afford a hearing" on the merits "where reasonable and ordinarily careful precautions have been taken to present specifications, rather than to defeat the right to be heard upon purely technical grounds." If a specification is of such a nature as to fully inform the trial court and the opposing party of the point to be made in regard to insufficiency of evidence, there can no longer be any doubt as to its sufficiency.

This brings us to the main question presented on this appeal, that of the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in regard to the statute of limitations. Plaintiff's position is substantially that all of the services rendered were rendered under an entire contract, full performance of which was essential to any recovery, that this contract was not terminated until a time less than two years before the commencement of this action, and that the right of the plaintiff to recover reasonable compensation for any of these services is not barred by the statute of limitations until the expiration of two years from such termination. Logically, this view would appear to subject plaintiff's complaint to the objection that it does not state a cause of action, for it is distinctly alleged therein, in accord with the facts shown by the evidence, that the action for maintenance and support "still is pending and undetermined," and that the defendant therein "was and is represented in said action" by plaintiff's assignor.

[3] If the statute of limitations did not begin to run as to the compensation for any of the services rendered under the employment until the plaintiff's assignor had fully performed all services contemplated thereunder, it must also be true that no right of action on account of any such services accrued until such full performance was had, for it is elementary law that the statute of limitations begins to run upon the accrual of the right of action; that is, when a suit may be maintained, and not until that time. If plaintiff's view be correct, it would therefore seem to follow that the complaint showed on its face that a right of action had not accrued at the date of the commencement of the action; in other words, that the action was prematurely brought.

[4] We do not think that plaintiff's view of the nature of the contract of employment can be held to be correct. Of course, such a contract as plaintiff claims this to be could have been made by the parties, but we are satisfied that the contract alleged and found cannot reasonably be held to indicate an intention to make any such contract. In the absence of provision clearly indicating such an intention, no such effect can reasonably be given to a mere employment or retainer of a lawyer to represent the employer in all possible future litigation of a certain character, indefinite both as to the number of suits or proceedings that may be included, and the period of time within which such suits or proceedings may be instituted, where the attorney is to be paid simply the reasonable value of such services as he is actually called upon to perform in such litigation as may be instituted. And such was the employment or retainer in the case at bar, taking it in the aspect most favorable to plaintiff. The employment of plaintiff's assignor differed from a general retainer of an attorney to attend to all litigation in which the employer may become involved in the future, or even from a general retainer to attend to all the employer's legal business, only in the fact that it was limited by its terms to possible litigation of a specified character, a difference that we regard as altogether immaterial. It is clear that, under a general retainer contemplating services in possible distinct matters to be attended to separately, in the absence of any provision at all as to time or amount of payment, the attorney's right of action must accrue upon the performance and completion of the service as to each matter. See 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 209. When in the course of such general employment the prosecution or defense of a suit is undertaken by the attorney, such suit undoubtedly constitutes a single, distinct matter, and the attorney's right of action for services therein accrues with the completion of his services therein, viz., at the termination of the suit, or other sooner termination of his employment therein. But his right of action is certainly complete at the termination of the suit, even though the general contract of retainer is not terminated. See 25 Cyc. 1081. It can make no difference, so far as the rule we have been discussing is concerned, that the retainer or employment is limited to possible litigation of a specified character. We still have a retainer relating to several possible distinct matters, to be attended to separately as they may arise, with absolutely nothing to indicate that it was contemplated by the parties that the right to compensation for such services as might actually be rendered in one of such matters should be dependent upon the full performance of such services as might be necessary in the other matters, or that the attorney should not be entitled to enforce his claim for compensation in any one of such matters upon the completion of his services therein. So far as the retainer covers that particular matter, it is ended when such matter is concluded.

We are satisfied that, as was said by the District Court of Appeal in deciding this case, "when an attorney is retained generally to represent his client in such uncertain and unascertained suits as may be brought against the client by a designated person as in this case, the statute is set in motion, as to the services rendered in each suit, upon the full performance of the services in such suit." As we read them, none of the authorities cited by learned counsel for appellant is clearly in conflict with our views. The only cases so cited as to which there can be any doubt in this respect are Meyer v. McCumber, 75 Ill. App. 119, and Davis v. Smith, 48 Vt. 52. We think that the District Court of Appeal was correct in its conclusion that the first of these cases is distinguishable from the case at bar in that the contract there was one for the collection of a certain designated claim, which might well be considered a single matter, and all of the services of the attorneys were necessarily performed in accomplishing that purpose, viz., the collection of such claim. As said by the District Court of Appeal, it is not clear from the opinion in Davis v. Smith, supra, that the court held that, where there was a single retainer of an attorney in two suits, the mere fact that one of such suits was still pending would prevent the running of the statute of limitations as to services rendered in the other, which had been terminated.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

SULLOWAY v. SULLOWAY. (Sac. 1,763.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1911.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 40*)—IRRIGATION—RIGHT TO SUPPLY OF WATER.

Equal areas of land were devised by the same will to plaintiff and defendant, with the request that they use jointly the water and irrigating ditch, as they were desired to be joint owners of the ditch and of the water rights, and the decree of distribution followed the will. The irrigation ditch entered and was wholly upon defendant's land, and plaintiff extended the ditch from its terminus over defendant's land to the boundary of his own land, which without irrigation was worthless; that being the only way he could use the water rights devised to him. Held, in an action to be let into undisturbed possession of a part of the water rights and of the extended ditch, and to establish a perpetual easement on defendant's land for the benefit of plaintiff's land, that in view of Civ. Code, § 3522, declaring that one who grants a thing is presumed to grant whatever is essential to its use, if that be within the power of the grantor, plaintiff was entitled to extend the ditch, and to have an undisturbed use of it for the benefit of his land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*)—DETERMINATION OF CASE—REVERSAL—DIRECTING PROCEEDINGS.

A devisee of the use and benefit of an irrigation ditch jointly with another devisee, upon whose land the ditch entered and terminated, extended the ditch from its terminus to the boundary of his own land, and in his action to be let into possession of his moiety of the water rights and for an adjudication of his right to maintain and use the extended ditch the complaint did not allege the size or capacity of the original ditch, or the capacity and location of the extended ditch, and no issue was tendered as to these matters, or as to the plaintiff's right of joint user as the ditch existed before the extension. After the trial plaintiff's motion to open the case for the introduction of evidence as to those points was denied. Held that, the plaintiff's right to prevail on the merits being clear upon the finding, the absolute denial of his motion to introduce evidence was error, for which the judgment would be reversed, and the trial court directed to receive such evidence, to find the facts thereon, and enter judgment for the plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by John W. Sulloway against Charles F. Sulloway. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff's motions to open the case after trial for the admission of additional evidence and for a new trial were denied, and he appealed. Order denying new trial affirmed and judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to receive additional evidence, and find the facts thereon, and enter judgment for plaintiff.

Frank W. Hooper and James F. Farraher, for appellant. Taylor & Tebbe, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Mary Sulloway, the mother of the parties to this action, gave to plaintiff by her last will certain real property in section 7, township 40 N., range 4 W., Mt. D. M., in Siskiyou county, being the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section. By the same will she gave to defendant certain real property in said section, including the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section. By the same will she provided as follows: "I * * * give and devise unto my sons John W. Sulloway and Charles F. Sulloway, and request that they use jointly the water or irrigating ditch that now conveys water upon and to section 7 in township 40 north of range 4 west M. D. M., as I desire them to be joint owners of the said ditch and water right." The decree of distribution made May 15, 1902, in the matter of her estate gave to plaintiff the land devised to him by the will, the only portion thereof located in said section 7 being that above described, "together with the undivided one-half of the water right and ditch now used to convey water upon section 7 in township 40 north of range 4 west M. D. M.," and gave to defendant the land devised to him by the will, and also the undivided one-half, etc., of the water right and ditch by substantially the same language as that used in reference to plaintiff. It is not claimed that there is any material difference between the effect of the language of the will and that of the decree of distribution in this respect. The ditch referred to entered the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 7 at a point on land given to defendant, and traversed a portion of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, but did not reach plaintiff's portion of said S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, ending, according to the findings, at a point "near to" the northerly boundary line of plaintiff's portion, and, according to the evidence, some "100 to 300 feet north of the north boundary of plaintiff's land." The extension of said ditch from its then terminus across defendant's land to plaintiff's land is the only means whereby plaintiff can conduct his waters upon such land and secure the use and enjoyment of his moiety in such water right and water ditch without working damage to defendant's land; and without such extension plaintiff's rights in the water and the water ditch will be rendered utterly valueless. Plaintiff's said land is agricultural in character, and capable, with proper irrigation, of producing large crops of hay, grain, grasses, and vegetables, but without irrigation it is of no value except for grazing purposes during a small portion of each year. The use of this water is necessary for such irrigation. Defendant never disputed the right of plaintiff "to use his half of said ditch and water right as the same existed at the death of said Mary Sulloway, but did deny the plaintiff the right to erect a ditch across any part or portion of defendant's lands, or to make a ditch or part of a ditch where there was no ditch at the time of the death of said Mary Sulloway." Plaintiff in October, 1904, did extend "said ditch" from its terminus across defendant's land to his northerly boundary line, and by means thereof conducted water to such land, and made a beneficial use thereof on such land. De-defendant subsequently stoppèd such use. In September, 1908, plaintiff repaired said ditch and extension and was attempting to make use thereof when defendant filled up a portion of such extension, and has ever since refused to allow plaintiff to obtain any use of the water or water ditch in the way proposed. The facts we have stated are alleged in plaintiff's complaint and established by the findings of the trial court.

By his complaint, plaintiff asked to be let into possession, use, and enjoyment of his moiety in said water right and water ditch, and of the extension of said ditch across defendant's land to his land for the purpose of conducting his moiety of said water to his land, that the court decree a perpetual easement to exist upon defendant's land in favor of his land in said extension of said ditch and that defendant be restrained from interfering with the same.

The case came on for trial February 8, 1909, and plaintiff introduced the testimony upon which he relied, and rested. Defendant introduced no evidence, and the matter was continued to February 11, 1909, for argument. At the argument defendant made the point that there was no evidence to show the amount of water owned or used by Mrs. Sulloway in her lifetime, or the capacity of her ditch, or the size or capacity of the proposed ditch which plaintiff claimed would be necessary to erect across defendant's land. Plaintiff asked the court to open the case and permit him to introduce testimony on these points, and, defendant objecting on the ground that the witnesses had been allowed to go, and that the proposed evidence would not be material under the pleadings, the court denied the application of plaintiff. The case was then submitted, and on March 6, 1909, judgment was given in favor of defendant that plaintiff take nothing by his action.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is to be observed that what plaintiff sought by his complaint, so far as an extension of the old ditch was concerned, was an adjudication of his right to maintain and use a ditch which had been already constructed and maintained by him over defendant's land. It was the ditch already laid out and constructed by plaintiff over defendant's land as to which a decree was sought; in other words, the ditch already marked out and constructed by him on the lands of defendant. No more definite description of the route of the ditch was essential in the complaint under the circumstances. Defendant by his answer admitted the construction of this ditch by plaintiff, his own filling up of the same, the subsequent cleaning out of the ditch by plaintiff, and his own second filling up of the same. Defendant made no claim in the lower court, and makes no claim here, that the route actually selected for the ditch was not the most reasonable and practicable route that could have been selected, nor did he claim by his answer that, so far as size or capacity was concerned, there was anything unreasonable in the ditch as constructed by plaintiff. His claim was simply that the particular portion of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 7 given by the mother's will to plaintiff had never been irrigated by water from said ditch prior to the mother's death, and that, therefore, plaintiff had acquired no right to extend the ditch from its terminus over defendant's land, for the purpose of obtaining water for such irrigation.

It seems very clear, in view of the facts stated, that plaintiff was entitled to extend the water ditch from its terminus on defendant's land, over such land, to the northerly boundary of the land in section 7 that he had acquired under his mother's will, for the purpose of using on such land the moiety of the water to which he was entitled under the will. The will and the decree of distribution made thereon are, in view of the circumstances, susceptible of no other construction than that he was thereby granted such right. If this be so, it can make no difference that the land given him by the will had never been irrigated with water from this ditch in the lifetime of Mrs. Sulloway. If it was her intention, expressed in her will, that the plaintiff should have such right, he obtained it by the will regardless of the conditions existing prior to and at the time of Mrs. Sulloway's death. The will created the right in plaintiff for the benefit of the land in section 7 given him thereby, and made the land in the same section given thereby to defendant the servient tenement for that purpose. The defendant, taking such land under the same will, necessarily took it subject to this burden. As we have said, the intention of the will and decree of distribution are clear. By the will, Mrs. Sulloway divided her land in the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 7 between plaintiff and defendant, and also made them joint owners of her water rights and of the water ditch used by her to convey water to the lands so divided, which ditch terminated on the portion of the land given to defendant, with the request that they jointly use the same. A beneficial use on the part of plaintiff as to the land in section 7 given to him by the will was plainly intended. The undisputed facts establish that such use was impossible without an extension of the ditch to said land over defendant's land. Indeed, it is clear that plaintiff could have no beneficial use whatever of the ditch, either as to his portion of section 7, or any other land, unless permitted to extend it from where it ran on the land devised to defendant. It was essential to any beneficial use by plaintiff as to the land devised to him that he should have the right to extend the ditch to such land over defendant's land. It is declared by our law that "one who grants a thing is presumed to grant also whatever is essential to its use" (section 3522, Civ. Code), provided, of course, it is within the power of the grantor to do it, and there is absolutely nothing to indicate that such was not the intent of testatrix in the case at bar.

[2] In view of what has been said, there is much to be said in support of the claim that plaintiff was entitled to judgment upon the findings for the relief asked by his complaint. The fifth finding, which is apparently the one upon which the court based its judgment against plaintiff, is as follows: "That there was no evidence to show the amount of water owned by said Mary Sulloway in her lifetime, or used by her. That there was no evidence to show the capacity of the said ditch owned by said Mary Sulloway in her lifetime, and no evidence to show the size or capacity of the proposed ditch which plaintiff claimed would be necessary to erect across the lands of defendant." There was no allegation in the complaint as to any of these matters, and no issue tendered by defendant's answer in respect thereto. It was not necessary to show the amount of water owned or used by Mrs. Sulloway. Plaintiff was not seeking to have ascertained the specific amount to which he was entitled, but simply to have it adjudged, in accord with the will and decree, that he was entitled to the use and enjoyment of one-half of whatever there was, and no issue was tendered by the answer which made it essential, for the purpose of giving him all the relief asked, that the amount of water should be shown. No claim is made that plaintiff is not entitled to one-half of the water. Nor was any question as to the capacity of the ditch owned by Mrs. Sulloway material to the controversy between these parties. Admittedly, plaintiff is the owner of one-half thereof, whatever its capacity, and in view of the fact that no point was made by defendant, either by answer or on the trial, as to the reasonableness of the location of the extension ditch actually constructed by plaintiff, or of its size or capacity, and that plaintiff was simply seeking to be let into the possession, use, and enjoyment of the ditch as he had actually constructed it on the ground, there was no necessity for any evidence as to the exact location, size, or capacity of the extension ditch that had been constructed, unless, by reason of the filling in of the same by defendant, there was some question as to one or more of these matters. As to the location of such ditch there appears to be no question. If evidence was necessary to definitely settle any question of the size or capacity of such ditch, we are satisfied that it must be held that the trial court should have granted the request of plaintiff to be allowed to reopen his case and introduce such evidence. He might properly have been required, as a condition precedent to the granting of his application, to reimburse defendant for the expense of bringing back his witnesses, but the absolute denial of his application to be allowed to introduce evidence on the matters referred to, when he was so clearly entitled to prevail on the merits, and where the effect of a judgment against him would be to practically deprive him for all time of any use or enjoyment of the water rights given him by the will, must be held to constitute prejudicial error.

We can see no necessity for a new trial of the issues made by the pleadings. The only questions as to which it may be necessary to receive any additional evidence are those of the location, size, and capacity of the extension ditch constructed by plaintiff on defendant's land. Upon the findings already made, plaintiff is entitled to maintain a ditch on defendant's land, located on the line of the constructed extension ditch and of the same size and capacity.

The order denying a new trial of the issues made by the pleadings is affirmed. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to receive such evidence as may be offered by the parties on the question of the exact location on defendant's land of the extension ditch heretofore constructed by plaintiff, and the size and capacity of the same as so constructed, to find from such evidence the facts as to such location, size, and capacity, and to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff in accord with the prayer of his complaint, specifying in such judgment the exact location of the extension ditch therein referred to, and the size and capacity thereof.

SMITH v. GATE CITY OIL CO. (Sac. 1,897.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 90*)—ASSESSMENT OF STOCK—PROCEEDINGS FOR ENFORCEMENT.

Civ. Code, § 345, provides that the dates fixed in any notice of assessment or notice of delinquent sale of corporate stock may be extended from time to time for not more than 30 days. Section 346 provides that no assessment is invalidated by a failure to make publication of the notices hereinbefore provided for, nor by the nonperformance of any act required in order to enforce the payment of the same. Held, that the sections are not inconsistent, but that section 345 merely prevents a sale on the original proceeding subsequent to assessment, where there has been no reasonable publication or extension of the time for such sale; while section 346 allows a sale notwithstanding such failure, on the institution and completion of new proceedings subsequent to assessment, without a new assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 90*)—ASSESSMENT OF STOCK—PROCEEDINGS TO ENFORCE.

Civ. Code, § 334, providing that the order levying an assessment on corporate stock shall fix the date of delinquency at not less than 30 days nor more than 60 days from the date of the order, applies only to the order levying the assessment; and not to new proceedings subsequent to the assessment, under section 336, where the original proceedings subsequent to assessment have become void because of failure to advertise the delinquency sale as first ordered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Action by J. Jerome Smith against the Gate City Oil Company. From an order dissolving an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Fairall, for appellant. W. R. Jacobs and Frank H. Gould, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order dissolving a preliminary injunction, restraining the sale of corporate stock upon a delinquent assessment. The order was made upon the ground that the facts stated in the complaint were not sufficient to warrant the injunction.

Plaintiff owns 22,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation. On September 3, 1909, the corporation directors made an order levying an assessment of five cents a share upon the capital stock, declaring the same payable on October 16, 1909, and fixing November 1, 1909, as the day on which the assessment should become delinquent, if unpaid and December 27, 1909, as the day of the sale of such delinquent stock. No order extending the time for that sale was ever made, and no advertisement of said sale was made. On March 26, 1910, the directors made an order declaring that the aforesaid assessment was payable immediately, that all stock upon which said assessment remained unpaid on May 5, 1910, should then become delinquent and would be advertised for sale, and that said sale should take place on May 26, 1910. The necessary notices and advertisements have been regularly given and made as required by law, so far as the last order is concerned. The object of the suit was to enjoin the sale proposed to be made on May 26, 1910.

[1] The first objection made to the proceedings by the appellant is that it is in violation of the provisions of section 345 of the Civil Code, to the effect that "the dates fixed in any notice of assessment or notice of delinquent sale" of corporate stock "may be extended from time to time for not more than thirty days." It is claimed that, if the mode of procedure here followed is allowed, it would be within the power of directors to extend the dates for the payment, the delinquency, and the sale of the stock, respectively, for more than 30 days, and indefinitely for any period, contrary to said statute. The procedure is authorized by section 346 of the Civil Code, and it appears to be entirely regular under that section. It reads as follows: "No assessment is invalidated by a failure to make publication of the notices hereinbefore provided for, nor by the nonperformance of any act required in order to enforce the payment of the same; but in case of any substantial error or omission in the course of proceedings for collection, all previous proceedings, except the levying of the assessment, are void, and the publication must be begun anew." The failure to make the publication for the delinquent sale of December 27, 1909, first ordered, made the proceeding for a sale on that day, or on any subsequent day to which that sale should be postponed under section 345, void. It did not avoid the assessment, but it made it necessary to repeat all the proceedings except the assessment. A new date of maturity was to be fixed. This was done by declaring it payable immediately. A new date of delinquency was necessary, and it was declared to be May 5, 1910. A new day of sale was required, and it was fixed for May 26, 1910. The necessary notices for this new delinquency and sale were given and the proceeding thereby became complete and valid. Sections 345 and 346 must be construed together, and the provisions of both give force, if possible. They are not inconsistent. One provides for the extension of time in the case of proceedings for collection by sale which it is proposed to complete. The other provides for the inauguration of an entirely new proceeding for collection, in case the first attempt becomes invalid because of any substantial error or omission. The decision in San Bernardino Inv. Co. v. Merrill, 108 Cal. 490, 41 Pac. 487, and other cases following it, cited by appellant, merely hold that where the company has lost the right to proceed with the sale, because of a failure to take a necessary step in the proceeding at the proper time, it also loses the right to declare, under section 349, that it waives proceedings to sell the stock and elects to collect the assessment by action. They have no application to the question of the right of the company to begin anew the proceedings for collection by sale of the stock under the statute.

[2] The only other objection is that the order of March 26, 1910, is void, because the time of delinquency thereby fixed was more than 60 days after the order of September 3, 1909, levying the assessment. This, it is claimed, violates section 334 of the Civil Code. That section declares what the order levying the assessment shall specify. Among other things, it says that the order must fix the date of delinquency at a time "not less than thirty nor more than sixty days from the time of making the order levying the assessment," and the day of sale not less than 15 nor more than 60 days thereafter. The order of March 26, 1910, did not purport to levy a new assessment, but only to initiate new proceedings for collection of the previous assessment. Section 346, as above stated, provides that no new assessment is necessary, but that all proceedings subsequent thereto are void and must be begun anew. The position of appellant would require us to hold, either that the new proceeding under section 346 must be begun early enough to allow the new day of delinquency to fall within the 60 days following the original order, or that the respective dates of delinquency and sale must be postponed from time to time, under section 345, to the new dates fixed by the new proceeding. This would make the new proceeding impracticable in many cases. The postponement in order to be valid and preserve the original proceeding, must be made before the time originally fixed expires. The fatal omission might not be discovered until after that period, and it might not occur until after the original date of payment had passed. That date could not then be postponed and the whole proceeding would lapse, including the levy, which section 346, by necessary implication, declares shall not lapse because of such defect. Section 346 was obviously intended to provide for just such a case. Section 334 provides that the day of delinquency fixed in the original order must be not more than 60 days after the date of the order levying the assessment, but it does not purport to declare that no later day can by any means be fixed, and its provisions in that respect are necessarily modified by the other sections. Accordingly, we find that under section 345 the days fixed in the original order may be postponed from time to time by merely republishing the original notice thereof, with the order of postponement appended; and that, under section 346, it may be fixed anew at any later date, without any order of postponement, by making a new order fixing new dates and making an entirely new publication thereof. When either of these methods of changing the original days is adopted, the change is fully authorized by the section under which it is taken and the proceeding is valid, notwithstanding the aforesaid provision of section 334. No prejudice is caused to the delinquent stockholders by a new proceeding, for they must have notice of the new order, precisely as in the case of the original order.

The order dissolving the injunction is affirmed.

SMITH v. FURLONG et al. (L. A. 2,565.)

1. TAXATION (§ 679*)—SALE TO STATE—RE-SALE—MAILING NOTICE.

Pol. Code, § 3897, requires the tax collector, before selling for the state land sold it for taxes, to mail a copy of notice of sale to the person to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale at his last known post-office address. Held, that failure to do so could not be excused on the ground that the address of such person was not known, even if such was not given in the assessment book for the year of such last assessment, the person to whom the land was there assessed being the same one to whom it was assessed for the year, for the taxes of which it was sold to the state, and his address being given in the assessment book for that year; section 3650 requiring the assessment book to give the names and addresses of persons to whom property is assessed imposing on the tax collector when making such sale the duty of making a search of the assessment books for the addresses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 679.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 695*)—SALE TO STATE—RIGHT TO REDEEM—ATTEMPTED RE-SALE.

The original owner of land sold to the state for taxes having the right under Pol. Code, §§ 3780, 3817, to redeem the same from such sale at any time before the state disposes of it, his right is not affected by an attempted disposal of the property by the state invalid because of notice not being mailed as required by section 3897 to the person to whom the land was last assessed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 695.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 789*)—SALE OF LAND FOR NONPAYMENT—TAX DEED—CONCLUSIVENESS.

As Pol. Code, § 3898, provides that the deed from the state to land sold it for taxes shall only be prima facie evidence of the fact of notice recited therein, and as the giving of notice by mail, as required by section 3897, is a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state, a sale without actual notice by mail will be invalid despite the recitals in the deed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by J. H. Smith against Ida B. Furlong and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter J. Horgan and C. A. Stice, for appellant. Porter & Sutton, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. A rehearing was granted in this matter after decision in department.

The department decision was written by Justice Shaw, and is as follows:

"The appeals are from the judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

"The complaint stated a cause of action to quiet title to a city lot in Pasadena. The plaintiff relied solely on a tax title. He introduced in evidence a deed of the lot from the county tax collector to the state, executed on July 2, 1907, in pursuance of a sale of the lot made on July 1, 1902, for delinquent taxes for the year 1901. No objection is made to the regularity of the assessment or to the validity of this deed. Plaintiff also introduced in evidence a deed of the lot from the county tax collector to the plaintiff, executed on June 10, 1908, in pursuance of a sale at public auction by the tax collector for the state, made on that day, as provided in section 3897 of the Political Code. This deed was regular on its face. Section 3898 of the Political Code provides that this deed shall recite 'the facts necessary to authorize such sale and conveyance,' and that it 'shall be prima facie evidence of all facts recited therein.'

[1] "Section 3897 provides that before making the sale the tax collector must publish in a newspaper and by posting on the land a notice of the time and place of sale, for three successive weeks, and that 'it shall be the duty of the tax collector to mail a copy of said notice, postage thereon prepaid and registered to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before the sale, at his last known post office address.' The mailing of this copy was one of the facts necessary to authorize the tax collector to make the sale. With respect to it the recital in the deed was as follows: 'And whereas, the address being unknown, W. O. Welch, tax collector as aforesaid did not mail a copy of said notice postage thereon prepaid, to the party to whom the land was last assessed next before such sale.' In rebuttal of the prima facie effect of this recital, the defendant showed that the assessment book for the year 1901, and the delinquent list of taxes for that year, each contained in a column headed 'Tax Payer's Name,' opposite the assessment of this lot, the words 'Ida B. Furlong, N. W. Cor. Los Robles & Walnut St. Pasadena, Cal.' The lot was on the corner of Raymond avenue and California street in Pasadena. It was admitted that Ida B. Furlong was the person to whom the lot was last assessed next before said sale to the plaintiff. The evidence showed, further, that Ida B. Furlong had resided at the northwest corner of Los Robles avenue and Walnut street in Pasadena from 1881 to 1903; that in 1903 she moved to the adjoining city of South Pasadena, where she has ever since resided; and that every year from 1902 to 1907, inclusive, the tax on the lot had been regularly paid by her and receipts therefor regularly given to her. Section 3650 of the Political Code requires the assessor to prepare an assessment book of all property within the county, showing, among other things, 'the name and post office address if known, of the persons to whom the property is assessed.' After the taxes against the property are computed and extended on this book it is to be delivered to the tax collector (section 3732), who must thereupon collect the taxes therein assessed. (Sections 3746 to 3753.) He must then make a delinquent list of taxes unpaid, describing the property and stating therein the address of each taxpayer, as in the assessment book. (Sections 3759, 3760.) After the final settlement by the tax collector with the auditor for the taxes of each year, including delinquencies, the assessment book and delinquent list of that year, it seems, are given into the keeping of the auditor. (Sections 3789, 3799.) The tax collector thus has convenient access to these books, and by reason thereof has at hand means of knowledge of the address of the person to whom the property was last assessed. The deed in which he recited that this address was unknown was founded on the assessment book for the taxes of 1901 and on the subsequent deed to the state aforesaid. This deed to the state recited that the property was assessed to Ida B. Furlong for the year 1901. The assessment book and delinquent list for that year showed her address at that time. It does not appear whether the subsequent books showed her address or not. If not, then the address as shown on the books of 1901 constituted her last known post-office address, so far as the tax records were concerned, unless the tax collector had other information of a different address. From the fact that these books are required to show the address of the taxpayer, we think it may be inferred that the tax collector was required to consult these books for the purpose of learning the address of the persons to whom the property was last assessed. It is evident, therefore, that if the address was unknown to the tax collector it was because he had failed to avail himself of the ample means of knowledge readily accessible to him and furnished by law for that purpose, one of these books being the record of the assessment from which his authority to make the deed was derived. In view of this evidence and these provisions of law we think we may assume that the court found that this recital in the deed to the plaintiff was false and that the post-office address of Ida B. Furlong was by legal intendment known to the tax collector. We do not intend to lay down the rule that in cases where the deed declares that such address is unknown, and no copy of the notice of sale is registered and mailed, the question whether or not the address is in fact unknown is always open to dispute and subject to proof by evidence aliunde the tax records. But we think the provisions requiring the entry of the post-office address of each taxpayer on the assessment book and delinquent list were designed for the purpose of affording the proper officers ready means of information thereof, and that the safer rule is that where the assessment book for the year for which property is sold shows such address, and the last assessment is to the same person, it is the duty of the officer making the subsequent sale by the state to examine such assessment book for the purpose of ascertaining the address and that where that book shows it and the subsequent assessments of the same property do not show any address, the tax collector cannot truthfully say the address is unknown and make a valid sale of the property without mailing and registering the notice to the address so shown. He must take notice of the information contained in the record of the tax sale in virtue of which he executes the deed. This recital being false in contemplation of law, it would follow that the deed to the plaintiff was invalid.

[2] "The statute gives to the original owner of land sold to the state for taxes the right to redeem the same from such sale at any time before the state shall have disposed of it. Pol. Code, §§ 3780, 3817. The attempted sale to the plaintiff being invalid because of the failure to mail a notice to the person to whom it was last assessed, the state has not yet disposed of the lot, and the right of Ida B. Furlong to redeem the same still continues. The plaintiff having obtained no title by his purchase aforesaid, judgment was properly given for the defendant.

"The judgment and order are affirmed."

On further consideration of this matter we are satisfied that a proper conclusion was reached in the above opinion, and it is adopted as the opinion of the court in bank.

On this rehearing counsel for appellant urges no additional reasons to those presented in department why the judgment and order of the trial court were not correct. He, however, insists now, as he did in his briefs on the original submission in department, that in holding it to be a jurisdictional prerequisite to the validity of a sale by the tax collector for the state that notice of such sale should be mailed to the last known post-office address of the person to whom the lands were last assessed before the sale as provided by section 3897 of the Political Code several cases are ignored which distinguish between omissions to give notice required upon proceedings relative to tax sales which are jurisdictional and those which are not; that in these cases a defective notice or omission to give the notice required, which notice there under consideration was as important as the notice to be mailed under consideration here, was held not to invalidate the tax deeds. These cases referred to are Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 240, 90 Pac. 936, Fox v. Wright, 152 Cal. 61, 91 Pac. 1005, and Warden v. Browne, 9 Cal. App. 172, 98 Pac. 252. In the latter case a petition for a further hearing here after decision by the District Court of Appeal was denied. These cases were not overlooked or ignored in disposing of the appeal in department. They were not referred to simply because they had no application to the question involved in the appeal.

In Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham the court was considering objections made to the validity of a deed to the state for delinquent taxes. With respect to such deeds the provisions of the Code are different from those applying to deeds from the state. As to the former, section 3787 of the Political Code provides that such a deed shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings from the assessment by the assessor up to the execution of the deed. As to the latter, that the deed shall recite the facts necessary to authorize the same and shall be prima facie evidence of all facts recited therein. Pol. Code, § 3898.

In the Bank of Lemoore Case the attack was on the validity of the deed to the state for failure on the part of the assessor to enter (as required by section 3680 of the Political Code) upon each subsequent assessment of the property after its sale for delinquent taxes the words "sold for taxes," with the date of sale. This was not done, and it was claimed that the making of such a memorandum by the assessor constituted a part of the notice which, in addition to the notice of sale to be given by publication, as provided by law, should be given to the delinquent owner, and that failure to give it amounted to depriving him of his property without due process of law. It was held that notice by publication of the sale being all the notice that a delinquent owner was constitutionally entitled to, it was not essential that the Legislature should have provided for giving this memorandum notice at all; that the Legislature in the first instance might have dispensed with this notice provided to be given by the assessor entirely, or, having provided for it, make, as it did by section 3787, the deed to the state conclusive evidence that it had been given.

In Fox v. Wright it is true that the attack was on the validity of a deed from the state. Among other points made it was claimed that the published notice of sale was defective for failure to set forth the name of the delinquent owner. In disposing of this particular objection it was held that "under section 3787 upon the issuance of the deed the presumption of the regularity and sufficiency of the notice became conclusive." As, however, the court was there considering a deed from the state and the regularity of proceedings taken on a sale by the state, section 3787, referred to, making the deed to the state conclusive, had no application, and section 3898, making such a deed prima facie evidence, alone controlled. Hence the decision in Fox v. Wright on the point referred to, as it is based solely on a section which was inapplicable, cannot be considered as authority on that point.

The case of Warden v. Broome has no application whatever. The attack there was on the deed to the state on the ground of a radical defect in the notice of sale under which the state acquired the property. As the giving of the notice of sale in the manner required by law is a jurisdictional prerequisite to the validity of the sale to the state, and as the notice in question there was radically defective, it was held, as it is well settled, that no jurisdiction to make the sale to the state was acquired, and that section 3787 as to the conclusiveness of a deed to the state could not apply to jurisdictional matters. The question of the notice to be given on a sale by the state or anything concerning the effect of the deed from the state, as to the matter of such notice, was not involved in the case, and nothing respecting it was decided.

Having pointed out the inapplicability of these decisions to the only question presented on this appeal, it is hardly necessary to add anything further. The opinion quoted fully discusses the one question involved.

[3] It is true as said in Fox v. Wright, supra, that it is not necessary for the state after it has acquired the title to property under delinquent tax sales to provide for any notice to the delinquent owner that the state intends to sell the property; that it could provide for disposing of it at private sale. But the state has not pursued this course. It has provided that a sale shall be made by it after notice to the delinquent owner and provided how that notice shall be given. No distinction is made in the Code provisions between the right of the delinquent owner to notice by publication and notice by mail when his last known post-office address appears upon the assessment roll. It was deemed equally important by the Legislature that he shall be given both kinds of notice when it can be done. The intention doubtless proceeded from the fact that as it was the last opportunity the delinquent owner would have to save his property as complete a method of giving him notice as was practicable should be adopted. It must be admitted that the mailing of notice to the last known address is a very beneficial provision, and we cannot perceive why it should be held to be unimportant. If the Legislature intended that a failure to comply with the law in this respect should not defeat a sale by the state, it could have provided as it did with reference to sales to the state that the deed should be conclusive evidence. On the contrary, it is provided that the deeds shall recite the facts as to notice and shall be only prima facie evidence of those facts. The giving of notice by publication and by mail and making the sale are about the only substantial things a tax collector is to do and the most important facts to be stated in the deed. The only purpose to be subserved in making the deeds prima facie evidence of the facts recited was to afford an opportunity to the delinquent owner to show that express and substantial requirements of the law for his benefit had not been complied with, and hence the deed was invalid. If this was not the purpose, then nothing was subserved by making the deed only prima facie evidence of the facts recited. In effect, any contrary view would make it conclusive.

We are satisfied that the giving of notice by mail, as section 3897 requires, is a jurisdictional prerequisite to a valid sale by the state, and that as under section 3898 a deed made thereunder is only prima facie evidence of the fact as to the notice recited therein, if the notice was not given the sale by the state is invalid.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Striking out the denial of the answer raising the material issue, as to which defendants are entitled to trial, on the allegations of the complaint, constituting the gist of the cause of action for injunction, that waters falling on lands north of a ridge will, by reason of excavations of defendants sought to be enjoined, be carried on plaintiff's lands south of it in greater quantities than would occur under natural conditions, is error.

The mere fact that a drainage district was formed to drain lands in the vicinity of plaintiff's lands, and for that purpose purchased a right of way over his lands, and constructed a ditch thereon, does not show it has right to divert thereto additional waters from the other side of watershed, making it overflow its banks and injure his lands.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

The object of plaintiff's suit was to enjoin the defendants from enlarging Old Live Oak slough and from constructing or maintaining a certain proposed ditch, and from doing any other act or thing whereby any of the waters falling upon the lands northeasterly of a certain alleged ridge, some six miles northerly of plaintiff's lands, might be precipitated, or the flow thereof accelerated, to or upon the plaintiff's lands. He also asks for a mandatory injunction requiring defendants to fill up so much of said ditch as had been dug before the suit was begun.

The plaintiff's lands consist of 180 acres. He alleges that about six miles north thereof there is a high ridge of ground which, unless interfered with by the defendants, does and will effectually prevent the water falling upon the land northerly and easterly thereof from flowing down to and upon his own land. He further alleges that south of said ridge there extends from said ridge, in a southerly direction, for a part of the distance to his land a slough known as Old Live Oak slough, with which is connected an artificial ditch extending therefrom to and through his land, by means whereof the waters of the slough are drained and carried away to lower lands. With respect to the acts of the defendants complained of, he alleges that they are engaged in digging a ditch through said ridge of land, which will cut through the same and drain the waters falling upon the lands northerly and easterly thereof into the slough and through the ditch leading therefrom to and upon the lands of the plaintiff, and that they also threaten to, and, unless restrained, will, deepen, widen, and extend the slough from the point where the defendants' proposed ditch enters the same in a northeasterly direction, thereby bringing into said slough and down to and upon the lands of the plaintiff a vast body of water which falls and accumulates upon lands northeasterly of section 8, in which section said ridge is situated, which water would not at all reach plaintiff's lands without the doing of said threatened work by the defendants, and that by reason of said additional water coming into said ditch crossing plaintiff's lands it will be caused to overflow plaintiff's lands and render them unfit for cultivation to his great damage.

The answer to the complaint consisted of denials and affirmative defenses. The court on motion of the plaintiff struck out the affirmative defenses and a part of the denials, and thereupon it sustained a general demurrer to the answer without leave to amend, and rendered the judgment appealed from. This judgment enjoins the defendants from digging the proposed new ditch or from deepening, widening, or extending the slough or doing any other act or thing which will cause the waters from the lands northerly and northeasterly of said ridge to flow down to and upon the plaintiff's lands. It also commands the defendants to refill with earth the lower 30 feet of the ditch which they have dug northerly from Old Live Oak slough. The defendants in support of their appeal urge that the court erred in striking out the portions of the answers and in sustaining the demurrer to the remainder thereof.

The gist of the threatened injury alleged in the complaint is the making of the new ditch and the alteration of the slough in such a manner that the water falling on the land north of the alleged ridge, and which did not before reach plaintiff's lands, will be carried to and upon said lands through said proposed ditch across the ridge.

[1] Every landowner must bear the burden of receiving upon his land the surface water naturally falling upon land above it and naturally flowing to it therefrom, and he has the corresponding right to have the surface water naturally falling upon his land or naturally coming upon it, flow freely therefrom upon the lower land adjoining, as it would flow under natural conditions. From these rights and burdens, the principle follows that he has a lawful right to complain of others, who, by interfering with natural conditions, cause such surface water to be discharged in greater quantity or in a different manner upon his land, than would occur under natural conditions. This is the settled law of this state. Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 49, 7 Pac. 41; Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 351, 13 Am. Rep. 213; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 519, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 162, 32 Pac. 976, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163; Stanford v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 198, 43 Pac. 605; Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 49 Pac. 189; Rudel v. Los Angeles Co., 118 Cal. 288, 50 Pac. 400; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 665, 57 Pac. 572; Cloverdale v. Smith, 128 Cal. 233, 60 Pac. 851; Larrabee v. Cloverdale, 131 Cal. 99, 63 Pac. 143; Wood v. Moulton, 146 Cal. 317, 80 Pac. 92.

[2] The fifth paragraph of the answer was stricken out. In it the defendants deny that they are now or ever have been engaged in digging a ditch through said ridge of land, or that any ditch as planned or now in course of construction by them will cut through said ridge. These allegations merely refer to the construction of a ditch cutting through the ridge. This act is not the essential part of plaintiff's action. It is the making of excavations which will so alter natural conditions that additional surface water will be discharged upon plaintiff's land that constitutes the ground of his complaint. This paragraph, however, also contains the following: "Defendants deny that any ditch or canal now being dug or constructed by them or which they have, previous to the commencement of this action, been engaged in digging and constructing, will connect the territory lying north of said alleged ridge with said Old Live Oak slough, or that it will effectually ally drain all or any water falling upon said lands to the north and northeast of said alleged ridge into said slough, and through said artificial ditch or canal mentioned in plaintiff's complaint to and upon the lands of plaintiff or any part thereof in any greater volume or in any different manner than that in which they have heretofore since the year 1896 been accustomed to flow and drain." It appears from other allegations in the answer which were also stricken out that in the year 1896 the ditch running through the plaintiff's lands was constructed by the defendants for the purpose of draining the waters from Old Live Oak slough, and that it has ever since that time been maintained for that purpose. This explains the allusion to the accustomed flow of water since 1896, in the part of the answer above quoted. The effect of this denial is to raise an issue upon the allegations of the complaint that the waters falling upon lands northerly and easterly of the alleged ridge will be carried upon the plaintiff's lands, by reason of the alleged excavations of the defendants, in greater quantities than would occur under natural conditions. This is the gist of the plaintiff's cause of action, and without it he would not be entitled to the judgment he obtained. The denial raised a material issue upon which the defendants were entitled to a trial. For this reason the court erred in striking out this portion of the answer.

In paragraph 6 of the answer there is an allegation that none of the work as planned or in process of construction by the defendants, when completed, will cause any additional surface water to flow through said slough and ditch to the injury of the plaintiff in any manner or at all. This is but a repetition of the matter above quoted from paragraph 5, and it is perhaps more in the nature of a conclusion than a statement of fact. It might well have been stricken out as unnecessary, because it is, at most, but a repetition of a previous denial.

[3] Other allegations in connection with the part of the answer which was stricken out were to the effect that a drainage district was formed in the year 1895 for the purpose of draining lands in the vicinity of plaintiff's land, that this drainage district, under proper proceedings for that purpose, constructed the ditch over the plaintiff's land for the purpose of draining the waters of said slough, and that the district purchased and now owns a right of way over the plaintiff's lands for that purpose. These matters were wholly immaterial to the case. Granting that the drainage district had procured a right of way to construct the ditch now existing across the plaintiff's lands, it would not at all follow that it or any other person would have the right to cause additional surface water to flow therein sufficient to make it overflow its banks and injure the plaintiff's lands. It is not alleged that said district has ever obtained, or now has, the right to cause such overflow. These matters were properly stricken from the answer.

The order striking out paragraph 5 of the answer and the giving of judgment for the plaintiff, under these circumstances deprived the defendants of the substantial right of having a trial upon the material issue of fact which they had tendered, and for that reason the judgment is erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

In re RICKS' ESTATE.

RICKS v. RICKS. (S. F. 5,246.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 2, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 316*)—CONTEST—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

As in other civil actions, whether the evidence on a contest of a will is sufficient to go to the jury is to be determined by viewing the entire evidence presented from a point most favorable to contestant, disregarding all contradictory evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 742-749; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. WILLS (§ 155*)—VALIDITY—"UNDUE INFLUENCE."

Undue influence invalidating a will must be an influence exerted prior to or at the time of the making of the will, and such as destroys free agency, constraining testator at the time the will is made to make a disposition of his estate contrary to and different from what he would have made had he been left to the free exercise of his own inclination or judgment.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7166-7172; vol. 8, pp. 7823-7825.]

3. WILLS (§ 163*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE—CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.

A finding of undue influence is not warranted from the mere fact of the principal beneficiary having been testatrix's son and her confidential business agent; there being no presumption of abuse of the confidential relations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 388-402; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

4. WILLS (§ 153*)—VALIDITY—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

Fraudulent representations, which will invalidate a will, must have been made prior to or at the time of its execution.

5. WILLS (§ 166*)—CONTEST—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

Evidence on a will contest on the issue of proponent having fraudulently represented to testatrix that contestant had made a certain agreement held insufficient to show he had made any representation to her on the subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

6. WILLS (§ 153*)—FRAUD.

The jury on a contest of a will could declare it invalid on the issue of fraudulent rep-representations by proponent to testatrix that contestant had made a certain agreement only on evidence showing, not only that no such agreement existed, but that proponent had falsely represented and induced testatrix to believe it did, and that the will was the product of this belief thus fraudulently created.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

7. WILLS (§ 166*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE AND FRAUD—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF BENEFICIARY.

Declarations of proponent of a will, made to testatrix years after its execution, evidencing merely his opposition to changing it to the advantage of contestant, are insufficient to show undue influence or fraud on his part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 421-437; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

8. WILLS (§ 165*)—CONTEST—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF TESTATRIX.

Declarations of testatrix subsequent to execution of the will are never admissible as proof by themselves of undue influence or fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 415-420; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

9. WILLS (§ 353*)—CONTEST OF WILL AND CODICIL—NONSUIT AS TO ONE BRANCH—JUDGMENT—TIME OF ENTRY.

Though the contest of a will and a codicil thereto is by a single petition, and nonsuit is ordered only as to one branch of the contest, judgment may be entered on the order prior to final determination of the entire contest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Adaline A. F. Ricks, deceased. There was a contest of deceased's will and the codicil thereto by Thomas F. Ricks, and from a judgment on a nonsuit as to the contest of the will contestant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 117 Pac. 539.

Knight & Heggerty and Selva & Cutten, for appellant. Barclay Henley, L. F. Puter, and Mahan & Mahan, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The testatrix by will dated December 16, 1890, devised and bequeathed her estate to two of her sons, the respondent, Hiram L. Ricks, and Casper S. Ricks, giving to her other son, the appellant here, a nominal legacy. Casper S. Ricks died August 7, 1896. On November 8, 1901, testatrix executed a codicil giving to said Hiram L. Ricks the portion of her estate bequeathed in her will to Casper S. Ricks. Testatrix died November 26, 1903, and on December 1, 1904, her will and the codicil thereto were admitted to probate. On August 28, 1905, the appellant Thomas F. Ricks filed a contest of said will and codicil on the grounds of undue influence and fraud alleged to have been exerted and practiced on the testatrix by said Hiram L. Ricks. The contest came on for trial before the court and a jury, and on September 26, 1907, contestant having rested his case, respondent moved for a nonsuit, both as to the contest of the will and codicil. The court granted the motion as to the contest of the will, and denied it as to the contest of the codicil. On February 28, 1908, a judgment was entered on the order granting the nonsuit as to the will, and from this judgment contestant appeals.

The evidence on the hearing of the contest of the will is brought here on a bill of exceptions, and the main point urged for the reversal of the order granting the nonsuit is that there was sufficient evidence produced on the trial to call for the submission of the case on trial to the jury. While the contest filed by the appellant was a single one and attacked the validity of both the will and the codicil and the evidence adduced on the hearing up to the time when contestant rested his case was directed to both instruments, we are concerned on this appeal with the evidence only which bore on alleged undue influence and fraud with respect to the execution of the will itself and which contestant claims made a sufficient case to go to the jury. It appears that, after the order granting the nonsuit as to the will and denying it as to the codicil was made, the parties proceeded with the trial as to the validity of the codicil, which resulted in a disagreement of the jury. Thereafter another jury trial was had upon the codicil, resulting in a verdict against its validity, from which a separate appeal has been taken to this court by the present respondent, disposition of which will be made later. In the petition of contest filed by appellant as the basis thereof he alleged that at the time her will was made and for a long time prior to the making thereof, and continuously thereafter till her death, the respondent, Hiram L. Ricks, was a partner in business with his mother and her confidential agent and business adviser and conducted her entire business to the exclusion of all other persons; that the mother knew nothing of the amount of property possessed by her or of the business conducted in her name or in the name of the partnership, taking no part in the conduct thereof, but relying absolutely on said Hiram L. Ricks for information thereof, the latter conducting and controlling said business absolutely; that their mother had absolute confidence in the integrity, fair dealing, honesty, and capability of said Hiram L. Ricks, and because of said belief entrusted the whole of her property and business to him; that long prior to executing said will said Hiram L. Ricks had the desire and intent to influence and induce their mother to make a will bequeathing the whole of her property to said Hiram L. Ricks and disinherit the petitioner; and that he took advantage of the confidential relation existing between his mother and himself to unduly influence her in the execution of her will.

It is then further alleged: "That, pursuant to the aforesaid design and intent, the said Hiram L. Ricks, for the purpose of prejudicing the said Adaline A. F. Ricks against this petitioner, willfully and falsely represented to her, the said Adaline A. F. Ricks, deceased, and persuaded her to believe, that your petitioner had received from her estate and her property in a division of his father's estate all of the property he was to receive or which he might inherit from her or his brothers by reason of their death or otherwise, and that upon such partition he agreed to and with the said Hiram L. Ricks, Adaline A. F. Ricks, and Casper S. Ricks, a brother now deceased, that he accepted and would take the amount of property so granted to him as a compromise in full of any and all rights which he might have or which might become his by reason of the death of his mother Adaline A. F. Ricks, or his brothers. That said representations were false, and said respondent knew them to be false, and said Adaline A. F. Ricks, deceased, believed said representations to be true and acted upon the same, and because of said representations she signed and executed said documents purporting to be the will and codicil thereto, if the same were ever signed and executed by her, and she would not have so executed said will or said codicil thereto had she known that said representations so made as aforesaid were false and untrue."

The evidence introduced by contestant showed that prior to his death in 1888 the husband of testatrix and father of the appellant and respondent and Casper S. Ricks was the owner of a large amount of property in Eureka, Humboldt county, which a short time prior to his death he deeded to his wife and his three sons, who, until the division hereafter mentioned held it in common. After the death of her husband, testatrix took no part in the management of the business, leaving it to be conducted jointly by the respondent, Hiram L. Ricks, and the contestant, the latter principally conducting it. This joint conduct of the business continued practically until about December 16, 1890, at which date a division of the property held in common by the Ricks family was made. Some time prior to December 16, 1890, the harmony which had prevailed between the contestant and Hiram L. Ricks became disturbed, owing principally to the objection of contestant to certain expenditures and investments of money in the improvement of a public waterworks system in the city of Eureka, owned by the Ricks family. This in-harmony became so acute that contestant demanded a partition of the property held in common by the family. His mother and his other brothers wished to keep the property intact in the family and seriously objected to any division. Contestant, however, insisted on it, with the result that his mother, who strongly objected until she saw that contestant would not recede from his demand, and, as she declared, to keep peace in the family, finally consented to a partition, and on December 16th and 17th deeds were interchanged between the parties whereby the other members of the family conveyed certain property theretofore held in common to contestant, he conveying to them jointly his interest in the remainder. As far as the record shows, no partition was had between the other members of the family—Mrs. Ricks and Hiram L. and Casper S. Ricks—they continuing to hold their interests in the property in common. After the segregation of the interest of contestant, the management of the remainder of the property which was still held by the other members of the family in common was undertaken by Hiram L. Ricks. Casper S. Ricks had never given any attention to the business affairs, leaving that to contestant and respondent. And this assumption of the management of the business by the respondent after the division was not self-assumed, not against the wish or consent of his mother, or by reason of any dominating influence over her. Mrs. Ricks was adverse to taking any part in the conduct of the business, and as after the death of her husband the contestant and respondent had given it their attention, when the contestant drew out his interest, the respondent continued as he had theretofore done to manage it, and so continued to take exclusive charge of it up to the death of his mother. Casper L. Ricks being in failing health, on April 26, 1896, conveyed all his property to his mother for life, the remainder in fee to Hiram L. Ricks. On April 29, 1896, Mrs. Ricks executed a deed conveying all her property to Hiram L. Ricks, which deed she deposited with the cashier of a bank in Eureka accompanied by written instructions wherein she directed the said cashier to hold said deed, and on her death to record it and deliver it to Hiram L. Ricks. This written letter of instructions contained the following statement of her purpose in making the conveyance to Hiram L. Ricks: "My reason for conveying to him (Hiram L. Ricks) all of my property described in such deed is because at the time my son T. F. Ricks withdrew his interest in the Ricks estate and deeds were made to him therefor by myself and my two sons, Casper S. and H. L., it was then understood and agreed that he was not to have any share in my property or estate and that the same was to go to my other sons as I might choose."

The attorney who prepared the deed in escrow, as a witness called for appellant, testified that he prepared it at the request and under instructions from Mrs. Ricks alone; that she wanted her reasons for making the deed to her son Hiram L. set forth in the escrow, stating to him that when the contestant withdrew his interest in the Ricks estate after she had tried to persuade him to hold their interests together, and deeds were made by herself and her sons Hiram and Casper to him, it was then understood and agreed that contestant was not to have any share in her property and estate; that contestant had said that she might leave her property to whomsoever she pleased, and that she was now going to do it. On October 12, 1903, Mrs. Ricks executed a deed to Hiram L. Ricks conveying all of her real property to him, which deed was recorded by said grantee on December 2, 1903, after the death of his mother. About the middle of August, 1903, the contestant being about to depart for San Francisco on a temporary visit of some weeks, went to the home of his mother to bid her good-by. As to what occurred, he testified: "Well, as I started to go in the door, I heard some loud talking. They were eating breakfast, Lam (Hiram) and my mother, and, as I went in, I said 'What is the matter here?' and mother said, 'We were just talking over what you said about what Matty (the wife, since deceased, of Hiram L. Ricks) said that I was going to disinherit you. She said Lam said at the time of the division that you agreed not to take any more of my property,' and Lam said 'Yes, he did.' I said I never did such a thing, I said he lied, I never agreed to no such thing in the world. I said I have not got a thing. 'All I got was father's quarter that he gave me, and he has all the property, your property and Cas's, the whole of it, and I have not got a thing from either one of you.' He denied it, and he and I had some words. We were engaged in conversation I suppose about 10 or 15 minutes. That is what I remember. Of course, there was a whole lot of talk, and we both got pretty mad as we always did whenever we got together. I then got up and bid mother good-by and kissed her good-by and went off and got my team. I think I was gone three weeks." It was further shown that the day previous to her death one of contestant's sons—Charles C. Ricks—called upon his grandmother, and a conversation was had between Mrs. Ricks, Hiram L. Ricks, and himself. He testified that Hiram L. Ricks at the request of his mother stated to him the agreement his father had made at the time of the division—that he had agreed not to take any more from the estate. At the request of Hiram, he told his grandmother of some disagreement he had had with his father, whereupon she expressed her intention of giving him (Charles) $10,000. Hiram suggested to his mother that she give the $10,000 to all the boys—that is, $8,000 to Charles and $1,000 each to his two brothers. His grandmother asked Charles if this would be satisfactory to him, and, on his assuring her that it was, she said: "I have not done right by Tom (contestant), he should have more." Whereupon Hiram spoke up and said: "You can give Charlie whatever you like, but you can't give Tom a cent."

A witness, Mrs. M. J. Herrick, stated that within a month before the death of Mrs.

Ricks she approached the residence of the latter with the intention of calling on her. As she did so, she heard Hiram L. Ricks say: "If you make any change in that property, I will law away every dollar of it." This was all she heard said. She did not then go in the house, did not see any one there, and did not know to whom the statement of Hiram L. Ricks was addressed.

Appellant further testified that no agreement had been entered into between his mother and himself, as testified to by respondent, or between his mother and his brothers Hiram L. and Casper when the division of the property was made that he should not have any portion of whatever property his mother might leave.

Hiram L. Ricks, called as a witness by contestant, stated that at one of the conferences about the division of the property, and after contestant, over the strenuous protests and objections of the other members of the family, was insisting on a division, his mother said: "Tom (contestant), if you insist upon withdrawing your interest from the estate, it must be final, you must draw all your interest, and what you expect to get out of the estate or out of the Ricks property"; and "I don't know whether at that conversation or not, either at that one, or at some others, probably afterward, anyhow, Tom agreed to do what my mother said. 'You must select what you want as a final settlement so you boys will never be brought together in business again.' This is as near as I can tell the identical words. This conversation was between Tom, my mother, Cas, and myself."

It was in evidence further that Mrs. Ricks, while adverse to business cares and responsibilities, was a woman of remarkable mental power. She read a great deal and was a woman of decided opinions, perfectly capable of knowing and understanding what she was doing with respect to any matter, and attended to her own household affairs, and was never ill in her life until her last sickness, which lasted some 47 hours. There was no allegation in the complaint of any want of mental capacity or the existence of any weakness of intellect which at the time when the will was made or subsequent thereto would render her susceptible to undue influence. On the contrary, the evidence on the part of contestant shows her possession of superior intellectual powers up to the time of her death. While the appellant and contestant subsequent to the division of the property were not on friendly terms, the mother was at all times on affectionate terms with all her children. After the division the visits and interviews between the respondent and his mother were, by reason of his management of the business, coupled with the fact that his business office was situated close to her residence, more frequent than those between his mother and contestant, although affectionate relations between his mother and contestant always existed.

Having set forth the evidence relied on, we address ourselves to the merits of the appeal.

[1] The rule is well established that in contests of wills, as in other civil actions, in determining whether the evidence presented was sufficient to take the case from a jury, the entire evidence presented is to be viewed from a point most favorable to the contestant. Disregard is had of any contradictory evidence. All facts supporting the case of contestant must be taken as true, and all presumptions from the evidence and all reasonable inferences susceptible of being drawn therefrom must be considered as facts proven in his favor. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. But with this rule in view, and applying it here, we are satisfied that the order of the trial court granting the nonsuit was proper. While the evidence presented bore both on the validity of the will and the codicil, in determining whether any case was made by the contestant showing undue influence as to the execution of the will, or fraud practiced on the testatrix in its execution, the evidence must be considered separately and treated with reference to the different dates when the two instruments were executed, as particular evidence which might be considered with reference to the execution of the will or the codicil might not be applicable to both, and whether it is applicable to either must be determined under a consideration of well-recognized rules of law. The allegations in the petition of contestant are that the execution of the will of December 16, 1890, was procured through the undue influence of Hiram L. Ricks over his mother, and was likewise procured by fraud upon her in falsely representing that contestant had agreed at the time the division of property took place that he should receive no portion of her property at her death.

[2] It is, of course, elementary that undue influence invalidating a will must be such as destroys free agency constraining the testator at the time the will is made to make a disposition of his estate contrary to and different from what he would have done if he had been left to the free exercise of his own inclination or judgment. "Undue influence of that kind which will affect the provisions of a testament must be such as subjugates the mind of the testator to the will of the person operating upon it, and, in order to establish it, proof must be made of some fraud practiced, some threats or misrepresentations made, some undue flattery or some physical or moral coercion employed; so as to destroy the free agency of the testator." 20 Ency. of Law, p. 103. And as said in Re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 295, 49 Pac. 192, 194, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179: "The undue influence which will avoid a will must be such as operates upon the mind of the testator at the time of making the will, and must be an influence relating to the will itself." And "unless there was such evidence tending legitimately to prove that some fraud had been practiced upon the testatrix at that time, or that some misrepresentation had then been made, or that some physical or moral coercion had been employed, such as to destroy her free agency, the court erred in submitting to the jury the question whether undue influence had been exerted. It was inviting them to find as a fact that of which there was no evidence, and which the law as well as reason presumed had no existence." It must be borne in mind that when we speak of undue influence which will affect a testamentary act it must be such influence operating upon the very act itself; an influence exerted and used prior to or at the time of the making of the will and of which the will is the product.

With these rules in view, we come to the points made by the appellant.

[3] It is claimed, first, that at the time the will was made there existed the confidential relation between testatrix and respondent of mother and son, coupled with the fact that at that time he was also her confidential agent, the manager of her business, and acting for her exclusively in her business affairs; and it is argued that this situation warranted a deduction by the jury that respondent had taken advantage of such confidential relations to procure from his mother the execution of her will as one of the main beneficiaries.

While counsel for appellant have cited various sections of the Code, and general authorities on the subject of confidential relations, to the effect that testamentary disposition procured by an undue exertion of influence springing from such relation is invalid, they have not pointed out any conduct or acts on the part of respondent, or any circumstances attending the execution of the will, upon which they rely in support of their claim that the will was the result of undue influence exercised by respondent over his mother as far as confidential relations are concerned. They rely simply upon the proposition that, because the relation of mother and son existed and her son was also her business agent at about the time the will was made, a confidential relation existed from the existence of which a jury would be warranted in finding that respondent had taken advantage of that relation and had unduly influenced his mother to execute her will in favor of himself and his brother Casper to the exclusion of contestant. But no warrant is given to a jury to find that undue influence was exerted at the time the will was made from proof merely of such relation alone. Undoubtedly the relation between respondent and his mother was affectionate and confidential, and that he would have a general influence over his mother proceeding from such relation. But the existence of such relation and this general influence raises no presumption that undue advantage was taken of it by respondent. There is no legal suspicion of undue influence arising from the existence of such a relationship, which imposes upon the son the necessity, when a will in his favor is attacked, of assuming the burden of proof that he had not unduly influenced his mother in making the will. The confidential relation and the opportunity afforded therefrom to exercise undue influence may, of course, always be taken into consideration with other evidence, when the question of undue influence is in issue. But the relation itself and opportunity are not sufficient alone to warrant a finding that undue influence was actually exerted. Proof merely that confidential relations existed between a testator and the main beneficiary under his will is not sufficient to destroy its validity, but there must be some proof, in addition to the relation, of facts or circumstances showing the use of that relation at the time the will was made overcoming the free will and desire of the testator, in order to invalidate the testament. As said in a case quoted from in Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 194, 64 Pac. 299: "The presumption of undue influence is not raised by proof of interest and opportunity alone. In order to set aside a will for undue influence, there must be substantial proof of the pressure which overpowers the volition of the testator at the time the will was made. In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such undue influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator, by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires. Substantial evidence must do more than raise suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proved which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator. In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to the jury, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged."

Now, a careful examination of the testimony in this contest fails to disclose any fact or circumstance showing that the respondent had anything to do with the making of the will of his mother in favor of himself and his brother Casper.

It is conceded that Mrs. Ricks was a woman of firm will and decisive mind, a woman of remarkable intellectual powers, and fully capable of understanding and knowing what she was doing at all times. No question is made about her mental capacity at the time the will was executed. There is not a pretense that she was then mentally infirm, and her will, as far as its provisions are concerned, expresses clearly her intention as to the disposition of her property. There is nothing in the will itself which suggests any undue influence in making it. It is true that it leaves her estate to the respondent and his brother Casper to the exclusion of the contestant, but that does not indicate that the favorable bequests to those two to the exclusion of the contestant was the effect of undue influence. She had a right to dispose of her property as she saw fit, and the motives which actuated her in doing so are neither concern of jury or court. When it appears that the testatrix had testamentary capacity, which in this case was conceded, the fact that she made a distinction between her children as to the share of her estate they should receive is of no moment unless the preference was the result of undue influence or fraud, and no presumption of such undue influence or fraud arises from the fact merely that she made such preference. But aside from the fact that the testatrix in this case was at the time her will was made a woman of strong mentality, self-willed, and disposed to exercise her own judgment in all matters, and that this condition of mentality and character continued down to the time of her death, that she allowed her will to stand as she had written (except for the codicil) down to that time, there are further important facts and circumstances to be taken into consideration.

No evidence was introduced relative to the execution of the will. Nothing as to who drew it, where it was executed, or the presence of any one in connection with its making; nor any testimony from the persons who were witnesses to it. In fact, the record is barren of any evidence on the subject. As far as the record discloses, the testatrix kept her own counsel and made her will secretly. She does not appear to have consulted any member of the family, or any one else, as to how she should dispose of her estate. In addition, there is not only an entire absence of the slightest proof of any agency on the part of respondent in procuring the execution of the will, but it affirmatively appears that he did not know that his mother contemplated making one, or that she had done so, until after its execution, when it was delivered to him by either his mother or his brother Casper.

In the absence, therefore, of any evidence tending to show that undue influence proceeding from their confidential relation had been exercised by respondent in procuring the making of his mother's will in favor of himself and his brother Casper, it was the duty of the court to refuse to submit that issue to the jury. The further allegation in the petition of contestant was of fraudulent representations made by respondent to testatrix, which we have set forth above, and it is claimed that sufficient proof thereof was made to require the issue in that respect to be passed on by the jury.

[4] The rule with reference to proof of fraudulent representations relied on to defeat a will is the same as governs the proof of undue influence claimed to have been employed. It must appear that such fraudulent representations were made prior to or at the time the will was executed. Contestant recognized the rule and alleged that undue influence was exercised and the fraudulent representations made prior to or at the time the will was executed.

[5] But there was not a particle of proper or legitimate evidence introduced in the case showing that on or prior to December 16, 1890—the date of the will—any representations were made by respondent to the testatrix that an agreement had been entered into by contestant with his mother, or with her and respondent and his brother Casper, at the time the division of the property left by his father was made, whereby contestant relinquished all right to participate in any of the estate left by his mother at her death. As stated in discussing the claim of undue influence, there is not a particle of evidence that at any time the respondent spoke to his mother about making a will, or that he had any conversation with her, or made any statements or representations of any character to her respecting the disposal of her property, or of the existence of any agreement made by contestant. He was ignorant of the execution of any will until after it was made. It is true that almost 13 years after the will was made a bitter quarrel arose between contestant and respondent in the presence of their mother, and the statements which were then made are relied on by contestant in support of his claim of fraudulent representations. We have heretofore set forth in detail what then occurred. But, giving that conversation the greatest probative force, it falls far short of supporting the claim of contestant that it shows that prior to or at the time the will was made respondent had represented to his mother that contestant had agreed to relinquish all right to any of her estate. It tends to show nothing of the kind. There was no mention in that conversation of the respondent having at any time, either before or after the making of the will, spoken to his mother about the existence of such an agreement. The matter then in dispute between the parties was not as to any statement being made at any time by respondent to his mother as to any agreement having been made by contestant, but simply as to whether, when the division of the property was made, the contestant had, in fact, made such an agreement. Respondent insisted that he had, and contestant denied it. This is all that is disclosed in that conversation. No statement was then made by Mrs. Ricks that respondent had ever said anything to her about an agreement. In fact, from the testimony of contestant as to what occurred there, his mother took no part in the conversation. She said nothing one way or another on the subject, whether an agreement had been made or not, or whether any one had ever spoken to her on the subject. She only spoke of what Matty said that Lam (the familiar name of respondent) said that contestant at the time of the division had agreed not to take any of her property. This was all. Aside from this being purely hearsay testimony on the subject of what Matty said respondent said, it did not even, as such, indicate that respondent had mentioned the agreement to his mother, but only that he had spoken of it to Matty.

[6] Now, while under the evidence in the case there is a dispute as to whether such an agreement was made by contestant, the existence or nonexistence of such an agreement was not the controlling point in the contest. It was an important one, but the validity of the will of testatrix under the issue as to fraud did not depend upon the solution of that question alone. The decisive question to be determined under the contestant's allegation of fraud was, did the respondent falsely and fraudulently represent to his mother that such an agreement was made, when in fact it had no existence? The jury might have found that there was no such agreement. It may be even assumed that the testatrix believed that there was; but that she was in error respecting the matter. But this would not warrant the jury under the issue of fraudulent representation, in declaring the will invalid. Under that issue it could only be so declared upon evidence which showed not only that no such agreement existed, but that the respondent had falsely represented and induced his mother to believe that it did, and that the will was the product of this belief thus fraudulently created, and there is no evidence in the case which would support a verdict of the jury to that effect.

[7] Our attention is directed to the declarations made by Hiram L. Ricks testified to by Mrs. Herrick and Charles C. Ricks. These, at best, evidenced but opposition on the part of Hiram L. Ricks to any change in the will and codicil to the advantage of contestant. Aside from being declarations 13 years after the making of the will, in the absence of any other evidence tending to show undue influence or false representations on the part of Hiram L. Ricks, they would be insufficient to establish it.

[8] Certain declarations made by testatrix years after the execution of her will were admitted in evidence by the court during the trial. These declarations were offered by contestant avowedly for the purpose of proving undue influence and fraud, but these declarations in the absence of all other evidence are insufficient to sustain those issues.

Declarations of a testator made subsequent to the execution of a will are sometimes admissible when his mental capacity to make a will is involved. No question as to the mental capacity of Mrs. Ricks was involved here. They are admissible also to show the state of feelings of a testator towards and his relations with his children. When made contemporaneously with the execution of his will, if made under such circumstances as to constitute a part of the res gestæ, the declarations of a testator are also admissible. But declarations made subsequent to the execution of a will are never admissible as proof themselves of undue influence or fraud. After the execution of his will a testator is no more permitted to impeach its validity by declarations respecting it than can the validity of any other instrument be impeached by subsequent declarations of the maker respecting it. Estate of Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; In re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 49 Pac. 192, 59 Am. [9] The last point made by appellant is that the judgment appealed from entered upon the motion granting the nonsuit as to the contest of the will should be reversed because it was prematurely entered. His position is that as both the validity of the will and of the codicil were contested in a single petition, upon which the parties went to trial, that while the court might grant a nonsuit as to the contest of the will and deny it as to the contest of the codicil, or vice versa, still in law no judgment could be entered upon the order granting the nonsuit as to either until the entire contest, both as to the will and codicil, was finally determined. We do not think there is any merit in this point. Respondent had a right to move for a nonsuit, both as to the will and codicil, or as to either, at the close of contestant's case, and, if in the opinion of the court the evidence was insufficient to warrant submitting the question of the validity of either instrument to the jury, it was the duty of the court to grant a nonsuit accordingly. And, upon such nonsuit being granted, even if it applied to only one branch of the contest, the party in whose favor it is ordered is entitled to a judgment thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 581.

Our attention is not called to any authority which would render a judgment entered upon a motion for a nonsuit, as was done in this case, erroneous.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re RICKS' ESTATE. (S. F. 5,152.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1911.
On Rehearing, Sept. 2, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 271*)—CONTEST—AFTER PROBATE
—CITATION—APPEARANCE.

Objection that citation in a will contest which Code Civ. Proc. § 1328, provides must issue within a year after probate to the executor and the legatees and devisees and resident heirs, was directed merely to R., by name, without describing him as executor, devisee, legatee, or heir, and was not separately served on him in each of said capacities, he being however the executor, and, with the exception of contestant, the sole devisee, legatee, and heir, was waived by R.'s appearance within the year, by demurring as "the proponent and legatee named in the will" to contestant's petition; it being presumed, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that, as was the natural course, he as executor was the proponent.

2. JUDGMENT (§§ 650, 663*)—RES JUDICATA.

Only final judgments are available as res judicata, so one time to appeal from which has not expired or appeal from which is pending is not so available.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1162, 1174; Dec. Dig. §§ 650, 663.*]

3. WILLS (§ 400*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

The will, though not the codicil, having been sustained on a contest thereof, any error in allowing amendment of contestant's petition by statements affecting only the will was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

4. WILLS (§ 278*)—CONTEST—PETITION—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The petition of contest of a codicil makes sufficient allegations as to exercise of undue influence, as distinguished from fraud, otherwise pleaded, by alleging that R., by reason of his confidential relations with testatrix, his mother, and her absolute confidence in him, persuaded her to believe that he was entitled to the whole of her property and that of her deceased son; that said representations were false, and known to be so by R., when he made them; and that, believing said representations and controlled by them, she made the codicil, which she would not have done had she not believed said false and fraudulent representations to be true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 636, 637; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

5. WILLS (§ 166*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a contest of a codicil held insufficient to sustain a verdict for contestant on the ground of undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 421-437; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

6. WILLS (§ 158*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE OF FRAUD.

Evidence merely that beneficiary under a will, who occupied confidential relations with testatrix, his mother, falsely represented to her that contestant, his brother, had agreed at the division of his father's estate to relinquish all right or claim to her estate, is insufficient to sustain a verdict for contestant on the ground of undue influence; as while a will made under a belief of the truth of false representations, disinheriting one who, but for testatrix's belief in the truth thereof, would have been provided for therein, may be avoided on the ground of fraud on testatrix, yet to avoid it on the ground of undue influence, having its foundation in false and fraudulent representations made to testatrix, not only must the false representations have been made for the purpose of influencing testamentary disposition, but they must have been the basis of importunity and pressure on testatrix which controlled her mind when her will was made.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 220*)—ADMISSIONS—FAILURE TO DENY.

Failure of the sole beneficiary under a will to deny the statement of testatrix, made when he was quarreling with his brother, disinherited by her will, that he had told her that the brother had agreed at the time of the division of their father's estate to take no more of the property, may be considered as an admission of the truth of the statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 771-785; Dec. Dig. § 220.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 222*)—WILL CONTEST—ADMISSIONS AND DECLARATIONS OF BENEFICIARY.

Admissions and declarations against interest of the sole executor of and beneficiary under a will are admissible on a contest of will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 768-808; Dec. Dig. § 222; * Wills, Cent. Dig. § 410.]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 265*)—ADMISSIONS AND DECLARATIONS OF BENEFICIARY—EFFECT.

Such admissions and declarations may be considered, not only for the purpose of showing the feelings and relations between the parties, but to establish any fact in issue on the validity of the will which they have a tendency to establish.

10. WILLS (§ 165*)—CONTEST—DECLARATIONS OF TESTATRIX.

Declarations of testatrix, not part of the res geste, are admissible, on a contest of her will giving all her property to one of her children, not to prove the exercise of undue influence on her, but only to illustrate her relations to her children, her feelings towards them, and her condition of mind or belief as to their respective claims or rights to participate in her estate.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Geo. W. Hunter, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Adaline A. F. Ricks, deceased. There was a contest of deceased's will and the codicil thereto by Thomas F. Ricks, and from a judgment for contestant as to the codicil Hiram L. Ricks, the proponent, appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Knight & Heggerty and Selva & Cutten, for contestant. L. F. Puter, Barclay Henley, and Mahan & Mahan, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This was a contest after probate, attacking a will and codicil. At the close of the case of contestant the court granted a nonsuit as to the contest of the will and denied it as to the codicil. Contestant appealed from the judgment on the nonsuit as to the will, which judgment in an opinion this day filed has been affirmed. Estate of Ricks, 117 Pac. 532, S. F. No. 5,246. On the denial of the motion for a nonsuit as to the codicil the trial thereon was proceeded with, resulting in a disagreement of the jury. On a second trial as to said codicil, a verdict was rendered in favor of contestant, and judgment entered revoking and annulling the probate of the codicil. From this judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the appellant, Hiram L. Ricks, who was executor and principal devisee and legatee under the codicil, appeals.

The testatrix when she made her will, dated December 16, 1890, had three sons living, namely, Thomas F. Ricks, the contestant, Hiram L. Ricks, the appellant, and Casper Ricks. Her will bequeathed to Thomas F. Ricks the sum of $5 and gave the residue of her estate to Hiram L. and Casper S. Ricks in equal shares. Casper S. Ricks died August 7, 1896. The codicil to her will was made November 8, 1901, and recited the fact of the death of Casper S. Ricks, revoked the bequest to him, and gave to Hiram L. Ricks all the property which had been given in the will to Hiram and Casper jointly. Hiram L. Ricks was in the codicil made sole executor. While the contest filed was directed against the validity both of the will and the codicil, we are concerned on this appeal only with the matter of the contest of the codicil.

[1] The first point urged by appellant for a reversal is that the court had no authority to entertain the contest because the citation was not issued and served as provided by section 1328, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that: "Upon filing the petition (for revocation of probate), and within one year after such probate, a citation must be issued to the executor of the will, or to the administrator with the will annexed, and to all the legatees and devisees mentioned in the will, and heirs residing in the state, so far as known to the petitioner, * * * requiring them to appear before the court on some day therein specified, to show cause why the probate of the will should not be revoked." There can be no question but that as a prerequisite to the maintenance of the contest the citation provided for must be issued within a year after probate, and the proceeding should be dismissed for any failure in that respect, if there is no voluntary appearance within a year of all persons entitled to a citation. Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 390, 101 Pac. 8. In the matter at bar the superior court on August 28, 1905, when the petition for a revocation of probate was filed, made an order that a citation be issued by the clerk of said court to the executor and all the legatees, devi-sees, and heirs residing in the state, and to all other persons interested in the estate, etc. A citation was issued by the clerk directed to Hiram L. Ricks, by name only, without describing him as executor, devisee, legatee, or heir. He was, however, the executor of both the will and codicil, was the sole devisee named in the codicil, and, with the exception of the contestant, was the only legatee thereunder and only heir of the decedent. There was therefore no other person who was entitled to a citation upon the petition for revocation of probate, and the citation was, in fact, served upon him, as shown by the return of the sheriff.

The only objection urged by the appellant as to the citation is that it was not addressed to him in his several capacities as executor, devisee, legatee, and heir of decedent, and was not separately served upon him in each of these capacities.

But appellant is not in a position to raise any question of defective issuance or service of the citation upon him on the grounds suggested, because he waived the right to object to the manner of issuance and service of the citation by voluntarily appearing in the proceeding. Abila v. Padilla, 14 Cal. 103. Within two weeks after the institution of the contest a demurrer was filed on behalf of Hiram L. Ricks as "the proponent and legatee named in the will of deceased." The proponent of a will is the person who offers it for probate. While any person interested in the estate may petition to have the will proved (Code Civ. Proc. § 1299), the law contemplates that the one upon whom this duty devolves primarily is the executor named in the will, for it is provided that he may upon failing to petition within a fixed time be held to renounce his right to letters. Code Civ. Proc. § 1301. And, except where the person named as executor desires to renounce his right, it is the almost invariable practice for him to file the will with his petition that it be admitted to probate. Therefore, while Hiram L. Ricks had the right to petition for probate in his capacity of executor, or in that of legatee, it is reasonable to suppose, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that he followed the ordinary and natural course of petitioning as the executor named in the will. When in his demurrer he described himself as "proponent," he was, in effect, appearing as executor. If he had intended to appear in the capacity of legatee alone, there would have been no occasion for the double description of "proponent and legatee." The objection now urged does not appear to have been suggested until appellant filed his answer to the second amended petition, over two years after the contest had been instituted, and after there had been two trials upon the merits. Under these circumstances we are not disposed to view with great favor a plea which is designed to prevent a hearing upon the merits.

[2] As we have stated, the original contest was directed against both the will and codicil. On the first hearing as to both, the court granted a nonsuit as to the contest of the will, and denied it as to the codicil, and directed judgment of nonsuit to be entered accordingly. This order was made October 1, 1907, but the judgment thereon was not signed or entered until February 28, 1908. On February 21, 1908, contestant had filed a second amended petition of contest, answer to which was filed by proponent on March 16, 1908, in which he set up this judgment of February 28, 1908, and relied upon it as an estoppel. He claims now that the judgment of February 28, 1908, denying contestant relief upon one of his causes of action set up in his petition, namely, the contest of the will, was in law an adjudication of both causes of action, including the contest of the codicil, and that it could properly be pleaded as a bar to any subsequent litigation affecting the validity of the codicil. This position is not tenable. Only final judgments can be pleaded or proven as res adjudicata, and, as the time within which the contestant in that judgment might appeal had not expired when the answer setting up the judgment was filed, the judgment relied on had not become final (Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 546, 32 Pac. 589; Story v. Story, 100 Cal. 41, 34 Pac. 675; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314), and, when the issue as to the validity of the codicil was tried and the verdict of the jury rendered, an appeal had already been taken from the judgment pleaded as res adjudicata and was pending here.

[3] Complaint is made because the court allowed a second amended petition of contest to be filed after the expiration of one year after probate. While an amendment which states a new ground of contest may not be permitted unless filed within the year after probate allowed by the Code for the institution of such contests (In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 Pac. 172, 711), the allegations claimed to state new matter in the second amended petition which was filed February 21, 1908, referred only to matters affecting the original will, and, inasmuch as the appellant has been successful upon the issue relating to that document by the order for nonsuit previously made on October 1, 1907, he could not have been prejudiced by the granting of leave to amend with respect to it.

[4] It is claimed that the demurrer to the amended petition, in as far as it attempted to state a cause of action through the exercise of undue influence, should have been sustained. The petition charged both undue influence and fraud on the part of Hiram L. Ricks in procuring the execution of the codicil. While these causes of action were not separately stated, we think there were sufficient allegations as to both. This contest was based on undue influence and fraud. The undue influence alleged was that Hiram L. Ricks, by reason of his confidential relations with his mother and her absolute confidence in him, persuaded her to believe that he was entitled to the whole of her property and that of her deceased son, Casper S. Ricks, that said representations were false and known to be so by said Hiram L. Ricks when he made them, and that, believing said representations and controlled by them, she made the codicil to her will, disinheriting contestant, which she would not have done had she not believed such false and fraudulent representations to be true.

As to fraud. While the allegations respecting it were not separately stated in the petition, it was evidently intended to allege such a cause for revoking the codicil. And in that regard it was alleged that H. L. Ricks, long entertaining a design to have his mother devise and bequeath all her property to him, falsely represented to her that in a certain partition between the members of the family, had years previous to the making of the codicil, contestant had agreed to take and accept the amount given him in that partition in full and in lieu of any and all right which he might have or which would become his by reason of the death of his mother or his brother; that such representations were false and known to be false by Hiram L. Ricks when he made them, and that the codicil was the product of such false representations and was executed under the belief that they were true.

[5] The court submitted to the jury two questions to be answered by them. The first was whether the codicil was procured through undue influence exerted on the testatrix by said Hiram L. Ricks, which question was answered in the affirmative. The second question, "Was the codicil * * * to the said will procured to be made through the fraud or fraudulent representations of the said proponent Hiram L. Ricks?" was not answered by the jury. The appellant H. L. Ricks insists that there was no evidence to sustain the finding of the jury of undue influence, and that, if there was any evidence supporting the issue that the execution of the codicil was procured to be made through fraud on his part, the jury failed to find on that issue. The position of respondent is that the evidence fully sustained the finding of the jury on the issue of undue influence; that in determining that issue the jury had a right to take into consideration such evidence of fraud as was presented and base their finding upon that evidence alone. Before discussing these points a statement of the evidence is necessary.

On the second trial of the contest as to the codicil much of the evidence which was introduced by the contestant upon the first contest of the will and this codicil was again submitted with additional and different evidence. That evidence, as far as it is necessary to state it for present purposes, shows these facts: Prior to 1890 Mrs. Ricks and her three sons were the owners, as tenants in common, of property in Humboldt county, which, immediately prior to his death, had been jointly conveyed to them by the husband of Mrs. Ricks and the father of these brothers. After the conveyance of the property, it was managed as the Ricks estate; the management thereof being in the hands of the contestant and Hiram L. Ricks. Some dispute arising between these brothers as to the management of the estate, the contestant insisted on separating his interest therein from that of the others. A division was objected to by the mother and other brothers. The negotiations in the matter covered several weeks, but, the contestant being insistent upon a division, it was finally agreed on and consummated, his mother and his brothers conveying to contestant certain property, and he conveying his interest in the remainder to them. The estate was largely indebted at the time of the division, and contestant assumed one-fourth thereof. The deeds between the parties, pursuant to the division, were made on December 16, 1890, the same day that the will of Mrs. Ricks was executed. After the division, Hiram L. Ricks managed the interests of his mother and himself and brother Casper in the property, which they still continued to hold jointly, and did so up to the death of his mother on February 26, 1903. His mother reposed great confidence in Hiram. She took little, if any, interest in her business affairs. She was naturally averse to being burdened with business cares or the responsibilities thereof, and left these matters exclusively to the attention of her son Hiram L. Ricks as previous to the division she had left them to be attended to by both the contestant and said Hiram. Her will, made on the same date the division was had, gave substantially all her estate to Hiram L. and Casper Ricks. Casper Ricks died in August, 1896. Prior thereto—on April 27, 1896—he had conveyed all his property to his mother for life, the remainder to Hiram L. Ricks. Two days after the deed from Casper to his mother and brother Hiram, Mrs. Ricks made a deed conveying all her property to Hiram L. Ricks. This deed was deposited with the cashier of the Bank of Eureka, accompanied by a letter of instruction signed by Mrs. Ricks. This letter instructed the cashier to retain the deed until her death, and thereafter have it recorded and delivered to Hiram L. Ricks and contained the following statement: "My reasons for conveying to him (H. L. Ricks) all of my property described in such deed is because that at the time my son T. F. Ricks withdrew his interest in the Ricks estate, and deeds were made to him therefore by myself and my two sons Casper S. and H. L., it was then understood and agreed that he was not to have any share in my property or estate, but that the same was to go to my other sons as I might choose." On November 8, 1901, the codicil involved in this contest was executed by Mrs. Ricks, by which all her property was given to said Hiram L. Ricks. In August, 1903, a serious quarrel occurred between Hiram L. Ricks and this contestant at their mother's residence and in her presence. It appears that the evening previous to the morning when this quarrel took place contestant had called on his mother and some conversation was had between them about the will and deeds which his mother had made, information about which had come to him from some statements made by Matty Ricks, the wife, since deceased, of Hiram L. Ricks. As to what occurred at the quarrel, contestant testified that on that morning he went to his mother's residence to bid her good-bye, as he contemplated a temporary absence from Eureka. As he entered the house Hiram L. Ricks and his mother were talking pretty loud. (Mrs. Ricks was somewhat deaf.) We now quote from his testimony: "They said they were talking about what I was talking about the night before about what Matty said. My mother made that statement. She said something to me about it after that and right at that time. She said that Lam [the familiar name for Hiram L. Ricks] said I agreed not to take any more of the property when we dissolved—when I divided the property that I agreed to that. I said there was no such a thing said at the time. Lam stated there was an agreement at that time, he told my mother, he said there was an agreement of that kind at that time. She said he stated that at the time we dissolved or divided Lam stated there that I did say it. I replied, after he stated that, that it was a lie; I never made any such agreement at all. That there never was any such agreement. He said there was, and we quarreled after that about that agreement; what he said I agreed to do." Independent of what was said by him at the time of the quarrel on the subject of the agreement, contestant testified that there was in fact no agreement or understanding on his part had with his mother or brothers, or any of them, at the time of the division of their property, or at any other time, that he was to relinquish his right to take any portion of the estate of his mother. Hiram L. Ricks testified that there was such an understanding at the time of the division, but denied that he had ever spoken of it to his mother at any time afterward, assigning as a reason that, as she was fully aware of it, there was no necessity for mentioning the subject to her. As to what occurred at the time of the quarrel, Hiram L. Ricks testified that all that was said there was an assertion on his part that there was such an agreement, a denial of its existence by contestant, and the statement of his mother to contestant that he knew there was such an agreement. The day previous to her death there was a conversation between one of her grandsons, Charles C. Ricks—a son of contestant—and Mrs. Ricks and Hiram L. Ricks. In this interview Mrs. Ricks declared her intention to give Charles $10,000. Hiram suggested that she give $10,000 to all—$8,000 to Charles and $1,000 each to his two brothers, which was agreed to. Mrs. Ricks then said, "I have not done right by Tom [contestant]; he should have more." Whereupon Hiram L. said, "You can give Charlie and the boys whatever you like, but you can't give Tom a cent." A Mrs. Herrick testified that within a month prior to the death of Mrs. Ricks, when near the residence of the latter, she heard the appellant say: "If you make a change in that property, I will law away every dollar of it." This was said in the house and was all she heard. There was evidence, also, that Mrs. Ricks had stated to various persons that the contestant had made such an agreement.

From the time contestant withdrew his portion of the Ricks estate, the remainder, which was held in common by Mrs. Ricks, Hiram L., and his brother Casper, was managed, as we have said, by Hiram L., and he devoted all his time and energy to its management. It was heavily burdened with indebtedness at the time of the division, and from then until the death of his mother Hiram L. Ricks had paid in extinguishment thereof, out of his own personal funds, an amount somewhat exceeding $50,000. After the making of the will, and for several years at intervals, the contestant lived with his mother. Hiram L. Ricks was married and maintained a residence of his own. Their mother had her own residence, and lived in it up to the time of her death. The relations between the contestant and his mother were always affectionate, as were her relations with all her children. In addition to this testimony was the undisputed showing that the testatrix was at all times, even up to the time of her death, a woman of strong mental and physical powers. She was highly educated, a woman of strong and decided mind; positive in her ideas and opinions. Contestant himself testified that he was not prepared to say that his mother was of a yielding, pliant disposition, and could be influenced by anybody; she might be, to save trouble, but it would have to be some strong reason, some strong persuasive force, and that he could not give a single instance where his mother was compelled to do anything which she did not want to do against her will. While disinclined to concern herself with the details of business, leaving them to be transacted by her son Hiram, she was not indifferent in important business matters, but frequently discussed them with her son and others. In this connection she was much distressed about the heavy indebtedness on the Ricks estate, which during the years between 1892 and 1898, when business depression and "hard times" prevailed, threatened the estate with bankruptcy, from which it was saved only through the activity and careful management of Hiram L. Ricks and through aid given by the expenditure of his own personal funds. The evidence further shows that Hiram L. Ricks knew nothing about the making of her will by his mother until after it was made and handed to him. He was not consulted about its provisions. He had not spoken to his mother about making a will, nor had she spoken to him on the subject. As to the codicil, he knew nothing about her contemplated action in that respect until after it was made.

These constitute the main and principal facts in evidence in the case upon which the verdict of the jury that the codicil was procured through the undue influence of Hiram L. Ricks is based. A careful consideration of it satisfies us that the evidence does not sustain the verdict on that ground.

In the petition undue influence is predicated upon the charge that confidential relations existed between Hiram L. Ricks and his mother, and that he took advantage of this relation to persuade her to believe that he was entitled to the whole of her property and that of her deceased son, Casper L. Ricks. In the opinion filed this day in the matter of the appeal from the judgment on a nonsuit granted in the contest of the will (Estate of Ricks, 117 Pac. 532, S. F. No. 5,246) we considered and discussed the rule as to confidential relations, and upon practically the same evidence as is produced here held that no presumption of an abuse of such relation arose from the mere fact that the relation existed, and that there was no evidence whatever of its exercise by Hiram L. Ricks. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary here to particularly consider the matter with reference to this codicil.

There can be no question but that Hiram L. Ricks would have an influence with his mother—that general influence which an affectionate son, mindful of her comforts and protecting and managing her business interests, would naturally have. But there is not a particle of evidence that he took advantage of this for his own benefit and to the disadvantage of contestant, or for any purpose in connection with her testamentary disposition of her property. Mrs. Ricks was a woman of intelligence, of strong and decisive mind, and so remained up to the day of her death. The evidence showed that she consulted her attorney in making her will and codicil, and that Hiram L. Ricks, as we have pointed out, had nothing to do with the making of either, and did not know that his mother contemplated making either of them, and knew nothing about them until after they were made. The codicil followed her will as far as any disposition in favor of contestant is concerned. Whatever her reasons were for leaving by her will all her property to Hiram L. and Casper, to the exclusion of contestant, and upon the death of the latter making a codicil leaving all her estate to Hiram, there is no evidence whatever that she was unduly or at all influenced so to do by Hiram L. Ricks.

[6] It is claimed, however, that, even if there was no other evidence showing that Hiram L. Ricks took advantage of the confidential relations existing between himself and his mother to persuade and prevail upon her to make the codicil in his favor, still, under the evidence as to the representation made by him to his mother, that contestant had agreed at the time of the division to relinquish all right or claim he might have to any estate left by her at her death, if the jury found that such representation was made, and was false, such finding was sufficient of itself to support the verdict of undue influence. We do not think this position is sound. Undue influence consists in the exercise of acts or conduct by which the mind of the testator is subjugated to the will of the person operating on it; some means taken or employed which have the effect of overcoming the free agency of the testator and constraining him to make a disposition of his property contrary to and different from what he would have done had he been permitted to follow his own inclination or judgment. Fraud, defining it generally, consists of false statements or false pretenses, or the employment of any trick or device or means of deception for the purpose of defrauding another. Undue influence and fraud are not identical. The one has reference to the subjugation of the will of the testator and controlling it. The other to a deception practiced upon the testator. In a sense undue influence is a species of fraud, but it may be exercised without any actual fraud, or false representation being made to the testator. One may by constant and persistent importunities and beseechings prevail upon another to make a will in his favor. The will is the result of these importunities, yielded to by the testator for the sake of peace. There may be no element of fraud or false representation in any of these importunities or beseechings. Nevertheless the effect of them has been in a broad sense to coerce the mind of the testator to defraud other heirs who, but for these importunities, would have been the recipients of the bounty of the testator. Upon the other hand, the undue influence may have its foundation in false and fraudulent representations made to the testator. To illustrate, the testator may be informed that the heir, whom otherwise he would have recognized, had attempted his life. Based upon this false statement are im-portunities and mental pressure and coercion to exclude the heir because of his attempted crime. Here is presented a double fraud—a direct fraud upon the testator by these false representations, and fraud upon the disinherited heir who, by reason of the undue influence exercised through such misrepresentation, is deprived of the favor and bounty of the testator. In this sense there is always the element of fraud in the exercise of undue influence. If, however, the fraud be merely the fraudulent representation that the heir has attempted the life of the testator and is not accompanied or followed by a successful effort unduly to coerce the will of the testator, we have an example of fraud pure and simple; fraud which will avoid the will, but at the same time a fraud in which there is no more element of undue influence than there is in an ordinary fraudulent transaction of everyday life between contracting parties. In such a case a finding of undue influence will not be supported by evidence of pure fraud, as, on the other hand, a finding of fraud will not be supported by evidence showing solely the exercise of undue influence; for it is to be remembered that in a contest of a will of a testator on the ground of undue influence or fraud the law regards only the acts directed against the testator. It is the fraud against the testator and not the indirect resulting fraud against the disinherited heir which the law is considering in an attempt to avoid a will on that ground, and it is the undue influence—the coercing of the mind of the testator—and not the indirect but equally resulting fraud against the disinherited heir which alone the law is considering when the charge is on this latter ground. So that, when fraud or fraudulent representations made to the testator are relied on as an element in undue influence, it must appear not only that the representations were false and believed to be true by the testator, but that they were made the basis of importunity and mental pressure upon the testator and that the testamentary act was the product thereof. When this appears, such fraud is an element in undue influence, and, upon the proof of its employment to overcome the will of the testator, a finding of undue influence may be based. On the other hand, representations which are false, while they may exert an influence upon the testamentary disposition, unless they are made not only for that purpose, but are used as pressure upon the mind of the testator to affect the disposition of his property, constitute fraud purely. Such false representations need not be made to the testator by one who may be benefited by them. They may be made by a stranger. They may be made without any object of affecting the testamentary disposition and solely out of pure malice. If the testator, under a belief of the truth of such false statements, and influenced by them, makes a will disinheriting one who, but for a belief in the truth of such false statements, would otherwise have been provided for in it, the will is the product of fraud on the testator and subject to be declared invalid for that reason. In order, however, that the fraudulent representations may be considered as an element in proof of undue influence, it must appear, not only that they were false and made for the purpose of influencing testamentary disposition, but that they were made the basis of importunity and pressure upon the testator, which he was unable to resist, and which controlled his mind when his will was made. Undue influence and fraud constitute two separate and distinct grounds, upon proof of either one of which a will may be declared invalid, and it is quite clear that, if proof simply of fraud or fraudulent representations may support equally an issue of undue influence or an issue of fraud, the distinction between those grounds of contest is obliterated.

In Page on Wills, § 122, it is said: "Fraud is in its nature closely allied to undue influence, and in many cases where the issue to be tried is devisavit vel non it is practically impossible to distinguish the two, as the same evidence often tends to support each charge. The confusion is increased by the theory sometimes expressed by the courts that undue influence is to be treated as a kind of constructive fraud. But, while allied to undue influence, fraud is not the same thing. Undue influence is essentially overpowering the will. Fraud is deceit. Such considerations have led courts, where the rules of pleading permit of a distinction between fraud and undue influence in making up the issues, to hold that fraud is not the same thing as undue influence, and that an allegation of the one does not include an allegation of the other." In Davis v. Calvert, 5 Gill & J. (Md.) 269, 25 Am. Dec. 232, the court says: "Fraud is a distinct head of objection from importunity and undue influence. Importunity and undue influence may be fraudulently exerted, but they are not inseparably connected with fraud." And in Eckert v. Flowry, 43 Pa. 46, the following language is used: "Now that is undue influence which amounts to constraint which substitutes the will of another for that of the testator. It may be either through threats or fraud, but, however exercised, it must, in order to avoid a will, destroy the free agency of the testator at the time when the instrument is made." See, also, Herster v. Herster, 122 Pa. 239, 16 Atl. 342, 9 Am. St. Rep. 95; Gordon v. Burris, 153 Mo. 239, 54 S. W. 546. In Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598, the jury in a will contest had before them the issues of undue influence and fraud. They found affirmatively on the first, and made no response to the second. It was claimed on appeal here that the jury should have found on the second issue, and could not take into consideration to support the first evidence which was given in the case of fraudulent statements made by one of the devisees under the will to the testatrix. It was held that they could. But in that case it appears that the unwarranted accusations made against contestant were used as the basis for and were followed by the persistent importunities on the testatrix to practically disinherit contestants, to which importunities she yielded. Clearly this was undue influence exercised by means of fraud.

Under the views announced, in the absence of any proof of the exercise of undue influence by Hiram L. Ricks under his confidential relations with his mother, or at all practiced by him, the jury was not warranted, assuming that they believed he had made a false and fraudulent statement to his mother of an agreement made by contestant to relinquish all interest in her estate, in basing their finding of undue influence thereon. The evidence on this subject of false representations, as it is detailed in the record, could only be considered on the issue of fraud, upon which issue the jury failed to find. It follows, therefore, that on the issue of undue influence the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence, and the order denying a new trial must be reversed for that reason. In view of a new trial, other points made on this appeal are to be considered.

[7] It is claimed that the declaration made by the testatrix at the time of the quarrel, namely, that appellant had told her at the time of the division that contestant had agreed to take no further part of the property, could not be considered by the jury to establish the fact that he had made such a statement or representation to her. This may be conceded as correct. The jury, however, had a right to take into consideration the conduct of the appellant in connection with the statement of the testatrix as an admission on his part of the facts stated by her. See Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 311, 107 Pac. 598.

[8] While the general rule is that declarations or admissions of one of several executors, devisees, or legatees are inadmissible in an attack on the validity of a will, because the interests of the parties are several and not joint (Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 245, 86 Pac. 695; Id., 153 Cal. 662, 96 Pac. 266), this rule has no application where this condition of severalty of interests does not exist. This is the situation here. The appellant being the sole executor, devisee, and legatee, his interest alone could be affected by either his admissions or his declarations. Our Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 3) provides that: "An act or declaration of another, in the presence or within the observation of a party, and his conduct in relation thereto," may be given in evidence. The statement of the testatrix at the time of the quarrel between the brothers, namely, that Hiram L. Ricks had told her of such an agreement at the time the division was made, was made in his presence. If it was not true, it called for a denial by him. As it was not denied, it was only natural to consider it as an admission of the truth of the statement by the only one to be affected by it—an acquiescence in the truth of the fact stated, implied from his conduct in allowing it to go unquestioned. And if the jury believed the testimony of contestant as to what occurred at the quarrel they had a right to treat this admission of the appellant—sole beneficiary under the codicil—as proof of the fact itself that he had told his mother what she stated he had at the time she said he did, and to consider it as bearing directly on any issue before the jury to which it was relevant. As to the express declarations of Hiram L. Ricks, they were admissible for the same general reason. The same Code section referred to (subdivision 2 thereof) declares that evidence may be given of the "act, declaration or omission of a party as evidence against such party." Hiram L. Ricks was a party to the proceeding and the sole party in the attack on the validity of the codicil whose interests would be affected by the admission in evidence of his declaration, so that the general rule against the admission of the declarations of one of several executors, devisees, or legatees, where their interests are several, has no application.

[9] Nor was the appellant entitled to have the jury instructed that his declarations were admissible and could be considered only by the jury for the purpose of showing the feelings and relations existing between the parties. The admissions and declarations against interest of the sole beneficiary are admissible to establish any fact in issue upon the validity of a will which they have a tendency to establish, and are not subject to the limitation appellant claims for them.

[10] As to the declarations of testatrix, the court recognized and observed in instructing the jury the well-established rule that, when such declarations are not part of the res gestæ, they are not admissible to prove, nor may they be considered by the jury for the purpose of showing, the exercise of undue influence, although such declarations were entitled to be shown and considered for the purpose of illustrating the state of mind of the testatrix when that state of mind was material. In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 301, 44 Pac. 577; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 593, 82 Pac. 252; Estate of Thomas, 155 Cal. 488, 101 Pac. 798; Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598. The court instructed the jury that, "upon the question of undue influence, statements of the testatrix made either before the execution of the codicil or after, and which tend to throw light on her condition of mind, her feelings, and affections for her sons and her relations with them, are admissible for this purpose. But, as proof of undue influence, the evidence of such statements is hearsay and incompetent, and should not be considered by you. They afford no substantive proof of undue influence, and cannot be admitted for such purpose, and, before contestant can recover on the ground of undue influence, it is necessary that he should prove that undue influence was in fact actually exerted upon the testatrix by other evidence than her own declarations." The declarations and statements of the testatrix had a tendency to illustrate her relations to her children, her feelings towards them, and her condition of mind or belief as to their respective claims or rights to participate in her estate, and the instructions properly and clearly limited the jury to a consideration of the statements or declarations of testatrix for this purpose alone.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause because in my opinion there was evidence in support of the contest of the codicil, which, if true, was sufficient to warrant the finding that its execution was procured by undue influence. Whether this evidence was true or not was a question for the jury. Evidently they believed it, and disregarded the conflicting evidence.

BOLAND v. ALL PERSONS, ETC.

Appeal of STEPHENS.

(S. F. 5,230.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—OPENING DEFAULT JUDGMENT—AFFIDAVITS.

Where the affidavits on a motion to open a default judgment are conflicting, those in favor of the prevailing party must on appeal be taken as true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4027; Dec. Dig. § 1024.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 142*)—OPENING DEFAULT—JUDGMENTS WHICH MAY BE OPENED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, provides that, when summons has not been personally served on defendant, the court may within one year allow such defendant or his legal representative to answer to the merits. The plaintiff and defendant in an action to establish title to land resided in the same house on the land in controversy. Upon action by plaintiff, notice was posted upon the front door and remained there for a considerable time. The defendant, though bedridden, was able to transact business, and was informed of the notice, and was asked if she wanted to oppose the action. She stated that she did not, and that she had conveyed the lot to plaintiff several years before, and that he had begun the action in accordance with her wishes. Defendant was never personally served with process. Held that, after the defendant's death, the court properly refused to set aside a default judgment and allow defendant's personal representatives to defend.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 142*)—OPENING DEFAULT—MERITORIOUS CAUSE OF ACTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that, when a defendant has not been personally served, the court may allow such defendant or his legal representative after the rendition of any judgment to answer to the merits of the original action, to entitle a defendant seeking to set aside a default, he need only show that he has not been personally served and has a good cause of action which he could have presented had he been informed of the pendency of the action, for there is no presumption of negligence as in cases where there has been personal service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 139*)—OPENING DEFAULT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The determination whether a defendant in an action in which there was no personal service was guilty of laches in failing to appear, there being a showing, in opposition to the motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to open the default, that he had actual notice of the action in time to have entered an appearance and presented his defense, rests in the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-268; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by James B. Boland against all persons claiming title to certain land. After a judgment by default, Dolores V. Stephens, individually and as administratrix of Micaela A. de Morgan, moved to set aside a default judgment and to open the cause, and from a denial thereof, she appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Cannon (S. W. Molkenbuhr, of counsel), for appellant. Morrison, Cope & Brobeck (Edward Hohfeld, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. In a proceeding under the so-called McEnerney act (Stats. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), the plaintiff obtained judgment declaring him to be the owner in fee of a certain lot in San Francisco. The judgment was rendered upon default on May 27, 1907. On December 2, 1907, Dolores V. Stephens, claiming as sole heir of Micaela A. de Morgan, deceased, served and filed a notice of motion to be made on December 13, 1907, to set aside the judgment and open the cause for further proceedings in defense. On May 26, 1908, she was duly appointed as the administratrix of the estate of Micaela A. de Morgan, and as such, on the same day, she served and filed a notice of motion to be made on May 27, 1908, to set aside the judgment and allow her to answer. Both motions were denied by the court. From the orders denying them, Dolores V. Stephens, for herself and as administratrix, appeals.

More than six months had elapsed after the rendition of the judgment before either motion was made. They were therefore too late as applications for relief on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, under the first clause of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 710, 109 Pac. 91; Thomas v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 631, 92 Pac. 739.

Another clause of the section provides that, "when from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action." The appellant claims that the application was sufficient under this clause, and that upon the facts shown at the hearing of the respective motions each of them should have been granted. There was no personal service of the summons on Micaela A. de Morgan, nor was she named in the affidavit filed with the complaint as required by sections 5 and 6 of the act, as a person claiming a lien upon or interest in the lot. The motions were heard together and upon the same affidavits. It is unnecessary to consider any question except the proposition that Micaela A. de Morgan was barred during her lifetime by reason of her laches and acquiescence in the proceedings. Upon this ground we think the motions were properly denied.

The summons was duly issued in the action on January 24, 1907. The first publication thereof was made on January 29, 1907, and the last publication on April 2, 1907. The time fixed by section 8 of the act, within which Micaela A. de Morgan was required to make answer if she claimed any interest in the property, expired on April 29, 1907. She died on May 10, 1907, without having entered her appearance, or taking any steps to preserve any rights she may have had in the property. Seventeen days thereafter the judgment was rendered.

[1] The motion was heard upon affidavits. In such cases, where the affidavits are conflicting, "those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts therein stated must be taken as established." Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 19, 91 Pac. 1002, and cases there cited.

[2] The following facts were shown by the affidavits filed in opposition to the motion: For several years prior to the beginning of the action, and from thence until her death, she and Bolland lived in the same dwelling; the same being situated on said lot. A copy of the summons was posted on a door in the front part of the house on January 31, 1907, and remained so posted for a considerable time thereafter. Micaela A. de Morgan was confined to her bed during the time between the beginning of said action and her death, but she was capable and able to transact business and she was a woman not easily influenced by others. She was informed of the notice posted on the door of the house, and of the action begun by the plaintiff to establish his title to the lot, and she was asked if she wanted to appear in the action to oppose it. She stated, in effect, that she did not, that she had conveyed the lot to the plaintiff several years before for considerations satisfactory to herself, that he had begun the action in accordance with her desire, in order to restore his title of record, and that she was satisfied that he should have the property. This notice and the pendency of said action was called to her attention several times by different persons during the time within which she might have appeared. There was not even an attempt on the part of the appellant to contradict these statements, or to show that Mrs. de Morgan had no notice of the pendency of the action, or that she was in any manner deceived in regard to the nature of the action. No excuse was offered in her behalf. It is entirely clear that, if she had lived and instituted these proceedings herself, she would have been precluded from obtaining any relief against the judgment thus rendered with her knowledge and at her request or desire. The provision in question was not designed for the relief of persons not served with summons, who permit a judgment to be taken against them with their full knowledge and consent. The affidavits also show that Dolores V. Stephens was informed of the pendency of the action soon after it was begun and that she endeavored to induce Mrs. de Morgan to make a defense thereto, but that Mrs. de Morgan refused to do so. She denied this, but she offered no excuse for the delay except her alleged ignorance of the pendency of the action until "long after" the judgment was rendered.

[3] In applications for relief under this clause of the section there is no presumption of neglect, as in cases where there has been personal service. The party is not required, in the first instance, to do more than show that he has not been personally served and that he has a good defense to the action on the merits which he could have presented had he been informed of its pendency. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 354, 90 Pac. 691.

[4] But his opponent may show in opposition to the application that the applicant had actual notice of the action in time to have entered an appearance and present the defense, and that the failure to do so was owing to his neglect or to his consent to the judgment. In that event a case arises for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and it must determine whether or not the laches is of a character that should preclude the relief. Bogart v. Kiene, 85 Minn. 262, 88 N. W. 748; Mueller v. McCulloch, 59 Minn. 409, 61 N. W. 455; Keenan v. Daniels, 18 S. D. 102, 99 N. W. 853; Blyth v. Swenson, 15 Utah, 352, 49 Pac. 1027; Jordan v. Hutchinson, 39 Wash. 373, 81 Pac. 867. The court below was justified in refusing the relief upon the facts shown in opposition thereto. They would support a finding that Mrs. de Morgan consented to the judgment and desired it.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BABCOCK. (Cr. 1,653.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 6, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 189*)—OFFENSES INCLUDED—STATUTORY RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT.

A charge of statutory rape includes the offense of assault with intent to commit rape without force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 588; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

2. RAPE (§ 53*)—STATUTORY RAPE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence on a prosecution for statutory rape held to show an assault with intent to commit rape, provided the female was under the age of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-81; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. RAPE (§ 52*)—STATUTORY RAPE—AGE OF CONSENT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence on a prosecution for statutory rape held to warrant a finding that the female was under the age of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 388*)—IMPEACHMENT—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS—FOUNDATION.

No foundation having been laid for impeachment of the mother of prosecutrix in statutory rape who had testified to prosecutrix being under 16 years old, the mother of another girl, over that age, could not testify as to the relative ages of the two girls, it appearing her only knowledge thereon was from a statement of prosecutrix's mother, in a casual conversation, prior to the occurrence, about the two girls.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1233-1242; Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 670*)—TRIAL—ACQUAINTING COURT WITH OBJECT OF QUESTION.

The question asked by counsel for defendant in statutory rape at the end of a long examination, in no way touching the age of prosecutrix, as to how she appeared at the time of the trial as compared with her appearance at the time of the event, so far as age was concerned, and whether she was dressed differently, not indicating materiality of the evidence sought, defendant should have indicated the precise object of the question; so that, in the absence of any such action on his part, sustaining an objection of immateriality and incompetency was justified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1593; Dec. Dig. § 670.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INTIMATION AS TO JUDGE'S OPINION ON FACTS.

The court in a statutory rape case having by proper instructions left to the jury the question of the age of the female, with instructions to find for defendant in case they had any reasonable doubt as to whether or not she was under the age of 16 years, the use of the words "child in question," in another instruction, the object of which was only to inform the jury that the offense of assault with intent to commit rape was included in the charge of rape and of the elements of the two offenses, could not have been understood by the jury as an intimation of an opinion of the judge that the girl was under that age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—PRESUMPTION.

Though at the time of the birth in S. county of prosecutrix in statutory rape, whose age was in issue, there was a law requiring physicians and professional midwives to keep a registry of the time of each birth at which they assisted, and to file it with the county recorder, the statement of the district attorney in his argument in reply to a claim that the prosecution had not shown the girl's age by producing the records of birth in S. county that the law requiring registration of births was not in force at that time will be considered harmless, as it must be assumed that if there was such a record of prosecutrix's birth favorable to defendant it would have been produced by him, and therefore none having been produced, that there was none.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1037*)—APPEAL—IMPROPER REMARKS OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY—NECESSITY OF INVOKING ACTION BY COURT.

Defendant, having simply noted an exception to an improper remark of the district attorney in argument, and not having asked that the jury be instructed that it was improper and to disregard it, cannot complain thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1691, 2645; Dec. Dig. § 1037.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 929*)—NEW TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF BAILIFF.

Defendant is not entitled to a new trial on a showing merely that a bailiff, who, on two occasions, had custody of the jury, expressed to various persons during the trial his opinion that defendant was guilty; it not being shown that any of these statements were made in the presence or hearing, or came to the knowledge, of any juror.

Melvin, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

O. F. Babcock was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial appeals. Affirmed.

D. K. Trask and Edward A. Regan, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was informed against for the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed upon a female under the age of 16 years, and upon his trial under such information was convicted of the crime of "assault with intent to commit the crime of rape." From the judgment of imprisonment pronounced on said conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appealed to the District Court of Appeal, and such appeals have been regularly transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

[1] The particular kind of rape charged by the information was that defined by subdivision 1 of section 261, Penal Code, as follows: "Rape is an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, * * * (1) where the female is under the age of sixteen years." It is not disputed, of course, that in such a case neither force nor violence is essential to the commission of the crime of rape, or that it is immaterial that the act of sexual intercourse was with the full consent of the female. She is below the age of consent, and, as it has been put, "the law resists for her." People v. Roach, 129 Cal. 34, 61 Pac. 574. In view of this well-established rule, it is now so firmly settled in this state as to be no longer open to question that one who lays his hands upon such a female, with the intent and for the purpose, then and there, to accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with her, is by so doing guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape, even though he does not use or intend in any event to use any force or violence, and the female in fact offers no resistance whatever, or even expressly consents to all he does. The offense is complete when he has thus laid his hands upon her with the intention of then and there accomplishing such purpose, and it is entirely immaterial that he subsequently voluntarily desists, without accomplishing his purpose. As said in People v. Courier, 79 Mich. 366, 44 N. W. 571, quoted approvingly in People v. Roach, supra: "In cases of this kind it is not necessary that it shall be shown * * * that the accused intended to gratify his passion in all events. If he intended to have sexual intercourse with the child, and took steps looking toward such intercourse, and laid hands upon her for that purpose, although he did not mean to use any force, or to complete his attempt if it caused the child pain, and desisted from his attempt as soon as it hurt, he yet would be guilty of an assault with intent to commit the crime charged in the information." The following cases in this state support the conclusions we have stated: People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 Pac. 842; People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776; People v. Roach, 129 Cal. 33, 61 Pac. 574; People v. Gomez, 118 Cal. 326, 50 Pac. 427; People v. Louriutz, 114 Cal. 628, 46 Pac. 613; People v. Verdegreen, 106 Cal. 211, 39 Pac. 607, 46 Am. St. Rep. 234; People v. Gordon, 70 Cal. 467, 11 Pac. 762. The rule enunciated in such cases as People v. Fleming, 94 Cal. 308, 29 Pac. 647, is not applicable where the female is under the age of consent. It necessarily follows that the offense of assault with intent to commit rape is included in such a charge of rape as was made by the information in this case. The case of People v. Allen, 144 Cal. 298, 77 Pac. 948, is in no way in conflict with what we have said. The affirmance of the refusal in that case to give an instruction that the jury might convict the defendant charged with rape of the lesser offense of assault with intent to commit rape was clearly based upon the assumption that the evidence in that particular case was of such a nature that the only possible conclusion was that he was either guilty of rape or not guilty of any offense, just as in certain cases a refusal to instruct as to manslaughter where the information charged murder has been upheld.

[2] It follows from what we have said that according to the defendant's own testimony, as given on his trial, he was guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape, provided the female was at the time of the occurrence under the age of 16 years. The testimony of the witnesses for the people tended to show that he fully accomplished an act of sexual intercourse with her. His own testimony was that the act was not accomplished. But he admitted that following a conversation between them a few hours before she came to his office on the day named in the information, ostensibly with the view of securing employment, and remained there several hours, during which each of them had four or five drinks of apricot brandy; that finally, with the intent to then and there have sexual intercourse with her and for that purpose alone, he laid his hands upon her, and was proceeding to accomplish the act, when, by reason of the apparent illness of the girl, due to the excessive drinking of the brandy, he voluntarily desisted. Thus, according to his own testimony, he was guilty of assault with intent to commit rape, if the girl was then under 16 years of age, and this is the offense of which he was convicted by the jury.

[3] It thus appears that the only material question of fact in the case as to which there was any dispute was whether the girl was under the age of 16 years at the time of the occurrence, which was November 20, 1909. The evidence introduced by the district attorney on this question was to the effect that she was born in San Diego county, Cal., on February 6, 1894. The evidence to this effect was given by the girl herself, her mother, her grandmother, and the nurse who attended her mother at her confinement. The testimony of the nurse was fortified by a written memorandum which she said she had made at the time. The evidence introduced by defendant on this point consisted of the testimony of three witnesses to the effect that in casual conversations had at times shortly preceding November 20, 1909, the girl's mother had said that the girl was 16 years old, and the testimony of one witness to the effect that the girl had told her that she was five or six months younger than the witness, which would have made her 16 at the time of the occurrence. Whatever conflict in the evidence was created by this testimony was, of course, purely a question for the jury and the trial court, for it is clear that the evidence was amply sufficient to support the conclusion that the girl was under the age of 16 years on November 20, 1909.

[4] A careful examination of the record develops no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court in the matter of the admission or exclusion of evidence material to the issue of the age of the girl. Mrs. Spaulding, an acquaintance of the girl and her mother for a few months only preceding the occurrence, was asked how the age of the girl compared with that of her own daughter, who was 16 on March 15, 1909. It was apparent from her testimony that her only knowledge on that question was such as she may have acquired by reason of a statement of the girl's mother, as to the girl's age, made in a casual conversation about the two girls. No foundation for any impeachment of the mother by Mrs. Spaulding had been laid. The purposed evidence of Mrs. Spaulding was thus inadmissible for any purpose, and the trial court did not err in striking out what she had already said in attempting to answer the question. Whenever the proper foundation had been laid for the impeachment of the mother on the question of her daughter's age by showing inconsistent statements, the trial judge allowed proof of the statements claimed to be inconsistent.

[5] Another witness who knew the girl prior to and on November 20, 1909, was asked by defendant's attorney how the girl appeared at the trial as compared with her appearance on and before November 20, 1909, so far as age was concerned, and also whether she was dressed differently on the trial from the way she dressed on and before November 20, 1909. Objections to these questions were sustained. The object of the proposed evidence was not stated to the trial court, and no statement was made as to the nature of the answers expected. Defendant's counsel simply asked the questions at the end of a long examination in no way touching the question of age, made no statement, in the face of the objection of immateriality and incompetency, as to what he expected to prove, and accepted the rulings of the court without comment. It is clear that answers to these questions would not necessarily have shown a condition of affairs material to any issue in the case. It was not suggested to the court that any change had been made in the appearance of the girl for the purpose of making her appear younger to the jury than she really was, or that would have such effect. We think that it was incumbent on defendant, under the circumstances, to acquaint the trial court with the precise object of the questions, and that, in the absence of such statement on his part the court was justified in sustaining the objections. See Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 453, 82 Pac. 45. There is certainly nothing in the record to indicate that the proposed proof was of the slightest importance to the defendant. While the girl was on the witness stand, she testified that she was not wearing her hair exactly as she did on November 20, 1909, but that she was wearing it "very similar." She said that she had no objection to dressing it as it was on that day, but the trial court refused to instruct her to do so, although requested by defendant's counsel to make such direction. There was no intimation by anybody that the hair was dressed at the time of the trial in such a manner as to make the girl appear younger than she, in fact, was, or that any change had been made in the method of dressing her hair for the purpose of producing that effect. The mere fact that she was wearing it at the time of the trial in a slightly different way from that used by her on and before November 20, 1909, was of no importance.

[6] The trial court clearly and definitely instructed the jury that it was for them to determine the question of the age of the female upon whom the offense was alleged to have been committed, and that, if they had a reasonable doubt as to whether or not at the time of the alleged intercourse the female was under the age of 16 years, they must give the defendant the benefit of such doubt and find him not guilty, even though satisfied that he had sexual intercourse with her. It is claimed, however, that by the use of the words "child in question" in another instruction on the offense of assault with intent to commit rape the trial judge intimated to the jury that he believed that the girl was under 16 years of age at the time of the occurrence. The sole object of this instruction was to inform the jury that the offense of assault with intent to commit rape was included in the charge of rape and of the elements essential to constitute such offense. There is to our minds nothing in this instruction, especially when considered in connection with the other instructions given, indicating that the term "child in question" was used by the judge, or could have been understood by the jury to have been used by the judge, as an expression or intimation of his opinion as to whether the girl was under the age of 16 years. The charge clearly left that question of fact solely to the jury, unembarrassed by even the slightest intimation of opinion on the part of the trial judge.

[7] Complaint is made that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in his closing argument. He said, apparently in reply to a claim made by defendant's attorney in argument, that the prosecution had not shown the age of the girl by producing a copy of the record of births in San Diego county: "How foolish for counsel to stand here and ask why we did not bring the records from San Diego county. Well, gentlemen, every man is supposed to know the law, and that the law requiring registration of births was not in force at the time this girl was born, and therefore there is no official record of anyone who was born 15 years ago, except it is in the churches and family Bibles." Counsel for defendant noted an exception to the remarks of the district attorney, saying: "There is no evidence of any such fact." The district attorney's statement was not correct. There was a law in force at the time of the girl's birth requiring physicians and professional midwives to keep a registry of the time of each birth at which they assist professionally, and to quarterly file with the county recorder a certified copy of their register. Sections 3075, 3077, Pol. Code, as they then stood. Whether this law had been followed in the case of this girl, and consequently whether there was any official record in her case, did not affirmatively appear, but it is reasonable to assume that if such a record existed in regard to this girl, showing anything in regard to her date of birth that would assist defendant, it being as available to defendant as it was to the people, such record would have been produced by defendant. There was no pretence on the trial, or on the motion for a new trial or on this appeal, that there was, in fact, any official record in San Diego county showing anything inconsistent with the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution as to the date of the birth of the girl. Under the circumstances, an appellate court should assume that there was no such record, and, this being so, it is impossible to see how defendant could have been prejudiced by the statement of the district attorney.

[8] Furthermore, defendant is in no position to avail himself of the claim of misconduct of the district attorney in this matter. He in no way invoked any action on the part of the trial court to obviate the effect of the statement, and the statement was of such a nature that any improper effect could have been avoided. He simply noted an exception to the remarks of the district attorney, as was the case in People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 159, 65 Pac. 295, where the district attorney made an improper statement. This court said: "This was improper, but its effect would have been removed if the defendant had asked the court to instruct the jury that it was improper, and to disregard it. He did not invoke the action of the court, but contented himself with excepting to the remarks of the district attorney." And the judgment was affirmed. There is no other specification of misconduct on the part of the district attorney that in view of the circumstances of this case requires notice.

[9] On the motion for a new trial, defendant presented several affidavits to the effect that during the progress of the trial, and before the case was given to the jury, the bailiff of the court had expressed to various persons his opinion that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged. The jury was not in the custody of an officer during the progress of the trial, except during a recess for dinner just prior to the closing argument of the district attorney, and again when it retired to deliberate upon the verdict. This bailiff was the officer who had charge of the jury at such times. It was not made to appear that any of these statements of the bailiff was made within the presence or hearing of any juror, or came to the knowledge of any juror, and the bailiff's affidavit negatived any such condition. The trial court was amply warranted in concluding that no juror heard or knew of any statement made by the bailiff in this behalf. It follows that, however much we may condemn the action of the bailiff, it must be assumed here in accord with the conclusion of the trial court that no juror had any knowledge of the opinion so expressed, and that consequently defendant could not have been injured thereby. Complaint is also made in this connection that the court erred in placing the jury in charge of this bailiff during the recess already referred to and when it retired to deliberate upon its verdict. A complete answer to this claim is that the record does not show that defendant on either occasion made any showing of fact tending to prove that the bailiff had expressed any opinion relative to his guilt, or that the fact of disqualification had in any way been brought to the attention of the trial court. There was a mere charge that he had expressed such opinion, and no evidence whatever was offered in support thereof. The trial court did not err in refusing to sustain the charge in the absence of some showing to support it. The case of People v. Fellows, 122 Cal. 238, 54 Pac. 830, is, therefore, not in point.

There was no such showing of newly discovered evidence as to compel the granting of a new trial on that ground. In fact, the showing was of such a nature that we do not see how the trial court could well have held that there should be a new trial on account thereof.

What we have said disposes of all the points we deem it necessary to discuss. It is apparent from the record that defendant has had a fair and impartial trial upon the merits, and we can perceive no ground upon which an appellate court may properly reverse the judgment of the trial court or its order denying a new trial.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

MELVIN, J. I dissent. I think that the flagrant misconduct of the district attorney deprived the defendant of a fair trial. Counsel for defendant in his argument asked why the prosecution had not produced the record of births from San Diego county, and invoked the presumption that "higher evidence would be adverse from inferior being produced." Section 1963, subd. 6, Code Civ. Proc. This he had the right to do, and the argument was most appropriate, for I regard record evidence of a birth higher than the mere recollection of a witness. In answer to this argument, the district attorney was permitted by the court to declare that at the alleged date of the birth of the prosecutrix there was no law requiring the registration of births. In this the district attorney was mistaken, but the court ratified the mistake by failing to notice the objection of defendant's counsel. Therefore the defendant was deprived of the benefit of the presumption, which very probably would have turned the scales in his favor. That the jurors did not believe the girl's testimony is evident from the fact that they did not find in accordance with her story that an act of sexual intercourse had been committed. They did believe defendant's account of the happenings in his office. The only question left for them to determine was the age of the girl. There was evidence strongly tending to contradict the girl's mother, and the prosecutrix herself, in that it showed, if believed, statements by them made prior to the trial that the girl was more than 16 years of age. The production of the record would have been, therefore, very illuminating to the jury, and the failure to produce it would have probably convinced the jurors that it would fail to corroborate the witnesses for the prosecution. The jurors would have been justified in such a conclusion as a result of the presumption above stated. In this condition of the case the district attorney threw the weight of his official dignity into an erroneous explanation of his failure to produce the record. That the incident deprived the defendant of a clear right to the benefit of the presumption can scarcely be doubted, and that the error was most harmful to him seems to me to be absolutely certain.

I think the judgment should be reversed.

SIMPSON v. POLICE COURT OF CITY OF RIVERSIDE et al. (L. A. 2,670.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1911.)

1. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—COURTS—EXISTENCE OF ADEQUATE REMEDY BY APPEAL—"PLAIN, SPEEDY AND ADEQUATE REMEDY IN THE ORDINARY COURSE OF LAW."

Riverside City Charter (St. 1907, p. 1330) § 193, creates a police court, and gives it jurisdiction, concurrent with the justices' court, of all civil actions and proceedings arising within the city limits. Defendant in an action in that court to recover on a note, after his demurrer for want of jurisdiction had been overruled, applied for a writ of prohibition against the police court and the judge thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, defines the writ of prohibition and its effect. Section 1103 provides that the writ may be issued to an inferior tribunal in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, and section 974 gives an appeal from the judgment of a justice's or police court. Held, that the prohibition was properly denied, because under section 974 the applicant had a plain and adequate remedy at law by appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-19; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. PROHIBITION (§ 34*)—RIGHT OF REVIEW—PARTIES AGGRIEVED.

Where a writ of prohibition has been granted by the superior court against the police court on the ground of want of jurisdiction after relator's demurrer to the complaint in a suit in that court on the same ground had been overruled, and the grant of the writ was erroneous because of the existence of a remedy by appeal, the police court is aggrieved so as to warrant an appeal, even though it lacked jurisdiction of the suit before it which it was prohibited from acting on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

Beatty, C. J., and Angellotti, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Application by A. Simpson for a writ of prohibition to be directed against the Police Court of the City of Riverside and G. A. French, judge thereof. From a judgment of the superior court granting a peremptory writ of prohibition, the defendants appeal. Judgment reversed, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the proceeding.

Miguel Estudillo, for appellants. Chas. R. Gray, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court awarding a peremptory writ of prohibition. An action was commenced in the police court of the city of Riverside by E. Carlin against A. Simpson (respondent herein) to recover $125 alleged to be due upon a promissory note. Simpson appeared and demurred to the complaint, upon the ground that the police court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The demurrer being overruled, this proceeding was instituted in the superior court to prohibit the police court and the judge thereof from proceeding further in the cause.

[1] The charter of the city of Riverside provides for the creation of a police court, and undertakes to vest in that court jurisdiction, concurrent with that of the justices' court, "of all civil actions and proceedings arising within the corporate limits of the city and which might be tried in said justices' court." Section 193, Stats. 1907, p. 1330. The contention of the respondent is that this provision is ineffectual as a grant of jurisdiction in cases of the kind here involved. Regardless of the merits of this contention, we think the writ of prohibition should have been denied in the court below.

for the reason that the petitioner, Simpson, had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law for any act to be done in excess of the jurisdiction of the police court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1102, 1103. An appeal may be taken to the superior court on questions of law or fact, or both, from a judgment rendered in a civil action in the police court. Code Civ. Proc. § 974. That such appeal is a plain and speedy remedy is not questioned. We think it clear, too, that the remedy is entirely adequate.

In support of this conclusion it will not be necessary to do more than to refer to the recent decision of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District in Hamberger v. Police Court of the City of Fresno, 12 Cal. App. 153, 106 Pac. 894, 107 Pac. 614. In that case, which was in its facts precisely similar to the one at bar, the court held that the writ of prohibition was properly denied for the reason above stated, and cited authorities to support its ruling. An application for a hearing in this court was denied. The chief justice filed an elaborate opinion in support of his dissent from the order refusing to transfer the cause, and in that opinion expressed his view that an appeal which could not be carried beyond the superior court is not such an adequate remedy as to bar the petitioner's right to resort to a writ of prohibition, in which proceeding he might have the question at issue ultimately determined by the highest court in the state. But, notwithstanding the forceful presentation of this position, a majority of the court took the other view and agreed with the District Court of Appeal that prohibition would not lie. The court below therefore erred in granting the writ, for the reason that the plaintiff had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

[2] This being so, we will not enter into any examination of the question of the jurisdiction of the police court of the city of Riverside. Even if we should upon such an examination conclude that that court was without jurisdiction, it could not be said that the error of the superior court in granting a writ of prohibition was without prejudice to the appellant. The appellant is the police court. It is not a party to the action of Carlin against Simpson, and has no direct interest in the outcome of that action. It has, however, a right to appeal from any judgment against it prohibiting it from proceeding in that action, and has a right to be relieved from any writ improperly issued so prohibiting it. Whether acting within or without its jurisdiction, it is subject to prohibition only in cases where, under the statute, prohibition will properly lie. It is as much injured by a writ of prohibition granted at the suit of one having a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law as by a writ granted in a case where it is acting within its jurisdiction.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the proceeding.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. I am in entire accord with the views expressed by the District Court of Appeal in deciding this case, to the effect that the police court of the city of Riverside is without jurisdiction of the civil case, action in which by said police court it was sought to restrain by this proceeding in prohibition. Under such circumstances, I quite agree with the District Court of Appeal that a reversal of the judgment of the superior court granting a writ of prohibition should not be had, even if we assume, in accord with some of the decisions, that the writ might have been denied upon the ground that the parties seeking it had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal. No good purpose can be subserved by permitting the police court to hear and determine the case on its merits, with the consequent expense and inconvenience to both parties, if the decision of that court ought to be set aside on an appeal to the superior court, on the ground of want of jurisdiction. See Campbell v. Durand (Utah) 115 Pac. 986, 990. Further, the question whether a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal exists in any particular case is, to my mind, one largely within the discretion of the court to which the application for prohibition is made. The mere fact that there is an appeal given by the law is not necessarily sufficient to bar the remedy by prohibition. The remedy by appeal must always be plain, speedy, and adequate, and whether it is of such a nature must depend on the facts of each particular case. We have nothing in the record of this case that compels the conclusion that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the court in determining that the remedy by appeal was not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. No effort is here made to refute the proposition which I attempted to sustain by my opinion in Hamberger v. Police Court (reported in 12 Cal. App. 153, 106 Pac. 894, 107 Pac. 614), and I may assume it to be conceded that the doctrine of that case necessarily results in denying to the citizens of California a right of appeal to this court secured to them by the Constitution. By the Constitution the superior court is given original jurisdiction, and this court and the District Court of Appeal also are given appellate jurisdiction in prohibition—that is to say, in all original proceedings properly instituted for the purpose of preventing a threatened usurpation of judicial authority. But a police court, having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, requires a citizen to answer a suit upon a pecuniary obligation. Objection is properly made by demurrer to the jurisdiction. The objection is overruled and the defendant required to answer. He petitions for a writ of prohibition, but it is denied by the superior court upon the sole ground that an appeal to that court from "the judgment sought" is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy for his grievance. In answer to this the petitioner urges that such an appeal would make the superior court his last resort in case the jurisdiction of the police court should there be sustained, whereas it is his desire and intention to avail himself of his constitutional right of appeal to the higher courts for a final determination of the authority of the police court to compel him to answer. To this there is no reply except that his deprivation of a constitutional right is too small a matter to be worth discussion. I am still unreconciled to this method of disposing of the question. But, conceding that my scruples on this point may be overnice, it is clear, as pointed out by Justice ANGELLOTTI, that there is a material difference between this case and the Fresno Case. The objection to prohibition upon the ground of other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy addresses itself to the discretion of the tribunal whose restraining power is invoked, it is not jurisdictional, and, whether it has granted or denied the writ, its order will not be reversed except for abuse of discretion. That the allowance of the remedy is discretionary is a doctrine thoroughly established by the cases decided in this court. The cases of Lindley v. Superior Court, 141 Cal. 220, 74 Pac. 765, and Ophir Company v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 82 Pac. 70, were precisely the same except in the matter of convenience to the courts and expense to the parties, yet in one the writ was granted and in the other denied. It does not follow, therefore, that, because the denial of the writ was affirmed in the Fresno Case, the allowance of the writ must be reversed in this case. If Judge Densmore had reason to conclude that a trial in the police court, followed by an appeal to his court, would involve costs and trouble out of all proportion to the amount in controversy, and if he could see that the question of jurisdiction, which sooner or later he must decide, could be solved in the original proceeding as conveniently and more expeditiously and with less expense than after a trial and appeal, how can it be said that he abused his discretion in allowing the writ? The question to be decided was purely a question of law. The allegations of the petition brought it within his jurisdiction, and the course he pursued in deciding it in advance of a trial and appeal was recommended by the same considerations which justify the ordinary practice in civil and criminal actions of determining the issues of law before proceeding to try the issues of fact. His course, in short, if sustained, would have resulted in a saving of time and money to the parties, and would have made a useful precedent in like cases. It would also have settled the important question as to the jurisdiction of the police court before the statute of limitations became a bar to a new action by Carlin in a justice's court if that became necessary. In view of the fact that the superior court, the District Court of Appeal, and Justice ANGELLOTTI (the only member of this court who has considered the question) are all of the opinion that the police court of Riverside has no jurisdiction of civil actions, it seems inevitable that any judgment against the defendant in the action commenced there must be reversed on appeal, after it is too late for the plaintiff to commence a new action for the same cause in a court of competent jurisdiction. It would seem, therefore, that the plaintiff in that action was even more deeply interested than the defendant (petitioner here) in the speedy determination of a question so vitally affecting his interests, and this fact lends additional support to the action of the superior court.

Finally, I am obliged to say that the reason assigned for setting aside the judgment of the District Court of Appeal in this case appears to me to be scarcely adequate. The appeal from the superior court was properly taken to that court. There the question as to the jurisdiction of the police court was carefully considered and the conclusion reached, in accordance with that of the superior court, that it had no jurisdiction of civil actions—and, although they agreed with the appellant that prohibition was not the appropriate remedy, they nevertheless affirmed the judgment of the superior court upon the ground that the error in issuing the writ was without prejudice. I quote the last paragraph of their opinion: "While we concur with appellant in his contention that the court below erred in granting a writ of prohibition where the right of appeal afforded a complete and adequate remedy, nevertheless, under section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is made our duty to disregard any error which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed by reason of any error unless it shall appear from the record that such error was prejudicial and that the party complaining and appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury. In our opinion, then, the police court of the city of Riverside having no jurisdiction, and any judgment rendered by such court being void upon its face, the appellant cannot be said to have suffered any substantial injury by the action of the court in prohibiting further proceedings in relation to such matter."

This reason for refusing to reverse the judgment of the superior court is deemed insufficient by this court because, however just and sound that judgment may be upon the substantial merits of the controversy, it stands in the form of a writ "improperly" issued, and the police court's right of appeal is infringed unless it is relieved from it. It cannot, of course, be denied that the police court has the right of appeal from an adverse judgment in prohibition. The Constitution secures it in that right by the same clause that secures the right to one who invokes the remedy to protect him against judicial usurpation—the right pertains to the remedy, and is not secured to one party to the exclusion of the other. This solicitude for the right of a tribunal asserting a questionable jurisdiction to prosecute its appeal to this court from a judgment which rightfully restricts it to its proper functions seems somewhat excessive when compared with our indifference to the practical nullification of the right of appeal accorded by the same provision of the Constitution to one who justly complains that he is threatened by the process of a judicial usurper. He, it is held, in cases similar to this, can never get to this court on that question. His only remedy is an appeal to the superior court—an appeal which can be carried no farther.

And this scrupulous regard for the defendant's right of appeal from an adverse judgment in prohibition—in which I cordially sympathize—suggests a further consideration. Suppose the respondent had appealed to the superior court from the judgment of the police court, Judge Densmore would have reversed the judgment for the same reason that led him to issue the writ of prohibition, and the result would have been that the police court would have found itself practically divested of its jurisdiction in civil cases by a judgment in a collateral proceeding from which it would have had no appeal. If, therefore, it has a rightful claim to the disputed jurisdiction, the remedy elected by the respondent has preserved to the police court a right of appeal which otherwise it would have lost. Where, then, is the prejudice resulting from the improper issuance of the writ? The idea seems to be that strict regularity of procedure must be adhered to at all hazards, and that a court whose claims to civil jurisdiction can only be drawn in question secundum artem in a proceeding which it cannot defend has a real grievance if attacked in a proceeding which it can defend to the last ditch.

HAUB v. LEGGETT et al. (S. F. 5,726.) (Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1911.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 451*)—ACTIONS—FINDINGS—NEW TRIAL.

Where, in an action against an estate to recover $1,500 for services to decedent, the answer averred that the allowance of the claim by the executors and the judge of the superior court to whom it was presented for only $500 was a bar to the recovery of more than that sum, but further denied the debt in excess of $500, the court's failure to find as to the amount actually due was error, requiring a new trial if the allowance by the executors and court was not a bar to the action; the issue as to the amount being material requiring a finding thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 451.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 241*)—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIM—EFFECT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1497, provides that every claim, when allowed by the executors and judge of the superior court, must, within 30 days, be filed and ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate to be paid in due course of administration. Section 1498, as amended by St. 1909, p. 147, permits the holder of a matured claim rejected by the executor or judge to sue thereon within three months after service of notice of rejection. Section 1503 provides that, if a claim be rejected in part, the creditor cannot recover costs in a suit to enforce it unless he recovers more than that offered to be allowed. Section 1504 provides that a judgment in an action upon a money demand against the estate only establishes the claim as if it had been allowed by the executor and a judge. Sections 1628 and 1622 require the executor to exhibit in his accounts all debts presented and allowed. Section 1636 permits any allowed claim exhibited to be contested by the heirs. Section 1647 requires the court to make an order for the payment of debts upon the settlement of the executor's accounts, and section 1649 makes the executor personally liable to creditors upon the making of an order for payment of debts. Held that, while a creditor of the estate may treat a partial allowance of his claim by the executors as a rejection of the entire claim and sue without presenting the claim to the judge of the superior court, he may, after having his claim partially allowed by the executors and such partial allowance approved by the judge, sue for the whole claim; an allowed claim not amounting to an absolute judgment so as to merge the whole claim into an order of allowance, and bar an action against the estate for the entire claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 849; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Sawell, Judge.

Action by Anna R. Haub against Joseph Leggett and another, as executors of the estate of Amanda M. Scales, deceased. From an order denying a motion for a new trial after judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Fabius T. Finch, for appellant. James G. Maguire, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Appeal by plaintiff from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The action is to recover $1,500, alleged to be due plaintiff for services rendered and food supplied to the decedent in her lifetime. The evidence showed the following facts: Plaintiff presented to the defendants, as executors of the estate of said decedent, a claim for said sum for allowance as a claim against said estate. The executors allowed it for only $500, and indorsed thereon and signed a statement to that effect. Thereupon the plaintiff presented the claim, so indorsed, to the judge of the superior court, and requested him to act upon it. The judge allowed and approved it for $500, and thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff's attorney, it was filed in the office of the clerk of the court. Thereafter, within the time allowed by law, this action was begun. Evidence was also given at the trial tending to prove the indebtedness.

The answer set up the allowance of the claim by the executors and the judge for $500 only, as a judgment, or adjudication, of the controversy, and in bar of the right to recover more than that sum. It also denied the alleged debt as to the excess over $500. The court made findings showing the presentation of the claim, the refusal to allow it for more than $500 and the filing of the claim after such partial allowance, but made no finding upon the issues as to the merits of the claim. It was of the opinion that the allowance so made constituted a judgment for the amount allowed and a bar to any action upon the claim, and that therefore no further findings were necessary.

[1] One ground of the motion for new trial was that the decision is against law, in that the court failed therein to find upon material issues. If the aforesaid allowance of the claim is not a bar to a subsequent action upon the claim as a whole, then the other issues were material, and the new trial should have been granted upon that ground. Swift v. Occidental, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 166, 74 Pac. 700; Black v. Harrison H. Co., 155 Cal. 131, 99 Pac. 494; Lyden v. Spohn Co., 155 Cal. 183, 100 Pac. 236.

[2] The executors, in support of the order appealed from, contend that the allowance of a claim by the executors and the judge, and the filing of it thereafter with the clerk, constitute a judgment upon the whole claim for the amount allowed, which has the effect of merging the claim in the order of allowance, so that under the familiar rule in regard to the merger of causes of action in judgments the claim ceases to exist except in its transformed state and is reduced to $500. It is conceded that, if the claim as partially allowed had not been approved by the judge and filed, the plaintiff would have been at liberty to sue for the whole claim. The contention is that such approval by the judge and subsequent filing with the clerk is a complete estoppel preventing the plaintiff from claiming more than the part allowed.

The Code provides that every claim when allowed by the executor and judge must within 30 days thereafter "be filed in the court and be ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration." Code Civ. Proc. § 1497.

If a matured claim is rejected by the executor or judge, the holder is at liberty to bring suit thereon within three months after the date of its rejection, as the law was when these proceedings were taken. Code Civ. Proc. § 1498. As it is now, it is three months after service of notice of rejection. Stats. 1909, p. 147. If it is rejected by the executor or judge in part only and "the creditor refuse to accept the amount allowed in satisfaction of his claim," he cannot recover costs in such suit unless he recovers on the claim more than "that offered to be allowed." Code Civ. Proc. § 1503. A judgment in an action against the executor upon a money demand against the estate "only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and a judge." Code Civ. Proc. § 1504. The executor must in his accounts "exhibit all debts which have been presented and allowed." Sections 1628, 1622. Any allowed claim, so exhibited, may be contested by the heirs, and a trial by jury may be demanded thereon. Section 1636. Upon the settlement of such account the court must make an order for the payment of the debts (section 1647), and the executor thereupon becomes personally liable to each creditor therefor, and execution may issue against him (section 1469).

These provisions show that an allowed claim against an estate does not attain to the dignity and force of an absolute judgment until, upon the settlement of an account, an order is made directing the executor to pay it. Prior to that time it ranks as an acknowledged debt, but it is still subject to contest by the heirs. It has not become conclusive in favor of the claimant. The decisions of this court have always recognized the inconclusive effect of an allowed claim. In Deck's Estate v. Gherke, 6 Cal. 669, it was held that such allowance was conclusive upon the settlement of an account, in favor of an administrator who had paid the claim before filing such account. The decision was made in 1856. The aforesaid provision of section 1636 allowing the heirs to contest was not then in the statute. It originated in 1861. Stats. 1861, p. 647, § 80. This provision expressly changes the rule of Deck's Estate v. Gherke, supra, on this point. See Estate of Fernandez, 119 Cal. 579, 51 Pac. 851. Other decisions have repeatedly recognized the rule that the allowance of a claim is not the equivalent of an ordinary judgment. In Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 228, 68 Am. Dec. 237, Estate of Crosby, 55 Cal. 582, Estate of Hill, 62 Cal. 186, Weihe v. Statham, 67 Cal. 84, 7 Pac. 143, and Wingerter v. Wingerter, 71 Cal. 111, 11 Pac. 853, it was held that such allowance does not bind the heir in a proceeding for the sale of land. In Estate of Hidden, 23 Cal. 363, it was doubted whether it was binding on a creditor upon a contest of an account. In Magraw v. McGlynn, 26 Cal. 431, the court says such allowed claim is a judgment "of a qualified character only," and that the subsequent order for payment upon settlement of an account is the final judgment. In Selna v. Selna, 125 Cal. 357, 58 Pac. 16, 73 Am. St. Rep. 47, it was said that, even if it were conceded that the taking of an ordinary judgment for the price of land was a waiver of a vendor's lien therefor, nevertheless the allowance of a claim therefor would not waive the lien, although the statement of the claim did not mention the lien. In Richardson v. Diss, 127 Cal. 53, 59 Pac. 197, the court held that, after the allowance of a claim on a note bearing 15 per cent. interest, the claim would continue to bear that rate. In Morton v. Adams, 124 Cal. 229, 56 Pac. 1038, 71 Am. St. Rep. 53, the plaintiff had bought land which was subject to the lien of a judgment taken against the vendor in her lifetime. The judgment was presented as a claim against the vendor's estate and duly allowed. It was held that this allowance did not merge the former judgment as in the case of an ordinary judgment, the court saying that "the allowance of a claim is not in any true sense a judgment," and that the lien was not destroyed.

From these decisions it is seen that an allowed claim is held to be not technically a judgment, and that all that has ever been decided concerning it is that, for some purposes, it has the effect of a judgment. Practically the same question here involved was decided in Walkerly v. Bacon, 85 Cal. 137, 24 Pac. 638. William Walkerly, the decedent, had acquired property which was subject to a parol trust in favor of John Walkerly, the plaintiff, for money amounting to $10,000. John filed a claim, as for a debt, against said estate for the whole sum, and it was duly allowed for $5,000. He then brought suit in equity to enforce the trust as to the remaining $5,000. This court decided that the allowance of the $5,000 upon the claim did not estop plaintiff from suing to establish a trust as to the balance. It said that the allowance of a part of the claim had no greater effect than would the payment of such part when the plaintiff made the necessary demand before suit, and that, if such part was not accepted in full satisfaction of the demand, the plaintiff was at liberty to proceed to enforce any legal or equitable remedy for the balance. The court added this remark: "We know of no statute which estops even a simple creditor from bringing his action for that which was disallowed him simply because he has performed a duty required of him by law in filing with the records of the estate the allowance which was made in his favor." This remark, although perhaps obiter so far as it refers to a creditor having no lien or charge against the estate, appears to us to state a correct principle of law, in view of the character which the statute and the decisions give to an order of the judge allowing a claim.

Such an order is made ex parte. There is neither a trial or hearing required. If the claim is allowed in full, it must be filed. If allowed in part only, it may properly be filed among the papers of the estate, for preservation as evidence in case the claimant should thereafter sue for the whole. We see no good reason for holding that such filing after a partial allowance by both executor and judge should constitute conclusive evidence of acceptance by the creditor of the part allowed in full satisfaction of his debt, or operate as a bar to a suit to recover the whole claim. It is not necessary to decide whether the suit in such a case should be for the whole claim, or only for the balance. If the creditor sues for the entire demand, giving no credit for the part allowed, as was done here, the executor or administrator can set up the allowance in the answer, as in this case was done, and the record will then necessarily show whether the judgment given is for the whole claim, or for the balance only. If it is for the whole, the allowance formerly made will be merged in such judgment. If for the balance only, the former allowance will stand. No injustice will be done in either case.

It is true the creditor may treat a partial allowance by the executor as a rejection of the entire claim, and may bring his suit at once without presenting it to the judge at all. But there is nothing in the statute which makes this the only mode of procedure or which declares that he cannot sue for the whole, if he first presents it to the judge and files it with the papers after the judge has approved the partial allowance of the executor. Nothing said in Zirker v. Hughes, 77 Cal. 235, 19 Pac. 423, is applicable here. It involved different statutes and proceedings. A claim against a county for $952.77 was allowed for only $640.77 by the board of supervisors, leaving a balance of $312. The claimant then sued in a justice's court on the claim, asking judgment for $299, and recovered judgment therefor, which was paid. He then sued Hughes, the county auditor, in mandamus to compel him to draw a warrant for the amount previously allowed. The judgment in the justice's court was pleaded in bar in the mandamus suit. It was held, in effect, that the statute required one claiming a debt against a county, if dissatisfied with a partial allowance thereof, to sue for his whole claim, and that, if he divided it into parts and sued for a part only, the judgment would merge the entire claim and bar the other part. This might be so if a similar course was pursued in the case of a claim against an estate. But here the suit was for the whole claim. Logically the rule stated in the Zirker Case, that the suit must be for the entire claim, would support the mode here adopted and authorize a judgment for the whole claim, thus merging the partial allowance.

The judgment and order are reversed.

STEPHENS v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 984.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 26, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 119*)—NEGLIGENCE—FURNISHING DANGEROUS APPLIANCES.

Defendant electric railway company by providing an electric grinder without a fuse attached to it between the motor and the power wire, which would have broken the current and prevented injury to plaintiff from the grinder flashing fire, even if the motor had been defective, was negligent in failing to furnish reasonably safe appliances to protect employes from danger; fuses being usually furnished on such appliances and adequately protecting employes from danger.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 103*)—MASTER'S DUTY—DELEGATION FOR APPLIANCES.

A master could not delegate the duty of furnishing a reasonably safe appliance, so that the fact that its foreman was ignorant of the necessity of an appliance to make the operation of an electric motor safe to an employé would not excuse the master from furnishing such appliance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Harry C. Stephens against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, J. W. McKinley, and Robert C. Gortner (Norman S. Sterry, of counsel), for appellant. Drew Pruitt and W. O. Morton, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one by an employé against his employer on account of alleged personal injuries. Plaintiff was employed by defendant and engaged in operating an electric grinder, the motor of which was fed from the trolley wires of defendant. The appliance provided by defendant for the work comprised a grinder, a motor, and wires feeding such motor, together with ground wires. This appliance had been in successful operation for some time and had been used the preceding day by plaintiff. Before the accident, neither the foreman of defendant, under whom plaintiff was performing his duties, nor the plaintiff, knew of any defect in either the motor or the grinder. The morning of the accident, for some cause, the apparatus proved to be out of order. This the foreman attributed to a broken ground wire, the condition of which had been noticed before leaving the shop in the morning. The foreman directed plaintiff to repair this wire where broken, which was done, and, when plaintiff undertook to operate the machine, it developed that the defect was not cured. The foreman then, assisted by plaintiff, cleaned the commutator, and, believing that this would relieve the difficulty, the foreman directed plaintiff to try the machine and see if it would work, neither the foreman nor plaintiff at the time apprehending any danger in so doing. Plaintiff took the grinder in his hand and turned on the electric current, when the grinder "flashed fire," thus injuring plaintiff.

There is evidence warranting the finding of the jury that the appliance provided for the work, or that part thereof which connected the motor with the trolley wire, was not provided with a fuse. Had such fuse been provided, no injury of the character sustained by plaintiff would have resulted, even with a defective motor. Practically all of the other grinding appliances in use by defendant were controlled by a fuse, the purpose and office of which is to break the current through melting of the fuse, thus to obviate the danger of flashing or of other injury which might result to one operating the grinder. Neither the plaintiff nor the foreman were electricians. The foreman had had no experience in repairing electric apparatus, and plaintiff, when he turned on the circuit or undertook the use of the appliance furnished, had no appreciation of the danger incident to the use of the appliance in its then condition.

Under these facts, appellant contends that no negligence is shown, chiefly because of defendant's want of knowledge that the motor was out of order, and that both plaintiff and defendant had equal knowledge of the condition of such motor; it being claimed that under such circumstances plaintiff assumed the risk in undertaking its use in the condition shown. When it is considered that the appliance furnished plaintiff for his work embraced not only the motor, but the wire necessary to convey the current, as well as the grinder (Korander v. Penn Bridge Co., 116 Pac. 384), and that the injury resulted on account of a failure to properly equip the wire, the knowledge of defects in the motor alone does not necessarily affect the question of negligence. The injury resulted from the unsafe appliance provided by the master, the danger in the use of which was not fully comprehended by the plaintiff.

[1] The defendant by providing an appliance which, in the absence of a fuse, was unsafe and dangerous to use, failed to discharge the duty of furnishing appliances reasonably safe and secure and to make such provision for the safety of employes as will reasonably protect them against the dangers incident to their employment. Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 184, 45 Pac. 1041; Starr v. Kreuzberger, 129 Cal. 128, 61 Pac. 787, 79 Am. St. Rep. 92.

[2] This duty of furnishing a reasonably safe appliance the master could not delegate, and it is not excused if its foreman was ignorant of the necessity for a fuse or of the actual condition of the motor, if, in fact, as found by the jury, the unsafe condition of the appliance furnished is shown. That plaintiff knew, as did all parties, that no fuse was attached, does not of itself bar plaintiff of his right of recovery. It must also appear that plaintiff fully understood and comprehended the danger incident to the use of such appliance in its defective condition. Section 1970, Civ. Code. This want of comprehension on plaintiff's part is clearly shown and properly shown by his evidence in that regard.

We observe no inconsistency between the answers to the special interrogatories and the general verdict, all of which have support by competent evidence. Neither do we see merit in the various questions presented as to the action of the trial court in its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence; nor any error in the giving or refusing of instructions.

[3] The criticism on account of the refusal to give instruction No. 16 is answered by reading instruction No. 7, given by the court at defendant's request, which latter instruction embodies all that is contained in the one refused. The other instructions refused, in so far as they were correct expressions of the law, were given in substance and effect in other instructions. It is an established rule that courts are not expected to nor required, after having given an instruction upon a question of law, to repeat the same thereafter.

A careful examination of the record satisfies us that no prejudicial error intervened, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, presented on a bill of exceptions. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and the ruling of the trial judge in admitting in evidence a certain map are urged as grounds for reversal.

The appeal from the judgment was taken more than 60 days after entry thereof. This appeal, therefore, was taken too late to authorize this court to consider the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 1.

[1] Nor can the evidence be reviewed to determine the question as to whether or not it is sufficient to sustain the judgment on the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. It is nowhere shown in the record upon what grounds that motion was made. For aught that appears, the ground of insufficiency of the evidence may not have been urged in the court below at the hearing of the motion. The transcript shows the order of the court denying the motion for a new trial, wherein it is stated that the motion was presented upon the grounds set forth in the notice of intention on file, but this notice of intention is not made a part of the record; nor does the order of the court show that the motion was presented on the bill of exceptions. Therefore the decision in the case of Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 99, 77 Pac. 762, is in point, to the effect that in a case where the record is in the state of that which is here presented the order made on the motion for a new trial cannot be reviewed.

also a surveyor. The witness further stated that he in pursuance of his occupation as a surveyor had afterwards checked up this map while running lines upon the ground and that he had found it to be correct, and that it had been used as a reference map in the office for a good many years. This map was the original map of the survey of the canal and reservoir lands as made by William Moore. The witness testified that the recorded map was a copy taken from that original, and that the copy did not show all of the data that appeared upon the original: for instance, the original map showed rock monuments placed at corners of lots where the same abutted upon the street or intersected the north boundary line of the city. The witness had not resurveyed the particular lots the boundary line of which was involved in this action, but he had checked over many of the remaining lots and blocks in the tract, and testified that he was quite positive that the map was correctly made from the field notes of William Moore. The value of this map as evidence in favor of the defendants was largely by way of showing the fact that rocks were placed in the original survey of the tract, as monuments along the north city boundary line. This evidence tended to corroborate the testimony of those surveyors who located the present north city boundary line at the same place it had been located at the time of the original survey of the canal and reservoir lands. We think the court committed no error in admitting this evidence. The evidence of the witness Solano was sufficient in our opinion to show prima facie that the map correctly delineated the lines and points marked thereon. The matter of the weight to be given to the evidence, of course, was a question for the trial court.

[3] It is not shown by the record as to whether or not William Moore and Siebolt the draughtsman were dead at the time of the trial of the action, but, if it was a fact that these men who prepared the map were then dead, there would have been ample ground to justify the admission of the evidence under the authority of the decision in Morton v. Folger et al., 15 Cal. 275. However, the witness Solano was a civil engineer, had seen the map made, had checked over a large part of it by actual surveys on the ground, and the map had been used as a reference map by surveyors for a good many years. Moreover, the witness testified that he was quite positive that it was correctly made, and this, we think, as before stated, established prima facie a sufficient foundation to authorize the admission of the map in evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOLLAND v. EASTERN OUTFITTING CO.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 16, 1911.)

1. ACTION (§ 38*)—SINGLE CAUSE OF ACTION—RECOVERY OF PREMISES—UNLAWFUL DETAINER.

A complaint which sets up in its first count a cause of action in unlawful detainer after default in the payment of rent and a notice in writing served March 6, 1909, demanding payment of rent due February 15, 1909, or possession of the premises, and in which the second count by reference repeats the allegations of the first count, and, in addition, alleges the demand for and nonpayment of rent due March 15, 1909, and in which the third count is similar to the second count except that it alleges the demand for and nonpayment of rent due April 15, 1909, is not bad for joining to the action for unlawful detainer an action in debt for rent due and unpaid, since the complaint sets out only a single cause of action for unlawful detainer, the additional matters set forth in the second and third counts being simply statements of damages flowing from the unlawful detainer, and since it was proper for the plaintiff to plead the nonpayment of the rent accruing subsequent to the service of notice and before the commencement of the action, though rent accruing after the filing of the complaint may be recovered without being pleaded.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 291*)—RECOVERY OF PREMISES—DAMAGES—RENT DUE AND SUBSEQUENTLY ACCRUING.

The plaintiff in an action for unlawful detainer after service of notice of default in payment of rent due is entitled on a further detention to a judgment for the restitution of the premises and the rent due at the time of the notice and demand, as well as all rent accruing and unpaid up to the time of the trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Holland against the Eastern Outfitting Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and, the plaintiff having died after the taking of the appeal, her special administrator Patrick Holland was substituted as respondent. Affirmed.

Jas. P. Sweeney, for appellant. W. E. Cashman, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial, but the only matter urged for a reversal relates to the action of the court in overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint for a misjoinder of causes of action. Since the appeal was taken to this court the plaintiff has died, and the special administrator of her estate, Patrick Holland, has been substituted as plaintiff. The complaint is in form in three counts, and was filed May 6, 1909. The first count sets up a cause of action in unlawful detainer, after default in the payment of rent and three days' notice in writing requiring its payment or possession of the premises. The notice was served March 6, 1909, and demanded the payment of the month's rental falling due February 15, 1909, amounting to $250. The second count, by reference and adoption, repeated the allegations of the first count, and in addition alleged the demand for and nonpayment of the month's rental, in the sum of $250, falling due March 15, 1909. The third count was in all respects similar to the second count, except that it alleged the demand for and nonpayment of the month's rental $250, falling due April 15, 1909. The action was not tried until September, 1909, when judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict of the jury for $1,000, but without any rents or damages being trebled, and without any judgment for restitution of premises, for (as was stated at the oral argument) the parties, since the commencement of the action, had entered into a new lease of the premises. The demurrer was upon the ground that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, in this: that a cause of action in unlawful detainer set forth in the first count was joined with a cause of action in debt for rent due and unpaid, set forth in the second and third counts of the complaint.

[1, 2] We do not regard the complaint as setting out more than one cause of action to wit, an action in unlawful detainer. When the three days' notice was served, there was but one month's rent due, to wit, the rent for the month beginning February 15, 1909. Upon the expiration of the three days without payment of the rent due and demanded, or the surrender of possession of the premises, the further detention thereof became unlawful, and for such an unlawful detention the plaintiff would be entitled to a judgment for the restitution of the premises and the rent due and unpaid at the time of the trial. Mason v. Wolff, 40 Cal. 246; Keyes v. Moy Jin Mun, 136 Cal. 129, 68 Pac. 476; Nolan v. Hentig, 138 Cal. 281, 71 Pac. 440.

The additional matters set forth in the so-called second and third counts were simply statements of damages flowing from the unlawful detention pleaded in the so-called first count, and could as well have been set forth in the first count. The entire complaint pleaded but one cause of action, to wit, an action in unlawful detainer after default in payment of rent, and a three days' notice to pay the rent then due or to surrender possession of the premises. In such an action the plaintiff is entitled to recover not only the rent due and demanded at the time of giving the notice, but all rent subsequently accruing and unpaid up to the time of the trial. (See cases cited above.) It was probably necessary, and certainly proper, for the plaintiff to plead the nonpayment of the rent accruing subsequently to the service of the notice and before the commencement of the action, though rent accruing after the filing of the complaint may be recovered without being pleaded (cases cited, supra).

The fact that the pleader set forth the nonpayment of the rentals accruing after the service of the notice in separate counts did not constitute such matters independent causes of action. The matters thus pleaded were simply damages resulting from the unlawful detention.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 1*)—BREACH OF DUTY—FIDUCIARY RELATION.

Defendant intrusted with the making of a purchase of 1,000 shares of stock for himself and plaintiff, having bought it for $1 a share, represented that he paid $2 a share, kept half of the shares, and delivered the other half to plaintiff, receiving $1,000 from him, was guilty of a fraud under Civ. Code, § 2234, in disregarding the obligations imposed on him as trustee, by seeking an advantage over plaintiff, a beneficiary of the trust.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 76*)—ESTOPPEL—RELiance ON REPRESENTATIONS.

Defendant, intrusted by plaintiff with the purchase for both of them of shares of stock, having bought at $1 per share, and represented the price to be $2 a share, being sought to be held liable for fraud, is estopped to deny plaintiff's reliance on his representation.

Plaintiff, who intrusted defendant with the buying for the two of 1,000 shares of stock of a corporation, which defendant represented he could buy at $2, but which he bought at $1, keeping half the stock himself, and delivering the other half to plaintiff, from whom he received $1,000, though entitled to elect a remedy which would give him the entire 1,000 shares, may rescind and recover the money paid; and this without regard to the market value of the stock.

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 71*)—FRAUD—INJURY—EVIDENCE.

That plaintiff, who intrusted defendant with buying for both of them 1,000 shares of stock of a corporation, the price of which defendant represented to be $2 a share, but for which he paid only $1 a share, half of which stock he kept himself, delivering the other half to plaintiff, from whom he received $1,000, was injured by the fraudulent transaction, is shown by the fact that he paid twice the amount he should have paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by W. T. Smith against W. C. Elderton. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Dyer and Chas. L. Chandler, for appellant. Chas. S. McKelvey, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Action to recover money alleged to have been procured by fraudulent practices. The pleadings develop, without controversy, a contract between plaintiff and defendant for the joint purchase of 1,000 shares of corporate stock in a corporation of which defendant was president and plaintiff a stockholder; it being represented by defendant to plaintiff that the stock was for sale at $2 per share and that defendant knew where 1,000 shares of such stock could be purchased at such price. The parties agreed to such purchase at the rate of $2 per share, and defendant was delegated the authority to enter into negotiations for its acquirement. Pursuant to such authority, defendant procured the assignment of a subscriber's rights to acquire 1,000 shares at $1 per share, the subscription price for which had not been paid, which assignment defendant procured without consideration. Defendant exercising the rights of such subscriber paid to the corporation $1 per share and caused 2 certificates, each for 500 shares, to be issued 1 to plaintiff and 1 to himself. Defendant thereupon presented to plaintiff the certificate for 500 shares, and plaintiff paid to defendant $1,000, or $2 per share, defendant retaining the certificate for 500 shares without paying any consideration or assuming any liability for the purchase price thereof. Plaintiff upon discovery of the facts rescinded the contract of purchase and tendered to defendant the 500 shares of stock, and brought this action to recover the money.

It is averred in the complaint that plaintiff because of the trust and confidence he had in defendant, and because of the statement of defendant that he would take five hundred shares along with plaintiff, relied upon such statement and acted thereon. The answer of defendant denies that plaintiff relied upon such statement. Under such condition of the pleadings, the court rendered judgment upon the pleadings in plaintiff's favor, from which judgment defendant appeals.

[1] The facts admitted establish an agreement and arrangement through which defendant, as agent of the joint enterprise, assumed the duty of negotiating for and acquiring the stock. A fiduciary relation as between the plaintiff and defendant thereby arose, and this aside from the relative positions occupied by the parties to the corporation.

[2] The defendant, disregarding the obligations imposed upon him, was guilty of a fraud under section 2234, Civil Code, in seeking an advantage over plaintiff who was one of the beneficiaries of a trust.

[3] The denial of the answer as to the reliance of plaintiff upon the truth of the representations is ineffectual as raising an issue. One occupying a relationship as disclosed by the record is estopped to deny the reliance.

[4] "If a trustee makes money out of his cestui que trust, he must show affirmatively that the transaction was perfectly fair; otherwise, the presumption of fraud is against him." Woodroof v. Howes, 88 Cal. 187, 26 Pac. 112.

[5] That the plaintiff possessed the right to elect a remedy which would have given him the entire 1,000 shares did not preclude him from the one sought in the recovery of the money paid through such fraudulent practices, and this without reference to the market value of the stock.

[6] Nor can it be said that plaintiff was not damaged in the transaction. If defendant had acted in good faith and discharged the duty assumed by him as such agent, plaintiff would have acquired his stock for one-half the amount actually paid. That he paid twice the amount which he should have paid, or would have paid if knowledge of the true facts had existed, establishes his injury through the fraudulent practices.

We are of opinion that the court committed no error in rendering a judgment against defendant upon the pleadings, and the same is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by H. C. Harrison against H. D. Cousins and another. From an order granting a motion for a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

F. R. Wall, for appellant. Curtis & Mc-Neb (Houghton & Houghton, of counsel), for respondent Cousins.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order granting the motion of defendant H. D. Cousins for an order changing the place of trial of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of San Bernardino. Respondent objects to the hearing of the appeal upon its merits, and asks that the appeal be dismissed for the reason that there is no proper record before this court, in that the papers used or claimed to have been used on the hearing of the motion are not authenticated by being incorporated into a bill of exceptions as required by rule 29 of the Supreme Court. The transcript on appeal filed in this court contains no bill of exceptions nor any record made up in accordance with the provisions of section 933a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The transcript does contain what purport to be copies of various papers, including the complaint, affidavit of merits of H. D. Cousins, including certain exhibits, designated by the letters "A," "B," "C," and "D," attached thereto, notice of motion for change of venue, demand for change of venue, demurrer of H. W. Hutton (copy of), certificate of clerk of superior court of San Bernardino county as to correctness of foregoing papers, minute order of court granting the change of venue, notice of order, notice of appeal, a stipulation not signed, certificate of clerk of superior court of San Francisco to the correctness of the copy of the minute order granting the change of venue and of the notice of appeal, and to the giving of an undertaking on appeal. These papers are followed by a certificate signed by the judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco as follows: "I * * * do hereby certify that upon the hearing of the motion of H. D. Cousins, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action, for a change of venue to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of San Bernardino, the only papers considered were the complaint in said action, the affidavit of merits of H. D. Cousins, with four exhibits, A, B, C, and D; said Cousins' notice of motion for a change of venue, and the demurrer of H. W. Hutton, one of the defendants above named; that said motion was heard by me, and that I granted the order changing the venue in said action; that true and correct copies of the above-named papers which were considered by me upon the hearing of said motion are set out in the foregoing transcript."

This certificate does not purport to have been given in settlement of a bill of exceptions, but appears to have been given ex parte. It states that certain enumerated papers only were considered, and omits to make any mention of the demand for a change of venue. Rule 29 (78 Pac. xii) requires that "in all cases of appeal from the orders of the superior courts the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except when another mode of authentication is provided by law." In this case no attempt was made to comply with this rule or the procedure authorized by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The appellant's contention is that under section 951 of the Code of Civil Procedure he is only required on an appeal from an order, except an order granting or refusing a new trial, to furnish the appellate court with a copy of the notice of appeal, of the order appealed from, and of the papers used on the hearing in the court below. While said section does enumerate a list of papers, copies of which must be furnished the appellate court, it does not undertake to provide how such papers or the copies thereof shall be authenticated. That matter is provided for in the rule of court, which requires that the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions. The necessity of complying with this rule is made manifest by what has happened in this case, for by proceeding in this ex parte way appellant procured from the judge of the court a certificate as to what papers were considered (not what were used), which makes no mention of the "demand for change of venue." Neither does the transcript before us show whether or not the respondent had answered or demurred at the time he filed his affidavit of merits and demand for a change of venue, or that he ever answered or demurred to the complaint. Section 396, Code Civ. Proc. If the method prescribed by the rule of court had been followed in this case, the respondent would have had an opportunity of having all the proper papers and evidence inserted in the record.

[2] The record before us not being authenticated either as required by the rule of court or any provision of the law, we cannot consider it. Ramsbottom v. Fitzgerald, 128 Cal. 75, 60 Pac. 522; Melde v. Reynolds, 120 Cal. 236, 52 Pac. 491; Muzzy v. McEwen Lumber Co., 154 Cal. 686, 98 Pac. 1062. The appeal is dismissed.

1. PLEADING (§ 364*)—FORM—STRIKING OUT REDUNDANT MATTERS.

Defendant in an action to foreclose his right to purchase certain lands under a contract, unless all sums found due from him were paid in such time as the court might allow, elected by his amended answer to affirm the contract, and set up the general defense of fraud collateral to the contract, for which he asked for judgment for damages and to retain the land, and alleged in support of his defense certain statements of the plaintiff relating to colony lands, but not to the specific lands in question, and that defendant read the representations deeply and carefully and that he became satisfied that they were really true, and that a designated paper was published to induce persons residing in the Eastern states to sell their properties and go to the colony and purchase lands therein from the plaintiff, that he was told that the land had never been offered for sale, and that unless he purchased quickly he might lose the opportunity, that it had plaintiff's personal attention, and that the part not in orchard was good grape land, that fruit grown on the land had ready sale at exceptionally high prices, and was sold in advance of delivery at large profit. Held, on motion to strike out, that under Code Civ. Proc. § 453, these averments of the answer were properly stricken out as redundant and irrelevant.

4. PLEADING (§ 8*)—FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS—FRAUD.

In an action by a vendor to foreclose a purchaser's right to complete his purchase of land, the purchaser by his answer affirmed the contract and claimed damages for fraudulent representations by the vendor, and asked for judgment for money and that he retain the lands, and set out a narrative of the facts and statements which induced him to make the purchase, and averred that he did not know whether they were true, but had entire confidence in the vendor, and executed a contract with him at once; that after he had made payments he discovered that all the vendor's statements were wholly false and fraudulent, which was well known to the vendor; and that the statements were made to induce him to pay $5,500 for the land in suit, when, in fact, it was not of the value of more than $1,000, and later repeated these alleged fraudulent statements, and averred that they were false and untrue in every material respect, but did not show in what particular or to what extent the vendor's narrative statements or his statements that the orange trees on the land were Washington navels and that the land had yielded 20 per cent. profit were false. Held, that the answer was bad on demurrer for failing to allege particular false statements from which damage resulted in the sequence of cause and effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Warren N. Woodson against William W. Winchester. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, for appellant. W. P. Johnson, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to foreclose defendant's right to purchase the lands described in the complaint.

A second amended answer was attacked by a motion to strike out many of its averments and by a general and special demurrer. The motion was granted as to a considerable portion of the answer, and, after it had been thus shorn, the demurrer was sustained. Defendant making no further attempt to answer, plaintiff submitted his proofs and had judgment as prayed for in the complaint. The appeal is from this judgment on bill of exceptions.

The contract bears date September 16, 1907, and relates to certain lots in Maywood Colony, near Corning, Tehama county, for which defendant agreed to pay the sum of $5,500 in installments, $500 upon the execution of the contract, $1,000 on April 1, September 1, and December 1, 1908, and the balance, $2,000, on September 1, 1910, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum. It was alleged in the complaint that on October 26, 1908, $2,100 had been paid on account of the principal and $400 on account of interest to that date, and that no further payments have been made. The complaint was filed April 14, 1909, and plaintiff prayed that defendant be foreclosed from all right to purchase said land unless all sums found to be due on said contract, including costs of suit, be paid within such reasonable time as the court may allow. No question is raised as to the terms of the contract or as to the payments made thereon. Defendant's defense rests alone on his averments of fraud.

Defendant is not seeking to rescind the contract. He states in his brief that he elects to retain what he has received under the contract and seeks to recover damages for the injury he has sustained from the alleged deceit; i. e., he affirms the contract and consents to be bound by its provisions, but does not waive his claim for damages arising from the alleged fraud collateral to the contract. His defense appears to be that he has been damaged $4,500, of which he asks that $2,500 be offset against plaintiff's demand and that he have judgment for $2,000 and retain the land. Obviously the defense rests entirely on the alleged fraudulent conduct of plaintiff, and, before such a defense will be entertained by a court of equity, it must be shown with that fullness and particularity of facts and circumstances as is required by settled rules of pleading.

[1] That sham, redundant, and irrelevant matter in a pleading may be stricken out is a general rule and is established by the Code of Civil Procedure, § 453. Paragraph 2 of the answer cannot for a moment be said to fall within any class of fraudulent representations or as statements by way of inducement to purchase at all reprehensible. They relate to lands comprising a colony, and not to the specific lands in question. That defendant, as he says in paragraph 3, "read them (the representations) deeply and carefully and that he became satisfied therefrom that such statements were really true," adds no force to the pleading, nor do the statements referred to in paragraph 4. The "Maywood Colony Advocate" was published for the "purpose of inducing persons residing in the Eastern states to sell their properties there and come to Maywood Colony and purchase lands therein from plaintiff." This general purpose may have been and probably was a very laudable one. Paragraph 5 of the answer was not wholly emasculated. Looking at the clauses stricken out, we fail to see their necessary relevancy to the charge of fraud. What mattered it that the land had never before been offered for sale, or that unless defendant purchased quickly he might lose the opportunity; or that plaintiff had kept this particular land as a "show place," or that it had his personal attention, or that the 10 acres not in orchard was ideal grape land, and plaintiff had kept it to go with the 10 acres of orchard, and that the two pieces must go together, or that fruit grown on the land had ready sale and commanded exceptionally high prices and was sold in advance of delivery at large profit? Defendant, according to his answer which stands, was taken to the land "in an automobile—plaintiff's automobile"—an unimportant fact, and he says "that plaintiff stopped his automobile on the land * * * pointing defendant's attention to said land, * * * and requested defendant to purchase that particular land," and it was then, as they rested in the automobile, that plaintiff made the statements set out in the answer, some of which the court allowed to stand and struck out the others. Paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 remained undisturbed by the motion. Paragraph 9 suffered badly at the hands of the court, but we cannot see that defendant's case suffered, for the matter stricken out had no necessary connection with the specific fraud on which alone defendant had any right to rely. The averments appear to be an attack upon the verity of the publications concerning the Maywood Colony lands, which publications are not alleged to have been directed to the particular land in question, but to lands generally of the colony. The representations are substantially the same as are set forth in paragraph 5. The paragraph closes with what apparently was intended to cover the entire catalogue of representations which are denounced as "wholly and entirely false and untrue in every material respect" and were known by plaintiff "to be false and untrue in every material respect." This latter averment remains, but something more was required of the pleader than this. He should have pointed out what was material.

Paragraph 10 remains, but 11 went out we suppose because the court thought it rather remote to make plaintiff pay defendant damages because the defendant gave credence to the "Maywood Colony Advocate" and sold out his business in New London and took a chance in Corning. We incline to agree with the trial court that the averments contributed nothing material to the answer.

Part of paragraph 12, to wit, marked "a," "b," and "c," went out probably because (a) there were no averments to support a claim for the difference between the actual value of the property and the amount for which it was sold; (b) and (c) because too remote. We think the demurrer was rightly sustained to the remaining portions of the answer. The recital of facts leading up to the alleged statements in paragraph 5, subd. "d," "e," and "h," is plainly a narrative of which fraud is not predicated. Of the representations stated in these subdivisions it is averred that defendant did not know whether or not they were true, but had entire confidence in plaintiff and believed him and was thereby induced to agree to purchase the land, and this the pleader says is evidenced by the fact that the contract was "executed the day following"; that after he had made all the payments he discovered "that all said statements so made by plaintiff * * * were wholly false and fraudulent, and defendant alleges that they were and are in fact wholly false and fraudulent," which was well known to plaintiff and were made by him "to induce defendant to pay $5,500 for the land herein involved when in fact it was not at higher value than $1,000," and is not now of higher value than $1,000. Later along the pleader repeats these alleged fraudulent statements in paragraph 9, and he then alleges that they were false and untrue "in every material respect."

The special demurrer for uncertainty in part raised the question whether defendant intended to charge that these statements were wholly and unqualifiedly false or only false "in every material respect," and it is claimed, if the latter, that the defendant should have pointed out the material from the immaterial statements and shown on which he relies. But, passing this by, there is no fiduciary relation shown between plaintiff and defendant, and there is no averment that plaintiff gave any warranty or guaranty in making the sale. He is alleged to have made certain statements which defendant avers turned out to be false and fraudulent, known so to be at the time by plaintiff and made as an inducement to defendant to make the purchase. But has defendant presented facts sufficient to justify the court in entertaining the defense attempted?

[2] Expressions of opinion are to be distinguished from statements of facts such as a purchaser who has gone upon the land and has had full opportunity to exercise his own judgment would be justified in relying upon. The statements complained of which may be said not to come within the class of harmless expressions of opinion may be briefly stated as follows: That 10 acres of the land contained Bartlett pears, almonds, and orange trees; that the orange trees were of the fine Washington navels, the lemon trees a fancy quality, and the olives of the mission variety; and that the trees on said 10 acres had been for a number of years yielding plaintiff a net profit of 20 per cent. per annum on a value of $5,500, all of which was false and fraudulent and so known to be by plaintiff, and was stated to defendant to induce him to purchase said land.

[3, 4] "Fraud without damage furnishes no ground for action; nor is fraud without damage a defense." Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 9, 23 Pac. 58. It must be shown in the pleading that the damage claimed was sustained by reason of the fraud and should show the relation between the fraud and the damage alleged; that is, it must appear that the fraud and the damage sustain to each other the relation of cause and effect. 20 Cyc. 103, 107. In passing upon the demurrer the learned trial judge very clearly pointed out the shortcomings of the answer. He said: "Several representations are alleged to have been made by the plaintiff, and then it is alleged that all of said representations were false. In what particulars they were false or to what extent is not alleged. To illustrate, take the allegation that the plaintiff said the orange trees were Washington navels. The answer alleges that this statement was false. But false to what extent? Were none of the trees of that variety, or were only a few of them of some other variety? If only a few of them were of another variety, then plaintiff's statement was false, but it does not follow that defendant was injured thereby. The number of other varieties may have been so few as to be of no moment, and it might be true that none of them were Washington navels, and still defendant not be injured at all. They may have all been of a better and more profitable variety. The answer must state facts showing the false statements of such a kind and in such particulars as that damage resulted therefrom to the defendant in the sequence of cause and effect. I have examined a great many cases on this point, and find that in all of them the pleader has alleged the falsity of the statements and then proceeded to show wherein and to what extent they were false, and stated such facts as showed that damage must have resulted from such false statements. Many cases have been brought for damages alleged to have been caused by a party falsely representing the number of acres in the tract sold. In none of them did the pleader content himself with alleging that the vendor said there were a certain number of acres (say 100) and that such a statement was false, but he then alleged that there were instead of the number of acres represented only a smaller number, stating the shortage in acreage as compared with the number represented. It is alleged in the answer that the plaintiff represented that the place had been paying 20 per cent. on a valuation of $5,500, and that such statement was false. If the pleader had specified he would have gone further and alleged that it was not producing that much or any profit (if such were the fact), or that it was only producing 10 per cent. on a valuation of $2,000 (if such were the fact). Unless some such particulars are alleged, the answer does not allege or show any material damage resulting from the false statements."

These views seem to us to correctly state the law.

The judgment is affirmed.

MACLAY CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SONOMA COUNTY. (Civ. 858.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1911.)

PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—GROUNDS—SPECIFIC ACTS OF JUDGE—JURISDICTION.

The petitioner brought action in the defendant court against one M. and others, copartners as the P. Transportation Company, and on November 27, 1909, a default judgment was entered against M. and another and also against the company. On November 29th all the defendants appeared and moved to set aside the default, and also filed a demurrer to the complaint, and, after their motion to set aside the default had been denied, their motion to vacate the judgment was granted on December 20th, and plaintiffs appealed from such order, which, in the bill of exceptions as certified by the trial judge, read, "The motion to set aside the judgment and default of the Petaluma Transportation Company is granted," and that order was affirmed by this court. In March, 1911, the defendants' demurrer was restored to the calendar for determination, after a hearing in which defendants' attorneys made affidavit that the order setting aside the judgment had been made against all the defendants, and not against the company alone, as appeared from the order affirmed by this court. Plaintiff sought a writ of prohibition to restrain the lower court from hearing and determining the demurrer on the grounds that the judgment of November 27, 1909, was a binding judgment as to all defendants except the company named in the order appealed from and affirmed, and that the court had no further jurisdiction. Held that, when the alleged order appealed from went back affirmed, the lower court had the power to treat it as meaning what it intended and to recognize the order which it had in fact made, and that, in view of the affidavits and of the lower court's return to the same effect and of an opinion filed by it in the proceedings, the order certified on appeal was not in fact the order made, and as to the other defendants the court had jurisdiction; and hence that the writ would be denied.

Petition by the Maclay Company for writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of Sonoma County. Writ denied.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for petitioner. W. H. Early, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Prohibition. The history of the litigation out of which springs the cause for seeking the writ in this action will be found in the opinion of Justice Hart in the case of Maclay Company v. N. S. Meads, Charles P. Doe, H. G. Cox, and G. L. Ray, as Individuals and as Copartners Under the Firm Name and Style of Petaluma Transportation Co., 112 Pac. 195; and an opinion on rehearing at page 364 of 113 Pac. The narrative of facts brings the history down to the judgment in favor of plaintiff against Meads, Ray, and the Petaluma Transportation Company, entered November 27, 1909. It also therein appears that on November 29, 1909, the defendants appeared, filed a motion to set aside the default entered against them in the action, and also filed a demurrer to the complaint; that on December 3, 1909, plaintiff caused a writ of restitution to be issued which was by the sheriff returned executed by putting the plaintiff in possession of the premises on December 6th; that on the same day, December 6, 1909, the motion of defendants to set aside the default was heard and denied, permission being given, however, to notice and file a motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, and such motion was made on the grounds: (1) That the court was without jurisdiction to enter the judgment; (2) that the judgment is not supported by the pleadings; (3) that the default of defendants was not entered. The motion was heard on December 13th, and on December 20, 1909, an order was made granting the same. The order from which the appeal to this court was taken read as follows: "The motion to set aside the judgment and default of Petaluma Transportation Company is granted." For the reasons very fully shown in the original opinion it was held that "the court made no error in granting the motion as to the Petaluma Transportation Company" and the order was affirmed. On rehearing plaintiff urged that the judgment of this court should have been "that the order appealed from, in so far as it affected the defendants who were served with summons as well as those not served but who made a general appearance on the motion to vacate the judgment, be reversed," although, as suggested by counsel, "the order vacating the judgment is rather ambiguous." After pointing out that the order of this court was as broad as the order it was asked to review, the court said (113 Pac. 364): "If the trial court failed to dispose of the motion, in so far as it applied to the defendants, Meads, Doe, Cox and Ray, it was no doubt an oversight, which should, of course, be rectified. The parties are entitled to have the motion as to all the defendants who participated therein directly and clearly acted upon by the court below. But, as stated, we cannot see our way clear to reverse or affirm or modify or in any way to interfere with an order where, as here, we are by its ambiguity led into a state of uncertainty as to its scope and effect, or whether, indeed, any order in this case as to Meads, Cox, Doe, and Ray was made at all." Speaking of a possible implication by the order that the motion might be deemed denied as to the other defendants, it was further said: "Still the court might not have acted at all on the motion in so far as it affected the defendants other than the Petaluma Transportation Company." The suggestion made at the close of the opinion on rehearing that the motion as to the defendants other than the Petaluma Transportation Company should not have been granted had reference wholly to the question discussed in the original opinion where it is shown that by the general appearance these defendants submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, but it was not intended to direct the trial court in the exercise of its discretion on grounds other than as such discretion might be affected by the decision that the appearance made by the defendants was general.

It is alleged in the petition for the writ that the trial court in granting defendants' motion to set aside and vacate the judgment made its order in the form as it appeared in the bill of exceptions on appeal, as shown above, and that the trial judge certified to the bill as correct on February 2, 1910; that thereafter the defendants filed their motion in the said superior court that they would, on February 14, 1911, move the court to restore to the calendar of said court their demurrer theretofore filed in the action, which was opposed on the ground that said defendants had by their demurrer submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of said court; and that said judgment rendered against them is valid and binding, and was so declared in the judgment on appeal to this court. It is then set forth that at the hearing of said motion there were considered by the court the affidavits of two attorneys in behalf of defendants in which, among other things, it was alleged that the order made by the trial court on December 20, 1909, vacating and setting aside said judgment, was as follows: "This cause having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision on motion to set aside default and judgment, the court now orders after having fully considered the same that the default and judgment herein be and the same is hereby set aside," and that "no appeal has ever been taken by the plaintiff or defendants from said order." It is then set forth in the petition that notwithstanding the objections of plaintiff to the consideration of said motion, "the said superior court on the 2d day of March, 1911, ordered that the demurrer of said defendants filed November 29, 1909, be restored to the calendar of said court for determination"; that, unless the said court is restrained, the said court "will proceed to hear and determine the said demurrer, and will proceed to take other and further steps in the said action"; that "the said superior court was on said 14th day of February, 1911, and ever since has been, and now is, without any jurisdiction whatever to make or enter any order restoring said demurrer to the calendar for hearing, or to proceed to the hearing of said demurrer for the reason that the judgment entered in said action of the 27th day of November, 1909, is a valid, binding, and subsisting judgment as against the defendants, * * * and the time for appeal therefrom has elapsed." In the return to the writ to show cause respondent, Judge Seawell, alleges that the order of date December 20, 1909, appearing in the transcript on appeal, was not the order made by him, and that the only order the court in fact made was the order above set forth in the affidavits of counsel for defendants on motion to set aside the judgment, "and that said order did in fact set aside and vacate the judgment theretofore made and entered in said matter entirely, and as to all of the said defendants, and that ever since said time and now the said order has remained unchanged." It is further averred in the return that plaintiff served notice of appeal on December 22, 1909, and that the bill of exceptions contained the order as therein set forth, but "that the said indorsement (the certificate made by the respondent) was not correct for the reason that said bill of exceptions did not contain the real order made by said superior court on said 20th day of December, 1909." It is further averred that "said judgment given and entered by said superior court on the 27th day of November, 1909, against said defendant was by said court on the 20th day of December, 1909, vacated and set aside, and that no appeal was ever taken from said order vacating said judgment, and that the time to appeal from said order has now expired."

It is further set forth in the return: "That on the 14th day of February, 1911, said superior court had jurisdiction to make its order restoring the demurrer of said defendants filed on November 29, 1909, to its calendar for determination"; that "on said 14th day of February, 1911, said petitioner did secure a writ of execution from the clerk of said superior court which said writ of execution was issued by the clerk of said court at the request of the petitioner herein; that the said writ of execution was issued aforesaid without right and was void, and same was levied upon property of the Petaluma Transportation Company and said defendants; that thereafter the defendants in said action moved said superior court for an order vacating and annulling said writ of execution upon the ground that said judgment entered on the 27th day of November, 1909, had been vacated and set aside by said superior court on the 20th day of December, 1909; that said motion was duly presented to said court by the attorneys for petitioner and said defendants, and thereafter, and on the 3d day of March, 1911, said superior court did make its order recalling and annulling said writ of execution for the reason that the judgment had been previously vacated and set aside, and said superior court did on said day make its order restoring defendants' demurrer to the calendar of said court for determination; * * * that the defaults of defendants Charles P. Doe, N. L. Meads, G. L. Ray, and H. G. Cox were never entered in said action; that the defendants Charles P. Doe and H. G. Cox were never served in said action with summons; that Petaluma Transportation Company was not made a party defendant to said action; that the judgment entered in said action on November 27, 1909, was vacated and set aside by said superior court on the 20th day of December, 1909; that the superior court of Sonoma county has not exceeded its jurisdiction in said proceedings, and that at all times and now said superior court has jurisdiction; that no trial on the merits has ever been had in said action in the said superior court of Sonoma county; that petitioner herein has not been damaged by any action of said superior court, * * * and all acts of said superior court * * * are without prejudice to said petitioner as its rights may appear."

Out of all this more or less confusion of facts, the question is narrowed down to the effect of the judgment on the appeal to this court affirming the purported order of the lower court made December 20, 1909, which read: "The motion to set aside the judgment and default of Petaluma Transportation Company is granted." It is conceded that this order is ambiguous as leaving in doubt whether the court intended to set aside the judgment as to all the defendants and the default as to the Petaluma Transportation Company or intended it to apply only to the latter. The respondent declares in his return that this was not the order made by the court but that the order in fact made was as set forth by the trial judge in his return. It appears from the affidavits of defendants' attorneys that the order appealed from was a rough minute order made by the clerk of the court. How it came about that the judge certified to the correctness of the bill of exceptions containing the order as shown in the transcript on appeal without discovering the mistake does not appear. This order went back affirmed, and the contention now is that it was a final order and necessarily left the judgment in full force, and that the court lost jurisdiction to disturb that judgment or to restore the demurrer for hearing or to take any further steps in the case looking to a trial on the merits. In short, that the court was estopped by its own order which had been appealed from and affirmed.

If this order had clearly stated its purpose, admitting of no doubt as to its import, or as to the intention of the court, and if we were not confronted with the statement of the judge who made the alleged order that he did not make it, but did make another order which he states is the only order made by him, we would have a situation which would present the points now urged by the petitioner.

We think, however, that when the case went back, with this alleged order affirmed, the court had the power to treat it as meaning what the court intended, and the court had the power to recognize the order which it had in fact made. The certificate of the Judge to the correctness of the bill of exceptions might have been given inadvertently, through mistake or other cause. The judge, in hastily reading the bill, may have thought that the order was sufficiently explicit, or he may not have examined it at all. Whatever may have been the reason for certifying the bill as it appeared in the transcript, the order which was in fact made was not the order certified as correct. The court had jurisdiction to proceed on the assumption that the order in fact made left the court free to open the way to a trial on the merits, which is always to be desired. In taking its appeal plaintiff used in the transcript the rough minute order of the clerk instead of the real order which latter it appears was entered in his regular minute order book—"Minute Book 'U,' page 462, Minutes of Department No. 1, Superior Court of Sonoma County, California"—and which, as we have seen, was the only order made and entered in the case. Mr. High says: "The writ will not go when the very question of fact upon which it depends is denied and is the chief point in the litigation yet pending and undetermined in the court below." The author cites as illustration the case where the judgment of the court below depends upon the existence or nonexistence of a certain judgment, and the fact as to whether such judgment was ever obtained is the issue in the court below. In such case, the author says, the writ will not issue, unless want of jurisdiction is apparent upon the face of the application, for, he says, if granted, it would virtually be a trial of the case of the superior court upon its merits and before appeal. High's Ex. Rem. (3d Ed.) § 788, p. 745. Here the sole controversy arises out of the order we have been considering, and involves a question of fact as to what the order really was.

In making his order of March 3, 1911, the learned trial judge submitted his opinion in writing which casts light upon the questions. After reciting some of the facts leading up to defendants' motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, the opinion continues:

"The service on the Petaluma Transportation Company being fatally defective, because it was not properly made a party to the action, the default entered as to it was set aside and the judgment vacated. This much must be admitted by all parties to the action. As to the scope of the order made there is a disagreement. The blotter notes of the clerk show that the order opening the default went only to said company, while his minutes show that it was not so limited, but included all defendants. Inasmuch as no formal default has ever been entered against any of the defendants other than said company, the scope of the order may not be material. But, if the matter of default touching all defendants was before the court, it would be a strange psychological condition that would impel a court to decide only a portion of an indivisible question presented to it and leave the balance undetermined. The only logical way, perhaps, of accounting for such a condition would be the theory that the default of only a portion of the parties was demanded and entered as the fact coincidentally, perhaps, is shown to be by the record in this case.

"From an examination of all the papers in the cause, the complaint is included, until the filing of the bond on appeal which was subsequent to the court's ruling holding the service defective so far as the defendant Petaluma Transportation Company is concerned, it is very apparent that the theory of the plaintiff was that he was proceeding against an entity known as the Petaluma Transportation Company and incidentally against Meads, its assignor. The fact that an attempt was made to serve said company as shown by affidavits on file and the further fact that only one other defendant besides said assignor was served with summons would seem strongly to indicate such to have been the case. Following this comes a demand for a default against said company alone and the actual entry of said company's default and none other. The judgment seems to be drawn on the theory above indicated, for phrases of the following character are to be found in said judgment: 'That plaintiff have judgment against the said defendants, composing said partnership under the firm name and style of Petaluma Transportation Company,' etc.—and 'that an execution be issued against the said defendants, under the name of the Petaluma Transportation Company,' etc.

"The court is of the opinion that the claim now made by plaintiff that the notes found in the clerk's blotter contain the complete order of the court in disposing of the motion to set aside the default is weakened by an inspection of the record made subsequent to the time that service of the summons was held not properly made on said company. For example, the notice of appeal, after setting out the name of all defendants, states the appeal is to be taken from an order setting aside and vacating the judgment given in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants. The bond on appeal uses precisely the same words. Perhaps other instances of the same character might be found, but this subject will not be pursued further.

"We now come to the main question at issue. On February 14, 1911, plaintiff caused an execution to be issued in the above-entitled action directed against all defendants, except said company, and has levied on the steamer Resolute, claiming the same to be the property of the said defendants or some of them, and threatens to sell the same as in such cases provided. The defendants have moved the court that an order be made recalling and annulling said execution for the reason that the judgment heretofore entered in said cause has been vacated. Said motion to be made upon all the papers, records, files, etc., in said cause; and also for an order restoring the demurrer filed by them on the 29th day of November, 1909, to the calendar. The right to do both or either depends upon the state of the record in this case which has heretofore been partially set out. The court is of the opinion that the defendants as individuals appeared in the case before a default had been demanded or entered against them and therefore have at no time been in default. Indeed, Doe and Cox were never served with summons, and no dismissal was made as to said persons.

"Any judgment that may have been entered against defendants, unquestionably against Doe and Cox, if it can be said from an inspection of said judgment that the same includes them as individuals, or as members of said company, was improperly made and entered. So far as the appeal from the order setting aside the default and judgment is concerned, the court is of the opinion that in case of conflict, such as is here presented, the amplified order found in Minute Book 'U,' page 445, should control. In either event, there would be no legal subsisting default for the reason that in the first instance the default against said company is void and in the second the default has been set aside and no appeal was taken from it. Aside from anything above stated by the court, the policy of the law favors the trial of causes upon their merits. And for a greater reason should this policy prevail in cases such as this, where treble damages are demanded.

"It is the order of the court that the execution issued in the above-entitled cause on February 14, 1911, be, and the same is, recalled and annulled; also that defendants' demurrer, filed November 29, 1909, be and the same is hereby restored to the calendar for determination."

The writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. BARNNOVICH. (Cr. 309.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 16, 1911.)

2. WITNESSES (§ 306*)—PRIVILEGE—TESTIMONY OF CODEFENDANTS—CONTROL BY ACCUSED.

Accused has no control over the right of one jointly charged with him to refuse to testify in accused's trial on the ground of self-incrimination.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 508*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES.

Pen. Code, § 1111, prohibiting a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice unless corroborated by other evidence which in itself tends to connect accused with the commission of the offense, and providing that the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense, does not go to the admissibility, but to the effect of the accomplice's evidence, so that, while a conviction cannot be had upon his uncorroborated testimony, the actual commission of the offense may be shown thereby.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 680*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ORDER OF PROOF.

While ordinarily the corpus delicti should be established before the state introduces extrajudicial admissions, unless accused was actually prejudiced thereby, the admission of such admissions before the corpus delicti is established is not affirmative error where the corpus delicti is afterwards established by other evidence.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 508*)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for placing explosives under a building in which a human being usually lived, the evidence, other than that of the alleged accomplices, showed that the shoes taken from accused fitted perfectly the footprints found near the premises where the explosion occurred, and that accused had dynamite in his possession shortly before and immediately after the explosion, and had repeatedly threatened to "fix" the person living in the house with dynamite because he would not give him a job. Held, that the evidence tended to connect accused with the commission of the offense so as to warrant a conviction when taken in connection with the accomplice's testimony, which was, with it, sufficient to sustain the verdict.

9. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—CHARGING TWO OFFENSES.

Pen. Code, § 601, provides that one who maliciously deposits or explodes or attempts to explode under any structure which human beings usually inhabit any dynamite, etc., with intent to injure or destroy such structure, etc., or with intent to injure, intimidate, or terrify any human being, or by means of which a human being is injured, is guilty of a felony. Held, that an information under the statute did not charge two offenses because it alleged an intent to injure a person and an intended injury to property, since all of the acts taken separately or together may constitute only one offense, though each in itself may also constitute an offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-400; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 881*)—GENERAL VERDICT.

Since proof of the commission of any of the acts enumerated in the statute and alleged in the information would support a general verdict of guilty as charged, the verdict need not specify the particular acts and intent of which the jury found accused guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2089, 2093; Dec. Dig. § 881.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 995*)—JUDGMENT—DESIGNATION OF CRIME.

In a prosecution for "maliciously" exploding dynamite under a human habitation with intent to injure, intimidate, or terrify a human being, made a felony by Pen. Code, § 601, the judgment stated in general terms that accused was convicted of "the crime of using an explosive with intent to injure a dwelling house and with intent to injure, intimidate or terrify a human being" therein, and also stated that accused was found guilty of the offense set forth in the information, but did not use the word, "maliciously," in designating the offense. Pen. Code, § 1207, provides that, when a judgment of conviction is rendered, the clerk must enter it, "stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had." Held, that the court adopted the verdict as a part of the judgment, which was the equivalent of a detailed description of the offense, and substantially complied with section 1207.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 995*)—JUDGMENT—CONSTRUCTION.

A judgment in a criminal case must be construed in its entirety.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

George Barnnovich was convicted of exploding explosives under a place in which a human being usually lived, and, from a judgment of conviction and order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Rodgers, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant, George Barnnovich, was jointly charged with George Maracich and Lawrence Maracich, in an information filed in the superior court of Contra Costa county, with the crime of felony as defined in section 601 of the Penal Code. The defendant Barnnovich elected to be tried separately, and upon his trial he was convicted and sentenced to the state prison for life. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The codefendants, George and Lawrence Maracich, were competent witnesses for the people, and were rightfully called by the district attorney to testify to any material facts within their knowledge. Before giving their testimony both these codefendants were in turn by the court cautioned as to their rights, and then admonished that any testimony which they saw fit to give could and might subsequently be employed against them.

[1] They could not have been compelled to testify, and, when called as witnesses, it was their privilege under the law to refuse to testify if their testimony would have tended to subject them to punishment for a felony.

[2] This, however, did not concern the defendant at the bar, and it was a matter over which he had no control. People v. Rodundo, 44 Cal. 539. The objection made at the trial to the testimony of the codefendant Lawrence Maracich "upon the ground that he was an accomplice and that the corpus delicti had not been sufficiently established to permit a codefendant testifying" was properly overruled.

[3] The statutory rule that a conviction cannot be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice does not go to the admissibility, but only to the effect of the evidence of the accomplice. Pen. Code, § 1111; People v. Grundell, 75 Cal. 305, 17 Pac. 214. Notwithstanding a conviction cannot be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the actual commission of the offense may be established by such testimony (People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 184, 106 Pac. 1103) and we are satisfied that the corpus delicti in the present case was clearly and fully established at the time the people sought to introduce in evidence, through the medium of the witnesses, George and Lawrence Maracich, the statements and admissions of the defendant made before and after the commission of the crime charged. Even if this were not so, the record does not disclose that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by the order in which the trial court permitted the presentation of the prosecution's proof.

[4] Ordinarily, where the people seek to introduce in evidence the extrajudicial statements and admissions of a defendant, the corpus delicti should be first established; but in the absence of a showing that the defendant was prejudiced thereby irregularity in the order of proof is of no consequence if, as is disclosed by the record in the case at bar, the facts requisite to establish the commission of the crime, independently of the alleged admissions of the defendant, ultimately appear in evidence. People v. White-man, 114 Cal. 338, 46 Pac. 99; People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 306, 66 Pac. 372; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 368, 97 Pac. 871.

The evidence in the case, other than that of George Maracich, an admitted accomplice, and Lawrence Maracich, a disputed accomplice, was to the effect that the shoes taken from the person of the defendant fitted perfectly in the footprints found near the premises where the explosion occurred, that the defendant had dynamite in his possession and on his person shortly before and immediately after the explosion, and that he had repeatedly threatened to "fix Mr. Hartman with dynamite because he would not give him a job."

[5] This evidence standing alone may have been entitled to but slight weight in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant; but it did, apart from the testimony of the claimed accomplices, tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged against him, and was corroboration of the testimony given by the Maracich brothers sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty.

[6] The contention that the evidence upon the whole case does not support the verdict may be disposed of with the statement that the evidence offered respectively upon behalf of the people and the defendant is in violent conflict.

[7] The testimony of the witness Fox as to the result of a comparison which was made in his presence between the footprints found at the scene of the crime and certain shoes, shown to have been subsequently taken from the person of the defendant when he was arrested, was but the statement of a fact based upon the personal observation of the witness. The ruling of the trial court refusing to strike out this testimony was correct.

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing the continuance asked for by the defendant (after a jury had been impaneled and the case for the people closed) in order to obtain the attendance of a witness for whom several days previous to the commencement of the trial a subpoena had been issued and returned unserved.

[8] The application for a continuance under all of the circumstances shown by the record was not seasonably made (Pen. Code, §§ 1052, 1433; People v. Beam, 66 Cal. 396, 5 Pac. 677; People v. Logan, 123 Cal. 414, 56 Pac. 56), and the affidavit offered in support thereof failed to set forth, as it should have done, any fact or facts from which the trial court could have fairly inferred that the attendance of the alleged witness could have been procured within a reasonable time or at all (People v. Ah Yute, 53 Cal. 614; People v. Lewis, 64 Cal. 403, 1 Pac. 490; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 444, 41 Pac. 480; People v. Wade, 118 Cal. 672, 50 Pac. 841).

[9] The information alleges two intents—one an intended injury to a person and the other an intended injury to property. It does not follow from this that the information charges two offenses as claimed by counsel for the defendant. Section 601 of the Penal Code, which defines the offense of which the defendant was convicted, enumerates a series of acts any of which separately or all together may constitute the offense. "All such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that, notwithstanding each may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense." People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Leyshon, 108 Cal. 440, 41 Pac. 480; People v. Swalle, 12 Cal. App. 192, 107 Pac. 134.

[10] As but one offense arising out of a single transaction was charged in a single count by the information, proof of the commission by the defendant of any one of the acts enumerated in the statute and charged in the information was sufficient to support a general verdict of guilty as charged in the information, and it was not necessary, therefore, that the jury should have specified in their verdict the particular acts and intent of the defendant of which they believed and found him guilty.

[11] It is insisted upon behalf of the defendant that the judgment is defective, in this: That the crime of which the defendant was convicted was not technically and in detail designated in the judgment. This contention is based upon the failure of the trial judge, when pronouncing the judgment and sentence of the law, to use the word "maliciously" in its designation of the offense charged against the defendant, and of which he was found guilty. The judgment, however, as entered in the minutes of the court, does in general terms mention and describe the offense of which the defendant was convicted, viz., "the crime of using an explosive with intent to injure a dwelling house, and with intent to injure, intimidate and terrify a human being in said dwelling house." In addition to this general description of the offense, the judgment specifically refers to the fact that the defendant was "found guilty of the offense set forth in the information." The Penal Code does not in terms provide for either the form or the contents of a judgment in a criminal case, but section 1207 of that Code requires that "when a judgment upon a conviction is rendered the clerk must enter the same in the minutes of the court, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had. * * *

[12] The judgment in the case at bar must be considered and construed in its entirety; and, so considered, it sufficiently appears that the court adopted the verdict of the jury as a part of the judgment, and sentenced accordingly. This was the equivalent of a detailed designation of the offense for which the conviction was had (People v. Sam Lung, 70 Cal. 518, 11 Pac. 673), and in conjunction with the court's general designation of the offense was a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 1207 of the Penal Code, and afforded the defendant ample protection against a second prosecution for the same offense.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

JUSTY et al. v. ERRO. (Civ. 831.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 27, 1911.)

1. BROKERS (§ 63*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—DEFENSES.

If the broker produces a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms stipulated, the owner cannot prevent paying commissions by refusing or neglecting to consummate the sale as by selling to another or negligently dealing with the procuring purchaser so as to lose the sale, or by changing the terms of the proposed sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 79-96; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 56*)—COMMISSIONS—PROCURING SALE.

To entitle him to commissions, a broker need not personally conduct the negotiations leading to the sale, or be present when it is completed, nor need the principal know at the time that the purchaser was found by the broker; it only being essential that the broker's efforts be the procuring cause of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 85-89; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The trial court's findings on substantially conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983-3989; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

4. BROKERS (§ 57*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSION.

Where the owner authorized a broker to sell property for a certain sum for a commission of "5% of the purchase price," the broker was entitled to 5 per cent. commissions on that sum upon a sale to a purchaser procured by him, though the owner, without the broker's knowledge, reduced the price to the purchaser, and hence, in an action for commissions, evidence that the owner sold for a less price than that fixed by the agreement with the broker was not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 66-72; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

5. BROKERS (§ 85*)—ACTION FOR COMMISSIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a real estate broker's action for commissions for effecting a sale, a written agreement executed by plaintiff with another after plaintiff had been authorized to sell, authorizing such other to sell as subagent for plaintiff, was admissible; defendant claiming that such other was not acting for plaintiff in making the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 106-115; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a real estate broker's action for commissions, a written agreement executed by plaintiff with another after plaintiff had been authorized to sell, authorizing such other to sell as subagent, was properly admitted in evidence to rebut defendant's claim that such other was not acting for plaintiff when selling, any error in admitting an oral agreement by plaintiff appointing such other as subagent was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

7. BROKERS (§ 55*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—SALE BY ANOTHER.

Under an agreement between the owner and a real estate agent giving the latter the exclusive right to sell the property for 90 days at a 5 per cent. commission, provided that the owner might himself sell it to any one to whom it had been submitted by the agent, in which case the agent should receive a 2½ per cent. commission, the agent had the exclusive right to sell the property within the period limited, and was entitled to a 5 per cent. commission if sold by himself or any one else without his consent within such period, unless sold by the owner to one to whom it had been previously offered by the agent, in which case he was entitled to a 2½ per cent. commission; so that in an action for commissions for a sale within the stipulated time evidence that the person effecting the sale acted for himself, and not for plaintiff, was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 82-84; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

8. BROKERS (§ 69*)—ACTIONS FOR COMMISSIONS—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

In a real estate broker's action for breach of a contract to pay 5 per cent. commissions for selling realty by procuring its sale by another, the measure of damages was the maximum commissions which could be earned under his contract with the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by N. P. Justy and others against Matias Erro. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sutherland & Barbour, for appellant. Raleigh E. Rhodes and W. D. Crichton, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs, doing a real estate brokerage business in the city of Fresno, brought this action for the purpose of recovering certain commissions alleged to be due and owing them from defendant for services rendered under a written contract in procuring a purchaser and consequently effecting the sale of certain land belonging to the defendant and situated in Madera county. The cause was tried by the court, a jury having been waived by both parties. Plaintiffs were given judgment, from which and the order denying him a new trial the defendant prosecutes this appeal to this court.

The complaint is in two counts, viz.: The one declaring upon the contract and the other upon the debt alleged to be due plaintiffs for the services stated in indebitatus assumpsit. The answer specifically denies the averments of each count of the complaint.

The points urged against the judgment and order are generally that the evidence is insufficient to support certain of the vital findings and that the court committed errors prejudicial to the defendant in certain of its rulings allowing and excluding certain testimony.

As to the facts of the transactions giving rise to this action, the controversy seems to have been pivoted by both parties upon the sole question whether the sale of the land described in the agreement between the parties was brought about through the plaintiffs or entirely through one Charles De Roulet, the claim of defendant being that the latter, acting solely for himself and independently and not as an agent of or connected in any way with the plaintiffs in the transaction, effected a sale of the property, upon which proposition it is contended that the plaintiffs are not entitled, at the most, under their agreement with defendant, to more than the aggregate commissions computed at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the "purchase price," as to which price there is also some dispute. In the outset we may as well announce it to be our opinion that, according to the terms of the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, the former are entitled to the maximum commissions provided for by said agreement even under the theory of the defense. In other words, even if it be true, as is the claim of the defendant, that De Roulet, through whom admittedly the land was sold during the term within which the plaintiffs had been given by the agreement the exclusive right (with a single exception of which we shall give special consideration hereafter) to sell the land was not acting for or connected in any manner or sense with plaintiffs in their agreement with defendant, the former would, nevertheless, be entitled to commissions of 5 per cent. on the purchase price. It is, however, deemed the more orderly, under the circumstances presented by the record, to postpone further consideration of this proposition until we have examined the facts as revealed by the record and some other questions which are raised by the appellant against the validity of the judgment and order. But it is conceived not to be improper to state in the beginning some of the well-settled general rules of law relating to contracts by which real estate brokers are authorized to sell property for others on commission.

[1] "If, within the time limited, the broker has produced a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms prescribed, the principal cannot evade the payment of the broker's commission by then refusing or neglecting to consummate the sale, or by changing the terms, or by selling the property to another, or by so negligently dealing with the proposed purchaser as to lose the benefit of the sale." Mechem on Agency, § 967. And, in consonance with the rule as thus stated, it has been held that, if the broker has fulfilled upon his part, "he will be entitled to his commissions, although the sale is not consummated because the principal's title proves defective (Hamlin v. Schulte, 34 Minn. 534, 27 N. W. 301; Goodridge v. Holliday, 18 Ill. App. 363; Gonzales v. Broad, 57 Cal. 224; Knapp v. Wallace, 41 N. Y. 477; Doty v. Miller, 43 Barb. [N. Y.] 529; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Works, 83 N. Y. 378, 38 Am. Rep. 441), or because the principal's wife refuses to join in the conveyance (Clapp v. Hughes, 1 Phila. [Pa.] 382), or because the purchaser refuses to complete the sale on account of false representations made by the principal" (Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. [N. Y.] 145).

[2] Nor is it necessary that the broker should personally have conducted the negotiations between his principal and the purchaser leading to the sale, nor that he should have been present when the bargain was completed, "or even that the principal should, at the time, have known that the purchaser was one found by the broker." Section 966, Mechem on Agency, and cases cited in the footnote thereof. And, while it is indispensable, yet it is sufficient that his efforts were the procuring cause of the sale; that, "through his agency, the purchaser was brought into communication with the seller, although the parties negotiated in person." Id.

With the foregoing statement of some of the principles governing contracts of the character of the one here, we will now proceed to review the facts, which as disclosed by the evidence from which the court made its findings, may thus be summarized:

On and prior to the 3d day of August, 1908, and until he sold the same, the defendant was the owner of a tract of land situated in the county of Madera and known as the "Borden and Freeland Ranch." On said 3d day of August, 1908, said De Roulet met defendant and asked the latter if he (defendant) would "sign a contract for his property for $36,000 and he said he would, and he came to Mr. Justy for that purpose," having been accompanied to Justy's office by De Roulet. After reaching Justy's office, the defendant executed, in the presence of Justy, the latter's son, and Vise, Justy's partner, the following agreement: "I hereby appoint N. P. Justy Company, W. R. Vise, my agents with exclusive right to sell the following property and receive deposit in my name. To-wit: I sell the ranch known as the Borden and Free-land ranch located in the county of Madera, state of California, as follows: for the sum of $36,000.00; $5,000.00 cash balance of $31,000.00 in 5 — years as follows: $5,000.00 thirty days or more and $10,000.00 in ninety days after, balance to be paid in four years at amount arranged, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable annually. And I agree to furnish deed, abstract and clear title, and pay five per cent. commission on purchase price out of said sale. Reasonable time allowed for making papers. This contract to remain in force for a period of ninety days from the date hereof and thereafter until written notice is given to cancel, and if sale is made by me or through me during the term of this contract, or after the expiration of the same, to any one to whom said property has been submitted by said N. P. Justy Company, I agree to pay them 2½ per cent. commission on said sale. Fresno, Cal. Aug. 3rd, 1908. [Signature] Matias Erro. Aug. 3rd. Witness: N. D. Justy at 3:20 P. M.” Indorsed on reverse side: “Recorded at the request of Madera Abstract Company Sept. 25, 1908, at 50 minutes past 9 o'clock A. M., in Vol. 3 of Covenants, page 71, Records of Madera County, Cal., Walter A. Smith, Recorder.”

After the execution of said agreement, Justy and De Roulet entered into an agreement by which the latter engaged to act as subagent of plaintiffs in securing a purchaser of the property, and for his services in that capacity he was to share equally with plaintiffs in the commissions which they were to receive, on a sale of the land by them, under their agreement with defendant.

Within 90 days from the date of the execution of the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, De Roulet found a purchaser in the person of a Mrs. Camy, a resident of Madera county. In De Roulet's own language may perhaps best be told the circumstances of the sale to Mrs. Camy: “After I had been requested to find a purchaser for this property, I tried to get a buyer. To my best knowledge it must have been about three weeks after the 3d of August before I found anybody. This person was Mrs. Camy, sometimes known or called Madam Camy. I went over to Mrs. Camy's and took her over to Mr. Erro in Madera, and I told her she could get that property for $36,000, but when I brought Mrs. Camy over to Mr. Erro he raised it to $43,000. After a certain agreement, they reduced it to $42,000, and she agreed to pay that, in exchange for property or notes. This I think was about three weeks subsequent to the 3d day of August. We went to Mr. Erro two or three times. On each of these occasions Mr. Erro and Madam Camy were in conversation with reference to the barter or exchange of the property, purchase and sale of it. I think it was some time in October that they agreed upon terms. It was during the life of the contract.”

Justy's testimony that De Roulet, in the procurement of Mrs. Camy as the purchaser of the property, was acting for and as the agent of the plaintiffs under the agreement between the former and the latter is corroborated by the testimony of Vise and that of De Roulet himself. Clearly the testimony of which we have given only a brief synopsis fully supports the finding of the court that “in pursuance of said agreement and thereunder, and prior to the expiration of said period of ninety days, in said agreement mentioned, said plaintiffs did find, provide and obtain a purchaser for said real property, for a sum over and in excess of the sum named in said agreement and asked by said defendant, to wit: for the sum of $42,000, and upon terms suitable and satisfactory to said defendant, and that said purchaser was able to purchase, willing to purchase, ready to purchase, and who actually did purchase, said real property”; that, having performed all the terms, covenants, and conditions of their agreement with defendant, the plaintiffs “became and were entitled to the sum of 5 per cent. commission upon said purchase price of forty-two thousand dollars.”

The theory of the defendant, as developed by the evidence introduced in support of his resistance to the claim of plaintiffs, was, as before stated, that De Roulet, in bringing Mrs. Camy and defendant together in the transaction culminating in the sale to her, was acting entirely for himself and independently of plaintiffs; that he was never authorized by plaintiffs to act for them in the matter of the sale of the property involved in their agreement with defendant; and that his claim that he was so acting for plaintiffs was the result of an understanding conceived by him and the plaintiffs after the sale to Mrs. Camy was effected and sought to be established by them with the design and hope of securing the maximum commissions provided for in the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant. To this end, defendant undertook to show that De Roulet, after bringing about the sale of the land to Mrs. Camy, was told by plaintiffs that, if he would join them in maintaining that he had acted as their agent in his dealings with the defendant and Mrs. Camy, they could secure the 5 per cent. commission to which defendant had bound himself, in case plaintiffs secured a buyer, and that they would then divide the total sum of the commissions, allowed on the basis of 5 per cent. of the purchase price, in equal shares between them; that it was then that the idea that De Roulet, in the transaction with Mrs. Camy, was not acting for himself alone, but as the regularly appointed agent of plaintiffs, was first conceived by him and plaintiffs.

[3] We need not review the evidence thus offered by the defendant and received by the court; for, while it may be conceded that some circumstances were thus developed which, upon their face, might tend to inspire suspicion as to the good faith of the claim that De Roulet acted at all times, in his negotiations with Mrs. Camy, as the agent of plaintiffs, still the effect of that testimony, even if it were material, could only be to raise a substantial conflict in the evidence, and, as is well understood, the conclusion of the trial court as to the truth of the matter must therefore be accepted by this court.

The defendant did not deny making the agreement with plaintiffs. Indeed, his letter written three days after the expiration of the 90 days during which the contract by express language was to remain in force (it will be observed that the contract further provided that after the 90 days it should remain in force until it was canceled by written notice) notifying plaintiffs of the cancellation of the agreement is itself evidence of a conclusive character that he recognized the legality and binding force of its terms. Justy, Vise, and De Roulet, as we have seen, each testified that the last named was, immediately upon the execution of the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, especially employed by plaintiffs to find a purchaser of the property described in said agreement, and that from that time until he did find a purchaser in the person of Mrs. Camy he continued in their employment for that specific purpose. Conceding, for the present, that the evidence produced by defendant upon this point would, if sufficient in probative power, have established a legal defense to the right of plaintiffs to recover the maximum commissions stipulated for by the agreement, it was then, of course, for the trial court to decide upon which side the evidence upon that issue preponderated, and, having found thereon with plaintiffs, it is not, as before stated, within the legal province of a reviewing court to declare that the court below thus reached an erroneous conclusion or abused the discretion with which it is invested in the matter of weighing evidence, and, to that end, judging of the credibility of the witnesses.

It is further urged by appellant that there is no evidence in the record disclosing the precise price at which the real estate described in the contract was sold. This point may appropriately be considered in connection with the rulings of the court by which the defendant was prevented from showing that the price for which the property was sold was less than the sum of $36,000. This will necessitate a return to the facts from which the question arose in the court below and is presented here.

De Roulet, it will be recalled, testified that when he brought Mrs. Camy to Erro, after having told her that she could obtain the property for the sum of $36,000, the latter refused to accept said sum, but raised the purchase price to $43,000, finally, however, agreeing to take $42,000. But the last-named price, it appears, included, in addition to the land itself, a large amount of personal property of various kinds—some live stock and some consisting of farming implements, machinery, etc. The court by its judgment allowed plaintiffs commissions computed upon the basis of the price for which the farm and said personal property were sold, viz., $42,000, a judgment having consequently been rendered and entered in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $2,100. But in passing upon the motion for a new trial the court, as a condition to a denial of said motion, ordered and required plaintiffs to remit the sum of $300 of the judgment so rendered and entered. The plaintiffs within the time specified by the court in its order filed a written remission of the amount designated by the court, the effect of which was to reduce the judgment in favor of plaintiffs to the sum of $1,800, which manifestly represents commissions at the rate of 5 per cent. on the purchase price of the land as set forth in the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant.

But it is now earnestly insisted that, notwithstanding such reduction of the amount for which judgment was originally awarded, the court's refusal to permit evidence to be received which, it is claimed, would or might have disclosed that the price Mrs. Camy agreed to pay for the land was less than the sum of $36,000, was prejudicially erroneous. But we think the rulings so complained of were proper from every standpoint from which we have been led to view this record.

[4] As we have seen, the rule approved by all the authorities is that where, as here, the contract between the broker and the seller itself fixes and specifies the price for which the former is authorized to sell the property on specified commissions, the broker, in case he procures a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase at such price, is entitled to the stipulated commissions on the price so fixed and specified regardless of whether the owner has reduced the price in the final sale of the property to such purchaser or otherwise changed the terms of the contract. Mechem on Agency, § 967; Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 349. This rule is, of course, subject to the qualification that the broker had no notice or knowledge of the reduction of price or had not acquiesced in or consented to such reduction or other modifications of the terms of the contract material to his rights thereunder.

The contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant in the case at bar authorized the former to sell the property for the sum of $36,000 on which sum they were to receive, as compensation, if they brought to defendant a buyer within the time limited by said contract, commissions at the rate of "5 per cent. on the purchase price." And the words "purchase price" cannot justly or reasonably be construed to have reference to any other price than that definitely fixed and specified in the contract. There is no evidence, nor, indeed, any pretense, that plaintiffs consented to a reduction of the price so fixed. Therefore they were entitled to be paid commissions on the basis of the price thus definitely fixed, and in accordance with which they undertook to sell the property, without regard to any change in such price to which the defendant himself, without their knowledge or consent, might have assented with the buyer. The part of the convention that plaintiffs obligated themselves to perform was completely fulfilled when, through their efforts there was brought to the defendant a buyer then ready, willing, and able to buy the property.

From the foregoing views, it manifestly follows that testimony which might have shown or tended to show that the defendant, in his negotiation with Mrs. Camy immediately culminating in the sale, agreed to and did in fact sell the property described in his agreement with the plaintiffs for a smaller sum than that fixed by said agreement would not have been material or relevant for any purpose.

Objections were also made by counsel for defendant to all questions propounded to the witnesses Justy, Vise, and De Roulet with regard to the conversation occurring between said witnesses immediately after the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant was executed. The conversation thus sought to be brought out, and, in fact, brought out, involved the agreement and the terms thereof between plaintiffs and De Roulet by which the latter was employed by plaintiffs to assist them, as their agent, to sell defendant's property. The rulings allowing testimony of said conversation were not erroneous. Assuming for the purpose only of considering said rulings, that the theory of the defense is tenable—that is, that proof that De Roulet, in his transaction with Mrs. Camy, acted for himself and not for plaintiffs, would, if it satisfactorily showed the fact, constitute a defense to the right of plaintiffs to recover at all—it was, in such case, of course, incumbent upon plaintiffs, in order to establish their title to the maximum commissions provided for in their contract with defendant, to show that De Roulet had been duly and regularly authorized by them to act for them and that he did act for them in the sale of the property. Indeed, declaring and relying, as they do, in one count of the complaint, upon the contract for a recovery, the plaintiffs had the undoubted right to show that they negotiated the sale, through whomsoever it might have been personally accomplished, if by some one employed by them for that purpose. But this agreement, as made orally immediately following the execution of the contract between plaintiffs and defendant, was subsequently (September 20, 1908), and prior to the time at which the contract between defendant and Mrs. Camy was executed (October 10, 1908), reduced to writing, and in that form offered and received in evidence. The vital and only important covenant involved in said agreement was that by which De Roulet was authorized by plaintiffs to find for them a purchaser of defendant's property, to prove which fact was the sole purpose of the production of evidence of said agreement.

[5, 6] Therefore, even if it be questionable whether the testimony of the oral agreement of the parties was proper, in view of the requirement of our statute of frauds that certain agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to sell real estate for compensation shall be in writing (section 1624, subd. 6, Civ. Code), a proposition we need not decide here, it cannot, of course, be said that the written evidence thereof was not competent and proper, or that the testimony of the oral negotiations and agreement authorizing De Roulet to act for plaintiffs could in any manner or measure have prejudiced defendant, since there is not, nor any claim that there is, any material variance between the agreement as orally made and the written evidence thereof. But, in any event, while, as before declared, the finding of the court that the efforts of plaintiffs were the procuring or proximate cause of the sale is amply supported by the evidence, which finding necessarily implies a finding that De Roulet acted for plaintiffs in causing the sale to be made to Mrs. Camy, yet we are of the opinion, as previously suggested, that, accepting the theory upon which the defendant seeks to defeat the right of plaintiffs to the recovery of the maximum commission computed upon the basis of $36,000, the sum specified in the contract as the purchase price, it then becomes immaterial whether De Roulet did or did not act, in the transaction, as agent of plaintiffs, and that, therefore, the latter must still prevail.

This proposition calls for a construction of the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant and the rights of the former thereunder, and, if it be sound, then obviously error cannot be predicated of any of the rulings by which the court refused to allow testimony designed to show that De Roulet was not employed by plaintiffs to find a purchaser or to negotiate a sale of defendant's property for them, or that he was not acting for them when he brought Mrs. Camy to defendant as a purchaser of said property.

The agreement between plaintiffs and defendant, it will be noted, gives to plaintiffs the exclusive right to sell or negotiate the sale of the property therein described for the period of at least 90 days from the date of the execution thereof. The only qualification of said provision and the right so given is that the defendant himself may sell the property to any party to whom the same has been submitted by plaintiffs, in which event the latter were to receive commissions at the rate of 2½ per cent. or the minimum commissions stipulated for in the agreement. Thus it is to be observed that the only contingency which could arise under the contract, the happening of which during the life of the agreement would limit the right of plaintiffs to the minimum commissions provided for thereby, was the sale of the property by defendant to some party to whom the proposition of the sale had antecedently been submitted by the plaintiffs. In other words, there is only one thing that could have occurred, under the terms of the contract and within the time limited thereby, which would compel the plaintiffs to accept the smaller commissions provided for by said agreement, and that is where the sale was made by defendant himself to a party to whom the plaintiffs had prior to such sale submitted the proposition. Of this proposition there is, in our opinion, absolutely no ground for debate. This being true, the agreement, viewed and considered in its entirety, is rationally capable of but one construction, viz.: That, with the said exception that the owner of the property might himself have sold the same by his own personal efforts to some person to whom the proposition of the sale had previously been submitted by the plaintiffs—that is to say, to a party to whose attention the proposition had been brought by plaintiffs, but who has finally purchased the same through the personal efforts or negotiations of the defendant himself—the plaintiffs were vested with the sole and exclusive right to sell said property.

[7, 8] But a sale of the property within the period limited by the contract by the defendant brought about by any other person than the plaintiffs, without their acquiescence or consent, could not operate to defeat the latter's right to the maximum commissions provided for by said agreement (see Kimmel v. Slesley, 130 Cal. 555, 62 Pac. 1067), and, where the sale had been so made, in an action to assert that right, whether said action was upon the contract itself or for a breach of its terms (the maximum commissions which could be earned by them under the terms of the contract would, in the latter action, constitute the measure of damages), they would be entitled to recover the commissions computed at 5 per cent. on the sum of $36,000. See Mechem on Agency, § 967; Lane v. Allbright, 49 Ind. 275; Reed's Ex'rs v. Reed, 82 Pan. 420; Fox v. Byrnes, 52 N. Y. Super. Ct. 150. There is no evidence in the record, nor, indeed, any claim that the plaintiffs or either of them submitted the proposition of sale to Mrs. Camy, unless it was done through De Roulet as their agent. Vise testified that he "talked with Mrs. Camy with reference to this property after the sale, but never before." The purpose of the evidence unsuccessfully sought to be brought out by the cross-examination of Justy, Vise, and De Roulet was to support the theory of the defense that De Roulet in bringing Erro and Mrs. Camy together on the proposition of the sale of the land, was in no sense connected with plaintiffs, was not acting as their agent, but was acting solely for himself; that the proposition had not been submitted to her by the plaintiffs. As proof of such fact would not, as is manifest, have released or absolved Erro from liability to pay plaintiffs the stipulated maximum commissions on the purchase price as specified in the agreement, it follows, of course, that the rulings of the court excluding evidence of such fact, if it was a fact, were proper. Such testimony, in other words, even if sufficient to satisfactorily prove the fact, could not have established a legal defense to the right of plaintiffs to recover the 5 per cent. commissions on the sum of $36,000, fixed and specified by the contract as the purchase price of the property.

There are some other points presented which, in view of our theory of the meaning and scope of the agreement between the parties to this action, call for no special notice.

We have discovered no reason for interfering with the judgment and the order, and they are therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

16 Cal. App. 375

PIERCE v. PIERCE. (Civ. 805).

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 9, 1911. On rehearing, July 7, 1911.)

1. ACTION (§ 7*)—MOTIVE IN SUING.

Motive, though an important element of fraud, does not alone vitiate a conveyance nor preclude the assertion of a valid claim, and hence, when a mortgage given for valuable consideration is foreclosed by regular proceedings, the court will not inquire into the motives of the suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Action, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 7.]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 29*)—TRANSFER—SUBJECT—ATTACK—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Civ. Code, § 3439, which provides that every judicial proceeding taken with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands is void against all creditors of the debtor, is intended to prevent any fraudulent change in the situation of the property which would prejudice persons holding claims against the debtor, but does not prevent the enforcement of a valid existing lien upon specific property of the debtor, where every requirement of the statute is complied with, and no element of fraud appears in the proceeding to enforce the lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 29.]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 29*)—COLLUSIVE LEGAL PROCEDURE—TRANSFER ON FRAUDULENT CLAIM.

A debtor's attempt to cover up his property or to transfer it by means of legal proceedings, regular in form, will not be set aside as fraudulent against creditors, unless the proceeding is had on a fraudulent claim, one that has the form but not the substance of a valid charge on the property; and a sale in foreclosure of a mortgage either under a power therein or by legal proceedings will not be set aside at the suit of creditors of the mortgagor unless there be fraud in the foreclosure proceeding itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 72-82; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 299*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action by a wife against her husband's divorced wife to quiet title in a certain piece of property held insufficient to sustain a finding that the mortgage executed by the husband for a valuable consideration was foreclosed at his instigation for the fraudulent purpose on his part and on the part of the mortgagee of concealing the title of the property from his creditors, and particularly of concealing title to such property in anticipation of commencing an action of divorce against his former wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

On Rehearing.

5. TRIAL (§ 395*)—FINDINGS—ULTIMATE AND EVIDENTIARY FACTS AND CONCLUSIONS.

In an action by a wife to quiet title in property formerly belonging to her husband, and in which the husband's divorced wife claimed a lien, a finding that it was not true that the claim of defendant was without any right whatever, and that she had no estate, title, or interest in or to the lands or any part thereof, but that the defendant and plaintiff were the owners of the land as tenants in common subject to certain liens, is the finding of an ultimate fact, and is not a mere conclusion, and as such necessarily precludes a judgment that plaintiff is the sole owner of the land.

6. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION—ULTIMATE FACTS TO PREVAIL OVER PROBATIVE FACTS.

An ultimate fact shown by the finding of certain probative facts to have been found against the evidence must still prevail where it does not appear that the findings of the probative facts dispose of all the facts involved in the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Ella B. Pierce against Frances P. Pierce, with cross-action in which Robert E. Pierce and others were made parties. From a judgment establishing a lien in favor of the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Power & McFadzean, E. M. Rea, and Horatio Alling, for appellant. Will M. Beggs, R. M. McCornish, and E. C. Farnsworth, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. For a statement of the facts and of the grounds of the decision as to the merits, we make the following quotation from the opinion filed in the cause by the learned trial judge:

"This is a suit between the present wife and the former wife of Dr. Robert E. Pierce to quiet title to an orange grove of about 30 acres near Lindsay, and now worth at least $30,000. By a cross-complaint Dr. Pierce, his mother, Fannie L. Pierce, and his brother, Frederick B. Pierce, are made parties. Dr. Pierce became a practicing physician in 1879. One year later at his ancestral home in Melrose, Mass., he was married to defendant, and they lived together for nearly 20 years, most of the time at San Jose, where Dr. Pierce still resides. The land in controversy was purchased with community funds about the year 1894. Defendant was in Melrose from July, 1897, for nearly two years, visiting the doctor's mother, having gone there, as defendant says, 'at his very urgent consent and wish.' It appears from the testimony of the mother, Fannie L. Pierce, that her husband in 1884 loaned Dr. Pierce $2,000 on his note. The father died about three years later, leaving this note with other property to Fannie L. Pierce. Nine years after his death, while the doctor was visiting at Melrose, in January, 1896, she loaned him an additional $2,000, taking his note for $4,000, and canceling the first note. Nearly two years later, November 29, 1897, Dr. Pierce executed a mortgage on the land in controversy to his mother to secure payment of a note for $4,000 of even date, due one year after date. The mortgage and the new note were prepared either in the brother's office in San Francisco, or in the office of Jackson Hatch, at San Jose. On February 10, 1899, suit in the name of the mother was brought against Dr. Pierce to foreclose this mortgage. The brother appeared as attorney for his mother. Summons was issued and received by the sheriff and served on Dr. Pierce the same day in Tulare county, there being mileage charged for only one mile, which shows that the doctor was at or conveniently near Visalia on that day. On February 21st, the doctor not having appeared, his default was entered and the mother obtained a judgment against him for $4,603.30, including $250 attorney's fee. A decree of foreclosure was entered, and on March 14, 1899, the land was sold to the mother for the amount of the judgment and cost of sale. Under the law the doctor had six months within which to redeem the property, but four days after the foreclosure sale he conveyed the land and his equity of redemption to his mother, Fannie L. Pierce.

"Dr. Pierce testified that shortly after the foreclosure sale he received a lease of the land from his mother through his brother for a term of from three to five years. This lease was not recorded or produced at the trial. In June, 1900, Dr. Pierce sued his wife for divorce, she resisted, filed a cross-complaint, and was awarded the decree of divorce and alimony in the sum of $100 a month, and the alimony was made a lien upon this property. The records of this suit were burned in the fire following the earthquake in San Francisco, where the case was tried. From the decree, a copy of which was recorded in this county, it is evident that the property rights of the parties were put in issue and tried and the doctor must have admitted the ownership as claimed, or permitted the ownership to be proved without objection. After the divorce was granted, down to 1902, the divorced wife saw Dr. Pierce very often at her home, where he would call upon her. He was friendly and affectionate in his greetings. Whenever she was ill, which was often, he prescribed for her as a physician. She frequently consulted with him about her business affairs. He appeared much interested in her welfare, and she still had great trust and confidence in him. Alimony was paid for a time. The last payment of $200 was advanced by defendant's father, he taking Dr. Pierce's note, which has not been repaid. Alimony was in arrears for about four years at the time of the trial. Early in 1902 Dr. Pierce told his former wife that he had a paper which he wished her to sign, and that he would send it to her by his brother Fred. Soon afterwards, on February 8, 1902, while she was ill in bed and preparing for a surgical operation, which Dr. Pierce had advised, the brother, Fred Pierce, took the paper to her and she signed and acknowledged it. She says she was told that it was a lien, but did not know what a lien was. Neither the doctor nor the brother told her it was a release of her lien on the property, and she did not discover that it was until the fall of 1906. She did not read it, but signed it because the doctor asked her to sign it. She knew nothing of the mortgage on the property nor of the foreclosure and sale nor of the deed from Dr. Pierce to his mother, nor of any lease from the mother to Dr. Pierce until in October, 1906.

"In January, 1906, Dr. Pierce and plaintiff, Ella B. Pierce, were married. Then, without consulting his mother, Fred B. Pierce prepared and sent to her a deed, which she executed on February 8, 1906, conveying this property to Ella B. Pierce whom she had never seen and with whom she had never corresponded. This deed was recorded. No consideration was received for it. The mother said it was a present. The mother never saw the property, never asked for the payment of the note, nor for any security, nor ever authorized the foreclosure suit. Everything seems to have been done by Fred Pierce, and she but passively responded to his suggestions."

Attention is then directed to the fact that by various acts after the foreclosure Dr. Pierce treated the property as his own, and it is said to be "a reasonable inference from the circumstances that Dr. Pierce urged his wife to go East in July, 1897, with a view of putting the community property in a condition so that she would ultimately be deprived of any interest in it and then to separate from her and cause a divorce to be granted." The opinion proceeds: "The remarkable facts in this case have culminated in a condition by which the community property of Dr. Pierce and his former wife, now worth many thousand dollars, has without any act or omission of hers, and without her prior knowledge, become by gift apparently the separate and exclusive property of the new wife, while she, the first wife, is destitute and working as a stenographer for $40 a month to support herself and her 85 year old father. The court concludes that it is not right, and that a just disposition of the cause is to set aside and annul the foreclosure proceedings, the deed from Dr. Pierce to his mother, the release of the lien for alimony, and the deed from the mother to Ella B. Pierce, so far as it grants more than an undivided half interest in the lands and affects the lien for alimony, and to decree that plaintiff and defendant are owners as tenants in common of the orange grove and the profits heretofore made from it, that the land is subject to two liens—the mortgage lien which may be considered the property of the plaintiff, and the lien for overdue alimony, the property of the defendant, and that an accounting be had and the property sold and out of the proceeds the amount found due upon the accounting be paid, and, after the payment of costs, the balance be divided equally between the plaintiff and defendant."

It is due Dr. Pierce to say that his brother, Frederick B. Pierce, who acted as his attorney, testified that he explained to defendant fully the said release of lien, and that it was read to her at the time she executed it. The court, though, accepted her account of it rather than his. This, of course, the court had a right to do. No doubt the court below took a humane view of the situation, and, from a generous impulse, sought to relieve the distress of a woman that was believed to have been wronged and oppressed. It seems impossible, though, as we view it, to reconcile the decision with certain well-established legal principles.

The whole cause turns upon the finding of the court: "That the said mortgage was made, executed, and delivered for a valuable consideration paid to the said Robert E. Pierce, but that the foreclosure thereof was instigated and suffered, and the commissioner's deed thereunder permitted by the said Robert E. Pierce for the fraudulent purpose on the part of the said Robert E. Pierce and the said Fannie L. Pierce of concealing the title of the said property from the creditors of the said Robert E. Pierce and particularly of concealing the title of the said Robert E. Pierce to said property in anticipation of commencing an action for divorce against the defendant and cross-plaintiff." That this is the gravamen of the controversy must be apparent. If the mortgage and the foreclosure proceedings were legal and regular, the complete title became vested in Fannie L. Pierce. This would be so without regard to Dr. Pierce's deed of his equity of redemption. It would necessarily follow that plaintiff succeeded to the entire estate in the property, as the deed to her is unassailable.

Assuming, therefore, that there was no infirmity in the steps culminating in the commissioner's deed to her, the deed from the said Fannie L. Pierce to Ella B. Pierce vested the title absolutely in plaintiff, and the judgment of the court below was, of course, an unwarranted interference with her right. On the other hand, it may be said that in connection with other findings of the court the judgment can be upheld if the annulment of the said foreclosure proceedings can be justified. This vital finding, therefore, requires attention.

It is to be observed that there is no taint as to the mortgage itself. It was for a valuable consideration, and the purpose of the parties in executing it is not impugned. Indeed, it is expressly found that "said mortgage was in all respects a valid lien on said land," but the foreclosure is set aside for the reason that the parties were moved thereto by fraudulent and improper motives. We must assume—and, indeed, the evidence shows it—that the money borrowed and secured by said lien was due and unpaid, that no legal step in the action of foreclosure was omitted, that the judgment decreeing the sale was according to the forms of law, that the sale was regular, that no one was prevented from bidding for the property, and that it was sold for its full market value. As a matter of fact, it appears to have been sold to the mortgagee for the amount of the judgment, which was in excess of the value of the land. Moreover, there was nothing to show that either party to the foreclosure had any reason to believe or did believe that the property would increase in value, the returns from it and the condition of the trees on the land indicating, to the contrary, that it would depreciate. If the judgment of foreclosure under these circumstances should be set aside, of course, it would follow that the mortgagee should not have attempted to foreclose her lien. The situation would then be this: For the reason that A. desires to prevent C. from realizing anything from a contingent interest in the property, he is forbidden by equity to assert a perfectly valid claim against B. in a perfectly legal manner, although, by forbearing to press his suit, it is probable that his security will be jeopardized, and no benefit will accrue to C. This may be the refinement of morality, but it is not the principle upon which business is conducted, nor can it be enforced unless we are by law to attempt to control the motives of men in their dealings with one another.

[1] Motive, though an important element of fraud, does not alone vitiate a conveyance nor preclude the assertion of a valid claim. In Morris v. Tuthill, 72 N. Y. 575, which was a suit to foreclose a mortgage, the court said: "The facts that the assignor of a mortgage and his assignee acted in concert with the view unnecessarily to harass and oppress the mortgagor and with intent to prevent payment, to the end that the equity of redemption might be foreclosed, and they become purchasers for less than the value, do not constitute a defense to an action to foreclose a mortgage. So, also, the facts that the assignee took title from motives of malice, and solely with a view to bring an action, and that the assignor assigned from a like motive and without consideration, furnish no defense, and do not impeach plaintiff's title. It is sufficient to sustain the action that the mortgage debt is due, has been transferred to, and is owned by, plaintiff." In Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co., 176 U. S. 190, 20 Sup. Ct. 314, 44 L. Ed. 423, it is said: "If the law concerned itself with the motives of parties, new complications would be introduced into suits which might seriously obscure their real merits. If the debt secured by a mortgage be justly due, it is no defense to a foreclosure that the mortgagee was animated by hostility or other bad motive." Therein reference is made to many analogous decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States holding in a variety of cases that the courts will not inquire into the motives of the parties. To the same effect are Davis v. Flagg, 35 N. J. Eq. 491; McMullen v. Ritchie (C. C.) 64 Fed. 253; Toler v. E. Tenn. Ry. (C. C.) 67 Fed. 168.

[2] But the claim is made that the case is brought within the inhibition of section 3439 of the Civil Code against "every judicial proceeding taken with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands." The purpose of this statute is manifestly to prevent any fraudulent change in the situation of the property that would prejudice the rights of persons holding claims against the debtor. It would be rather a strained construction to hold that it includes the enforcement in the regular manner of a lien that had previously attached to the property. If there were any deceit practiced, or any advantage taken, or any substantial irregularity in the judicial proceeding, a different question would be presented, but it seems unreasonable to hold that the section applies to the enforcement of a valid existing lien upon specific property where every requirement of the statute is complied with, and no element of fraud appears in the proceeding to enforce the lien.

[3] The cases relied upon by respondent involve different circumstances, as will be seen upon an examination. They are cited in 20 Cyc. 397-401, as authority for the text: "Debtors frequently attempt to cover up their property or transfer it in fraud of creditors by means of collusive and fraudulent legal proceedings; but it is well settled that such proceedings, however legal they may be in form, are void as against creditors, and the property so disposed of, real or personal, may be reached and subjected to the satisfaction of their claims," and "a collusive and fraudulent sale under foreclosure of a mortgage or deed of trust on real or personal property, either under a power therein or by legal proceedings, will be set aside at the suit of creditors of the mortgagor or grantor." The former, though, refers, we think, to a fraudulent and not a bona fide claim, one that has the form but not the substance and merit of a valid charge against the property; and the latter contemplates fraud in the proceedings themselves whereby the security is sought to be enforced. This is shown in the cases cited, as far as they are in point at all. In Laffin v. Cent. Pub. House, 52 Ill. 432, the trial judge had answered in the negative the following two legal propositions: (1) "Whether the act entitled 'An act to amend chapter 9 of the Revised Statutes, entitled attachments in circuit courts,' warrants an attachment on the ground of fraud in a sale under a chattel mortgage without fraud in the making of the mortgage?" (2) "Whether a sale under a chattel mortgage, which, in matter of fact, hinders and delays creditors, warrants an attachment under said act, on the ground that such sale is fraudulent in law, without a corrupt intent in the making of the sale." The Supreme Court, however, declined to pass upon the questions for the reason that the record was too incomplete, and therefore the judgment was affirmed. In Milliman v. Eddie, 115 Iowa, 530, 88 N. W. 964, the judgment on which the defendants relied was supported by no consideration. The Supreme Court of Iowa said: "It was, in effect, a voluntary confession of judgment, and on an indebtedness which did not in fact exist, made for the sole and only purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of the senior Goodmans, among whom were the plaintiffs' grantors. * * * The transaction from the beginning to the end was fraudulent in fact and void." The character of James v. M. & M. R. Co., 73 U. S. 752, 18 L. Ed. 885, is seen in this statement from the syllabus: "In a sale under a railroad mortgage, where the amount of bonds in the hands of bona fide holders was less than $200,000, and the notice of sale set forth that the mortgage debt was $2,000,000, and that $70,000 interest was due, the sale could not be upheld without sanctioning the grossest fraud and injustice." "This deceptive notice," as stated in the opinion, "was calculated to destroy all competition among the bidders, and, indeed, to exclude from the purchase everyone, except those engaged in the perpetration of the fraud." Drury v. Cross, 74 U. S. 299, 19 L. Ed. 40, was a similar case. There the directors of a railroad company procured a mortgage to be foreclosed on the railroad for a much larger sum than was actually due, by fraudulent combination with the purchaser. It was therefore held that the purchaser must be held liable as trustee to creditors for the value of the property he purchased on the sale of the road, after deducting the amount due him at the day of sale. The court declared that "The scheme to acquire the property of this corporation was in its inception fraudulent, and every step in the progress of its execution was necessarily stamped with the same character." In Livesay's Ex'r v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585, a deed of trust on lands and personal property with no definite fixed period at which a sale could be required and which put it in the power of the grantor by collusion or otherwise to indefinitely postpone a sale thereunder and put all the live stock conveyed by the deed and the increase thereof and all future crops to be raised from the land in the quiet enjoyment of the grantor, from which to support his family and pay the debts secured thereon as he might deem most advantageous, was held to be fraudulent on its face and void. Woodard v. Mastin, 106 Mo. 324, 17 S. W. 308, was the case of a fraudulent and collusive sale for $300 of property belonging to an insolvent debtor and worth about $40,000. It is hard to see how the transaction could have been held otherwise than fraudulent and void. In Wright v. Mack, 95 Ind. 332, a debtor in failing circumstances executed chattel mortgages upon all his property and stock in trade, of the value of $5,700, to secure sums in the aggregate of $1,400. It was held that the debtor had the right to secure the debts "to the exclusion or in preference of his other creditors, and the mortgagees might lawfully accept such securities." But it was held that on account of the irregularity and fraud in the subsequent proceedings participated in by the mortgagees, whereby there was a wrongful conversion of the property, the parties were liable to the general creditors for their damages resulting from such conversion. Hudgkins v. Kemp, 61 U. S. 45, 15 L. Ed. 853, involved a fraudulent conveyance by a bankrupt. Among the indicia of fraud it appeared that the land was worth double the amount of the purchase price, and the possession and occupancy of the same remained unchanged. The evidence is reviewed in the opinion and held to impeach strongly the bona fides of the transaction between the grantor and grantee. In all these cases the element of guile or subtlety or imposition attached to some overt act of vital importance to the parties. In none of them was there a lawful assertion in a lawful manner of a valid claim that had its origin in good faith for an adequate consideration.

[4] But, if we consider the evidence, we find it insufficient to support the finding in reference to the concealment of the property and in anticipation of the action for divorce. There is no proof whatever that the mother had any knowledge of the doctor's domestic relations or any intimation of his intentions in that respect when the suit for foreclosure was brought, or at any time within the sixteen months that followed before the action for divorce was begun. There is nothing to show that she was influenced in the matter at all by any other motive than a desire to realize on her mortgage debt, which was past due. We can only surmise that the doctor had in mind the dissolution of the marital ties, as there does not seem to be any evidence of it. As appellant states it: "If there was anything in their relations prior to the divorce which would indicate the approaching final breach between them, the record is silent concerning it. So far as the record discloses, the barque of their domestic felicity sank suddenly in a windless, waveless sea. There was no warning note of the disaster for the ear of either friends or relatives, so far as the record shows." It may be remarked that the circumstance that the property was incumbered for more than its value is persuasive evidence that there was no intention of "concealing" it by means of the foreclosure. There was no apparent reason for even an opinion that the property would more than satisfy the valid claims that had already become a charge against it, and it seems scarcely credible, under these circumstances, that the motive was otherwise than to subject the property to the payment of the debt. The law certainly did not require the parties to anticipate that the property might become more valuable, that there might be other claimants and to forbear the enforcement of a valid lien until such time as the property might be valuable enough to satisfy all future demands. As to this point the only reply of respondent is that "the record shows conclusively that the foreclosure and subsequent proceedings were taken for the express purpose of defeating the rights of some one who was about to sue Dr. Pierce for malpractice." The only evidence in that connection is the testimony of Frederick B. Pierce, who said: "The mortgage was foreclosed because a short time before that the doctor was threatened with a suit for damages for malpractice in San Jose, and he wanted to have this property in such shape to protect my mother. He was willing to give me a deed rather than have the mortgage foreclosed, but at that time I wanted to keep the records straight, and as long as this mortgage was in existence and it was a bona fide transaction, that it would appear much better if there was any question of consideration raised thereafter. I was the moving spirit in the foreclosure proceedings." But, granting that this was one of the motive considerations of the foreclosure, the answer would seem to be that it does not appear that this unknown person was a creditor of Dr. Pierce or that he had a demand in any legal sense against the doctor.

As we view the matter, the judgment on the findings should have been in favor of plaintiff.

The judgment and order are reversed, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. [5] Respondent has called our attention to certain findings of the court below, which, it is claimed, would render a judgment for plaintiff unsupported. Among them is: "That it is not true that the claim of the defendant, Frances P. Pierce, is without any right whatever, or that she has no estate, right, title, or interest in or to said land, or any part thereof; but on the contrary, defendant Frances P. Pierce and plaintiff Ella B. Pierce are the owners of said property as tenants in common, subject to certain liens against the said property, as hereinafter more particularly set forth." We should treat this as the finding of an ultimate fact and not as a mere conclusion. It necessarily follows that it would preclude a judgment that plaintiff is the sole owner of the property.

[6] Notwithstanding the finding of certain probative facts shows that the foregoing ultimate fact was found against the evidence, the ultimate fact must prevail, since it does not appear that the findings of the probative facts dispose of all the facts involved in the pleadings. Forsythe v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 575, 87 Pac. 24.

We think, therefore, that our judgment rendered herein should be modified so as to simply reverse the judgment and the order of the court below. It is therefore ordered that the following words be stricken from the opinion filed: "As we view the matter, the judgment on the findings should have been in favor of plaintiff," and also that the following words be stricken from the judgment, to wit: "With directions to enter judgment for plaintiff." The petition for a rehearing is denied.

KAUFMAN v. ALL PERSONS, ETC.

Appeal of YOUNG et ux.
(Civ. 824.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 13, 1911.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 44*)—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action to establish title and determine adverse claims held to show that plaintiff exercised her option to purchase the property in controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 77*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—TIME OF PAYMENT.

Where an agreement for the purchase of realty gave the vendee the right to pay the installments of the price "on or before" the date on which they were due, she could pay all of the installments before the first installment was due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 120; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 18*)—OPTION AGREEMENT—RIGHTS OF VENDEE.

Defendant executed a note to a loan society payable in installments at stated times, all of the principal being due February 1, 1906, and, the principal not having been then paid, defendant executed a trust deed to secure the note, the insurance upon the property being payable upon loss to the society. On January 16, 1906, defendant executed an agreement giving plaintiff in consideration of $1,000 an option to purchase the property, a part of the remaining $5,000 of the price to be paid to a bank for defendant in installments, and the balance of the price to be paid to the loan society according to the terms of the trust deed executed to it, and further providing that defendant should execute a deed, subject to the trust deed, and place it in escrow with the bank to be delivered to plaintiff upon payment of the installments to the bank, and that plaintiff should, after exercising the option, pay the installments to the loan society which defendant was bound to pay to it under the trust deed. In April, 1906, the improvements were destroyed by fire and the insurance applied on the mortgage debt to the loan society, and defendant on September 26, 1906, paid the balance due on the debt to it without plaintiff's knowledge, and received from it a reconveyance of the trust deed title. Plaintiff afterwards tendered to the society the amount due on the installments pursuant to the agreement of defendant, which tenders were refused, and defendant also refused any further tenders on the ground that they were insufficient because they credited plaintiff with the insurance money paid to the society. Held, that defendant's payment of the debt to the loan society could not affect plaintiff's rights under the option agreement, nor prevent her from paying to the bank the money upon payment of which she was to receive the escrow deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 57*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—ASSUMPTION OF INDEBTEDNESS.

Under the option agreement, construed in view of the escrow deed, which expressly conveyed the premises to plaintiff subject to the deed of trust from defendant to the loan society, plaintiff assumed defendant's indebtedness to the society as a part of her purchase price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 199*)—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER—APPLICATION OF INSURANCE.

Plaintiff acquired an equitable interest in the proceeds of the insurance policy as an incident to her equitable title under the agreement of sale, so that she was entitled to have the proceeds of the policy applied upon the mortgage indebtedness assumed by her.

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 266*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—WAIVER.

Where a vendor refused the purchaser's offer to pay the installments due on a mortgage indebtedness which the purchaser assumed, and refused the purchaser's offer to make a full and final settlement of all amounts due the vendor under the contract, after deducting proper credits, he thereby waived his vendor's lien for an amount due on the indebtedness which the purchaser assumed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Kaufman against John Crosby Young and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants Young appeal. Affirmed.

Norman H. Hurd, for appellants. E. E. Hull (Guy Shoup, of counsel), for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the defendants Young from the judgment and the order denying them a new trial.

The action was brought in the month of February, 1908, under the provisions of the act of June 16, 1906, popularly known as the "McEnerney Act" (Laws 1906 [Ex. Sess.]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

p. 78), for the purpose of establishing plaintiff's title to certain real estate situated in the city of San Francisco and to determine the status of all adverse claims to said property. The defendant John C. Young claimed some interest in said real estate, and he was therefore served with summons and a copy of the complaint. Said Young, joined by his wife, Josephine M. Young, answered the complaint, and therein, after asking that they be adjudged to be the owners in fee or at least to have some interest in the property described in plaintiff's pleading, prayed that "in the event that said court shall not adjudge and declare said John Crosby Young to be the owner of said property and of said moneys aforesaid, by reason of said default and forfeiture, then and in that case that said defendants, John Crosby Young and Josephine M. Young, be adjudged and decreed * * * to be entitled to a vendor's lien covering all said property for the entire balance of the purchase price of said property." We have carefully examined the evidence as presented by defendants' statement on motion for a new trial, which is a part of the record on this appeal, and have found the statement of the facts, as set forth in respondent's brief, of the several transactions out of which this controversy has arisen, to be full and accurate, and we shall therefore adopt the greater part of such statement as the recital of said facts in this opinion. The defendant John C. Young was on the 1st day of February, 1904, the owner of the property in dispute, and on that day, in conjunction with his wife, made and executed to the Savings & Loan Society, a corporation, a promissory note in the sum of $4,000.

"This note provided for the payment of the indebtedness evidenced by it in monthly installments of $20 and accrued interest, until the 1st day of February, 1906, at which time the full amount of the principal should become due and payable. The note further provided that at any time during a default in the payment of any sum to be paid under the note, the entire balance of the indebtedness evidenced by said note should, 'at the option of the holder of this note, but not otherwise, become immediately due and payable.' The entire unpaid balance of this indebtedness was not paid on the date mentioned in the note at the time at which it was due, but the monthly payments of $20 and accrued interest were thereafter continued, with the consent of the Savings & Loan Society. For the purpose of securing the payment of the indebtedness evidenced by this promissory note, defendants Young executed to certain trustees for the benefit of the Savings & Loan Society a deed of trust, conveying to said trustees the real property described in the complaint. One of the conditions of this deed of trust was that the buildings located upon the property should be kept insured in a company to be designated by the Savings & Loan Society, in the sum of $3,000, 'loss, if any, to be made payable to said Savings & Loan Society.' Pursuant to this agreement contained in the deed of trust, the policy of insurance introduced in evidence, and set out upon pages 89 et seq. of the transcript, was procured. This policy of insurance contained the following clause: 'Loss, if any, payable to Savings & Loan Society.' For some time prior to January 16, 1906, plaintiff had occupied the premises in suit as the tenant of defendant Young, maintaining there 'a home for unfortunate girls and their babies,' known as the 'Peniel Home of Peace.' This was the condition of the title to the property in suit up to the last-mentioned date, at which time the agreement with plaintiff herein-after referred to was executed by defendant Young.

"On January 16, 1906, plaintiff and defendant John Crosby Young entered into an agreement for the sale of the property to plaintiff, by the terms of which plaintiff paid to said John Crosby Young the sum of $1,000 for an option to purchase the property in suit, this $1,000 to constitute a part of the purchase price of the property if plaintiff exercised her option to purchase. The remaining $5,000 of the purchase price was to be paid as follows: $1,476.52 to be paid to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank for defendant Young in three payments, the first of which was payable 'on or before' the 1st day of the January following the date of the contract, and the two remaining installments were to be paid 'on or before' later dates. The balance of the purchase price, amounting to $3,523.48, was 'to be paid to the Savings & Loan Society of San Francisco * * * at the rate of twenty dollars per month and interest, according to the terms of' the deed of trust hereinbefore referred to. The agreement further provided that 'a good and sufficient deed of said premises * * * subject to said deed of trust,' bearing same date as the agreement, should be at once executed by defendant Young and placed in escrow with the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, to be delivered to plaintiff upon payment by her of the $1,472.52 and interest which was to be paid to said defendant through this bank. The agreement provided that plaintiff should have until the first payment to be made to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank was due in which to exercise her option, and it also provided that in the exercise of her option she must pay the $20 per month and interest to the Savings & Loan Society 'according to the terms of' the deed of trust. As hereinbefore shown, the balance of the mortgage debt secured by the deed of trust was due within 15 days after the option agreement was entered into, but the Savings & Loan Society consented to a continuance of the monthly payments thereunder, and did not demand payment in any other way. Early in February, 1906, plaintiff made her first payment to the Savings & Loan Society under the terms of her option agreement, and thereafter continued to make her monthly payment of $20 and accrued interest to the Savings & Loan Society upon the mortgage debt, until prevented from doing so by the refusal of the Savings & Loan Society to receive further payments from her, under the claim that the mortgage debt had been satisfied.

"Prior to the date of the option agreement, and while plaintiff was occupying the premises in suit as tenant of defendant Young, she paid her rent of $40 per month to the Savings & Loan Society for account of her landlord, and the receipts given to her for such rent ran to her landlord, but after the execution of the agreement plaintiff was recognized by the Savings & Loan Society as the principal debtor under the mortgage debt, and the receipts were made to her direct, without mention of her former landlord's name in the transaction. In the agreement for an option no rent was reserved, nor was any mention made of payment of rent in any form. The only payments mentioned in the agreement were payments to be made upon the purchase price of the property.

"During the great San Francisco conflagration of April, 1906, the improvements upon the premises in suit were destroyed by fire, and thereafter the insurance effected under the terms of the deed of trust hereinbefore referred to was collected by the Savings & Loan Society and applied upon the mortgage debt. In the collection of this insurance the Savings & Loan Society further recognized plaintiff as the principal debtor under the mortgage debt by charging her with the attorney's fee expended in collecting the insurance, and by writing to her to call upon them in reference to her insurance. After applying the insurance money collected, there remained due to the Savings & Loan Society upon the mortgage debt the sum of $1,110. This sum, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, defendant John Crosby Young paid to the Savings & Loan Society on September 29, 1906, and took to himself a reconveyance of the title conveyed by the deed of trust. This reconveyance was never recorded. About one month after the date of this reconveyance, plaintiff paid to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank the full amount which she was to pay that bank for defendant John C. Young under the terms of the escrow agreement, and received from the bank the deed of defendants which had been placed there in escrow at the time of the execution of the option agreement. This deed was then duly recorded. No part of this sum paid to the Crocker-Woolworth Bank was due at the time of such payment, but by the terms of the agreement it might be paid 'on or before' the dates mentioned in the agreement as the times it was due and payable. Each month, for several months subsequent to the time the Savings & Loan Society delivered the 'reconveyance' to defendant Young, plaintiff made tenders to the Savings & Loan Society and to defendant John C. Young of the actual amount due each month after deducting the amount of insurance money collected by the Savings & Loan Society from the amount of the mortgage debt. These tenders were made both in writing and by tendering the actual amount due in money. The amount tendered each month included the amount previously tendered, which had been refused. The Savings & Loan Society refused to accept these tenders, basing its refusal upon the ground that the mortgage debt had been fully paid, and defendant Young refused to accept the tenders, basing his refusal upon the ground that plaintiff was not entitled to credit for the amount of the insurance money which had been applied upon the mortgage debt by the Savings & Loan Society, and therefore the amounts which she tendered were not enough. He was willing to accept any money which she was willing to pay to him, but refused to give a receipt for the same. After the tender of January 2, 1907, which tender included the amount due at that time, together with all previous amounts which she had tendered and which had been refused, plaintiff desisted from making further tenders until April 9, 1907, at which time she tendered, in writing, the full amount of the balance of the mortgage debt which remained after application of the insurance money. Acceptance of this tender was refused. On May 9, 1907, the trustees named in the deed of trust executed and delivered to plaintiff a satisfaction of the mortgage debt and a quitclaim to any title which they had in the property. On May 24, 1907, this satisfaction and quitclaim was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco, and thereupon plaintiff's record title to the property became clear of the mortgage lien."

Upon the foregoing statement of the facts, as established by the evidence, the main contentions urged by the appellants are: (1) That the plaintiff never exercised her right to purchase the property in question under the agreement of option between her and the defendant, John C. Young; (2) that the money due and paid as and for insurance on the building on the land did not and could not inure to her benefit, since the policy of insurance was not transferred or assigned to her by said Young; (3) that defendants are entitled to have a lien declared in the judgment upon the property in dispute as indemnity for the said sum of $1,110, which, as seen, they paid, under the circumstances as recited in the above statement of the facts, to the Savings & Loan Society.

There are also some assignments of error involving the rulings of the court in allowing to be answered certain questions propounded by counsel for plaintiff.

[1] 1. The evidence very clearly discloses in our opinion that plaintiff exercised her right of option to purchase the property described in the complaint. As we have seen, the plaintiff occupied the premises as a tenant of defendant John C. Young for a number of months prior to the date of the execution of the agreement of option. She paid the rent, by the express instructions of said Young, to the Savings & Loan Society, to which he was indebted in the sum of $4,000, the rent so paid being credited on the note evidencing said indebtedness. On the 16th day of January, 1906, the agreement of option was executed, said agreement containing the covenants heretofore mentioned. At the time of the execution of said agreement and as the consideration for its support, the plaintiff paid to the defendant John C. Young the sum of $1,000. On the same day the defendants, in consideration of the sum of $15, executed the deed in escrow, conveying to plaintiff the property in dispute, subject to the deed of trust of said property previously executed by defendants to the Savings & Loan Society. This deed, with a letter of instruction, dated January 18, 1906, was delivered to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, to be held in escrow by said bank and delivered to the grantee upon the performance of the conditions set out in said letter of instruction.

The agreement of option provided that, in the event plaintiff accepted the same or elected to exercise her right thereunder to purchase the property, she should pay to the Savings & Loan Society the balance of the indebtedness due it from the defendants ($3,523.48) in monthly installments of $20, together with the interest accruing on the unpaid balance of the principal sum. These payments, it is now claimed by defendants, merely constituted payments of the rent for the premises, but it was admitted by John C. Young that the plaintiff paid no rent after the agreement of option was executed, but that the payments to said society were made "under this agreement," referring to the said written option. Besides, while the receipts for rent paid to said society were always made out in the name of John C. Young, the payments by plaintiff to said society, after the execution of the deed in escrow, were receipted for in writing in plaintiff's name, thus showing that both John C. Young and the Savings & Loan Society recognized the transaction then subsisting between plaintiffs and defendants to be a contract of sale and not a mere option. Obviously there is nothing in the fact that plaintiff did not make a payment to the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank until after the defendant John C. Young had taken up the note held by the Savings & Loan Society, which militates in the slightest measure against the proposition that she exercised her right to buy the property within the time within which under the terms of the agreement she was at liberty to exercise that right.

[2] The agreement, it will be borne in mind, gave her the right to pay the installments to be paid at said bank "on or before" the dates on which such installments were, respectively, to be paid, and when she paid the full amount which she was required to pay at the bank, including, of course, all the installments, before the date on which the first installment became due, she thus acted clearly within her right under the option agreement.

[3] The defendants had no legal right to prevent her from so paying the money to be paid as the condition on which the bank was to deliver to her the deed in escrow, nor to refuse to accept said money at the time it was paid, and the act of defendants in paying the note to the Savings Society, under the circumstances, could not have the effect of impairing her rights under the agreement of option in the least. She paid an enormous sum ($1,000) for the mere right to accept or reject the offer by defendant to sell the property to her, and we cannot conceive how, under the circumstances, a court of equity could be expected to sustain the defendants in the claim, if, indeed, they seriously make it here, that, because of an unnecessary act of their own, and unbeknown to plaintiff and evidently prompted by some reason which, though not made clearly to appear, we feel free to conjecture is not in harmony with the principles of equity, the plaintiff forfeited her right to purchase the property in dispute. The moment she paid the money to the bank she thus exercised her right to purchase the property, and, as stated, no prior act or acts of the defendant, particularly any act done clandestinely, so far as she was concerned, could affect her right to buy the property in any degree whatsoever.

But even if the evidence to which we have particularly referred still leaves shrouded in some doubt whether the transaction, as finally consummated, involved a contract of sale, the admissions of defendant J. C. Young and his counsel will readily dispel such doubt.

In one of his letters to Miss Kaufman, J. C. Young not only called her attention to payments that were due on the purchase price, but referred to her default in the payment of a certain installment to the Savings Society, saying, among other things, that he would excuse said default, but would expect a prompt payment on a certain near day in the future. Furthermore, counsel for appellants, in the concluding paragraph of his opening brief, uses the following language: "In closing, appellants desire to say only this: That the evidence is undisputed that plaintiff purchased the property for the sum of $6,000," etc. As declared in the outset of this discussion, there can be no doubt that from the entire evidence, of which we have presented herein a comprehensive synopsis, the court was justified in concluding (there are no findings) that plaintiff accepted and exercised the right given her by the agreement of option to buy the property, and that the contract thus evolved from the original transaction is one that could have been specifically enforced at the suit of either party.

2. We know of no just principle by which appellants can sustain their contention that the money due from and paid by the insurance company upon the policy underwritten on the building on the premises involved in this controversy should inure wholly to their benefit and not to that of plaintiff. Said building, it will be recalled, was destroyed by fire after the plaintiff and defendants had entered into the contract of option, and subsequently to the execution and delivery to the Crocker-Woolworth Bank of the deed in escrow. The argument advanced in support of this proposition is that, the policy not having been transferred or assigned to the plaintiff, the money due thereunder, upon the destruction of the building, cannot be claimed by her, but was the property of the defendants. In order to vest her with any interest in or right to said money, or to have it credited for her benefit on the note held by the Savings Society, so the argument goes, the policy must necessarily have previously been assigned to her by the defendants. It may first be said in reply to this proposition that the defendants, having, previously to the fire, assigned the policy of insurance to the Savings & Loan Society as additional (to the deed of trust) security for the loan by said society to defendants, were without any legal power to assign said policy to plaintiff. The habendum clause of the deed in escrow, it will be remembered, reads: "To have and to hold, all and singular, the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns forever, subject to a certain deed of trust from John Crosby Young and Josephine M. Young to Arthur A. Smith and Wm. B. Dunning, trustees Savings and Loan Society, dated Feb'y 1, 1904." Said clause in said deed and the agreement of option must be construed together, and, so construing them, it is idle to argue that the intention and understanding of the parties was not that plaintiff was to assume, and that she did not, by virtue of such understanding, assume the extinguishment of the obligation of the defendants to the Savings & Loan Society. The agreement of option specifically points out all the payments by installments, including the payment of the note held by the Savings Society, that were required to be made by plaintiff until the full purchase price should have been paid.

The clause quoted from the deed in escrow, viewed by the light of said option, simply and plainly means that the plaintiff bought the property from the defendants subject to the right of the Savings & Loan Society to enforce the collection of its note executed to it by the defendants by the sale of the property, if necessary, and, if the insured portion of the property was destroyed by fire before the payment of the note, by the application of the money derived from the insurance company on said policy to the indebtedness. There must be, of course, some competent evidence clearly showing that plaintiff assumed the indebtedness of defendants to the Savings Society, and it may be that, had the contract of sale been evidenced only by the deed in escrow, no other writing as to the terms of the sale having been made by the parties, the mere language of the clause of said deed, "subject to a certain deed of trust," etc., might be held to be insufficient to bind the plaintiff to the payment of the debt secured by the deed of trust.

[4] But such is not the case here. As seen, the writings constituting the transaction by which the sale of the property was consummated very clearly and unequivocally show that the plaintiff, as a part of the consideration or purchase price, assumed the indebtedness of defendants to the Savings Society.

[5] By the agreement of sale plaintiff acquired an equitable title to the property and with such title she necessarily acquired an equitable interest in the insurance policy—that is to say, the policy having been assigned or made payable to the Savings Society as security for the obligation which she had agreed to assume and extinguish, she, upon purchasing the property, thus acquired the right to have the money derived from said policy, in case of the destruction by fire of the building upon which it was underwritten, applied, for her benefit, upon the obligation so assumed. The rule as thus stated is expressly recognized by the very case cited by appellants (Gilbert and Ives v. Port, 28 Ohio St. 296 et seq.), wherein the following statement of the rule by Sugden on Vendors (8 Am. Ed.) 291, c. 7, § 2, is approved: "A vendee, being the equitable owner of the estate from the time of the contract of sale, must pay the consideration for it, although the estate itself be destroyed between the agreement and the conveyance; and, on the other hand, he will be entitled to any benefit which may accrue to the estate in the interim, although this was not always the rule. But, now, if after the contract, and before the conveyance, the houses were burned down, the loss will fall upon the purchaser, although the houses were insured at the time of the agreement for sale, and the vendor permitted the insurance to expire without giving the notice to the vendee." And the Ohio court, in the case mentioned, concludes from all the authorities and upon principle that "the vendee, because he is the equitable owner, and, as such, is compelled to sustain the loss, occurring after the sale and before the conveyance, is entitled to any benefit that may accrue to the estate."

We are not unmindful of the cases that hold that, where property upon which insurance has been placed to indemnify the owner or other interested person against loss by fire has been transferred by the owner to another party, and the policy of insurance has not been assigned by the grantor or person for whose sole indemnity it has been issued, to the grantee, or has been assigned to the latter without the consent of the insurer, in violation of a covenant in the contract against the assignment thereof without the permission or assent of the insurer, such policy is void, and, in case of loss, cannot be enforced against the insurance company. The principle underlying those decisions is obviously that a contract of insurance is a personal one between the insurer and the insured, or, as it is stated in Wilson v. Hill, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 68, cited here by appellants, "an insurance of buildings against loss by fire, although in popular language it may be called an insurance of an estate is, in effect, a contract of indemnity, with an owner, or other person having an interest in the preservation of the buildings, as mortgagee, tenant, or otherwise, to indemnify him against any loss which he may sustain, in case they are destroyed or damaged by fire." But manifestly this case does not come within that class of cases. The policy here, as has been seen, was by its own terms and under the agreement between said society and the defendants, made payable, in case of the destruction of the building by fire, to the Savings Society, for the sole purpose of extinguishing or reducing a debt which the plaintiff, under her agreement with defendants and with the knowledge and consent of the creditor, had assumed and agreed to pay. She was, as declared, the equitable owner of the property and in possession thereof. Had the building, uninsured, or insured and the policy assigned neither to her nor to one acting, in effect, so far as the policy was concerned, as her trustee, or assigned without the consent of the insurer, been destroyed by fire, the loss, as is true under the present circumstances would have fallen on her, and the defendants could have specifically enforced the contract of sale just as they could have done had the building not been destroyed. In brief, it was her property until her equitable title was defeated by the non-performance of the conditions upon which she purchased it.

3. We think the court was right in disallowing defendants a vendor's lien on the property concerned here to secure the payment of the $1,110, which was the balance due the Savings Society on the purchase price and which the defendant John C. Young paid to the Savings Society after the collection of the money on the insurance policy. The claim of defendant is based on section 3046 of the Civil Code which provides that "one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer."

The evidence discloses that the payment by the defendant John C. Young of the balance due the Savings & Loan Society after the money derived from the insurance policy had been received by said society and credited on the note held by it against the defendants was purely the voluntary act of said John C. Young. There is no evidence which shows, or even tends to show, that the Savings Society had made a demand either on the plaintiff or the defendants for the payment of said balance. Indeed, the defendant John C. Young himself testified that the Savings Society had made no call for a settlement of the balance remaining unpaid on said note. The mortgage (trust deed), having been given to secure the payment on a sum largely in excess of the balance due on the note (the note was then past due), was presumably sufficient to secure the payment of such balance, and, while we are not to be understood as holding that the defendants had no legal right to redeem the property, the note having passed the date of its maturity (section 2903, Civ. Code), nor as holding that the Savings Society could not have demanded its payment at and before the time it was fully paid by defendants, assuming that the time for its payment had not been extended by the agreement of the society, still it is plainly manifest from the evidence that there was no actual necessity for the payment of the unpaid balance of said note at the time said balance was paid by the defendants. But, as a matter of fact, it appears that the Savings Society had agreed to allow the note to remain in their hands and the payments thereon to be made according to the terms and conditions of the original agreement. There is, however, no showing by the pleadings—either the complaint or the answer—that a deficiency judgment might or would probably follow a sale of the property to satisfy the note (Lake v. Tebbitts, 56 Cal. 481), and all that the defendant accomplished by the payment of the balance remaining unpaid on the note was to remove a lien amply sufficient to secure its payment. We have little doubt that the motive which inspired the defendant John C. Young to take up the note after the insurance money had been credited thereon and the debt evidenced thereby greatly reduced was a belief entertained by him that such action on his part might by some nicely drawn refinement have the effect of strengthening his position that the insurance policy would be made to inure solely to his benefit. But, whatever the motive, having by their own voluntary and unnecessary act brought about the untoward situation in which they now find themselves as to the balance due on said note, the defendants ought not in our opinion be aided by a court of equity in relieving them of such situation or be permitted to avail themselves of the provisions of section 3046 of the Civil Code.

[6] But, without deciding whether, under such circumstances, said section of the Civil Code is applicable, we think defendants were properly and justly disallowed a vendor's lien by the court because of their unqualified refusal to accept, after they had taken up the note held by the Savings Society, the tender and offer by plaintiff to pay the installments, and, finally, to make a full and complete settlement with defendants of the amount due on the whole transaction after deducting the sum represented by the money received on the insurance policy and credited on said note. The defendant John C. Young admitted that the plaintiff offered to pay to him the installments that came due on said note after he had taken it up, and that at last she offered to pay and tendered to him the full sum of $1,110 which he had paid to extinguish the obligation arising thereunder to the Savings Society. As stated, he refused these tenders, and, we think, ought to be held to have thereby waived any right, if any he might otherwise have had or could have claimed to a vendor's lien. "While a valid tender of the amount of a debt and a refusal of the money by the creditor do not have the effect of discharging the indebtedness, it is well settled that the tender is equivalent to payment as to all things which are incidental and accessorial to the debt. The creditor by refusing to accept does not forfeit his right to the thing tendered, but he does lose all collateral benefits and securities." 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 12, and cases cited in the footnote thereof; Tiffany v. St. John, 65 N. Y. 314, 22 Am. Rep. 612.

If it may transpire, although we have no occasion to so declare here, that the defendants have lost any legal remedy to which they might have resorted for the recovery of any just claim they may have against plaintiff, by reason of the payment by them of the balance remaining unpaid on the note which she promised to pay, the fault lies with defendants themselves. They forfeited their chance or opportunity to be reimbursed for said payment by their refusal to accept reimbursement tendered to them by plaintiff before this action was instituted. Neither law nor equity can have much, if any, patience with a litigant, appealing for the assistance of either, who has deliberately refused an amicable tender of the right to which he subsequently asks the courts to restore him; and particularly should this view prevail where the refusal was, as was evidently the fact in the case at bar, prompted by no other motive than to secure more, manifestly, than was justly, equitably and in good conscience such litigant's due.

4. We find nothing in the court's rulings admitting certain evidence, to which exceptions were taken at the trial and of which complaint is made here, which could have prejudiced the rights of the defendants in any degree, even if it may be assumed that some of them were not, strictly viewing them, correct.

We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. JACOBS. (Cr. 195.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 20, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The questions of fact are for the jury, so that its determinations are not reviewable, notwithstanding certain statements of the prosecuting witness are contradictory and others recount matters highly improbable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074-3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction embodying statements with reference to the testimony of a particular witness, being covered by a general instruction, previously given, as to the right of the jury to disregard the whole uncorroborated testimony of any witness whom they believed had testified falsely, is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

3. RAPE (§ 49*)—STATUTORY RAPE—EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO MAKE COMPLAINT.

That prosecutrix in statutory rape made no complaint is not a circumstance defendant is entitled to have considered as showing improbability of the commission of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 70; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

4. RAPE (§ 44*)—STATUTORY RAPE—EVIDENCE—PRIOR ACTS.

Evidence of prior acts of intercourse between the parties is admissible on a prosecution for statutory rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George R. Davis, Judge.

W. H. Jacobs was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Holley, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of rape, the prosecuting witness being under the age of consent. From the judgment defendant appeals.

[1] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the crime and defendant's connection therewith was not established. The evidence of the prosecuting witness, read in connection with that of a physician, warranted the jury in its verdict. While certain statements of the prosecuting witness were contradictory and others recounted matters highly improbable, nevertheless the questions of fact were for the jury, and with its determination we must remain content.

[2] The court properly refused an instruction embodying statements with reference to the evidence of a particular witness. It had already given a general instruction as to the right of the jury to disregard the whole uncorroborated testimony of any witness whom they believed had testified falsely. This covered the ground and embraced all that defendant was entitled to in the premises.

[3] The court did not err in refusing an instruction to the effect that opportunity to make complaint to the mother and failure to do so for an unreasonable time, where no threat was shown by defendant, was a circumstance to be considered as tending to show the improbability of the commission of the offense. The admission of evidence tending to show statements concerning the outrage made at the first opportunity, where the victim was of consent age, has always been permitted as tending to show that she was an unwilling victim, and has been regarded as original evidence; and the fact that no outcry was made when other parties were known to be near, or no complaint made, has been received in evidence and regarded as a circumstance proper to be shown as affecting the question of willingness or unwillingness upon the part of the victim. In cases, however, where the willingness of the prosecuting witness is immaterial by reason of inability to consent, the matters involved in outcry or complaint have no significance. Neither was there error in refusing the fourth instruction offered by defendant; there being no evidence presented warranting the same.

[4] Evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse between the parties prior to the date set out in the information was admissible as tending to prove the main allegation. People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 12, 65 Pac. 13; People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 625, 76 Pac. 500.

We see no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 956*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—TIME TO SERVE.

The appellate court cannot interfere with the trial court's action in denying a motion for relief from failure to serve a bill of exceptions within the required time on the ground of excusable neglect, unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by P. G. Sheehy against W. E. Minaker and another. From an order denying a motion for relief from failure to serve a bill of exceptions, one of defendants appeals. Affirmed.

Jordan, Rowe & Brann and P. E. Zabala, for appellant. Sheehy & Hudson, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying appellant's motion, made under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to be relieved from plaintiff's objection that appellant's proposed bill of exceptions was not served in due time. The particular ground for relief relied on is that the bill was not served in due time because of excusable neglect on the part of appellant's attorneys.

The record before us shows that after the expiration of the time allowed by law, and the full extension thereof allowed by the judge of the court, the time for serving the bill of exceptions was extended by stipulation to the 1st day of September, 1909. This stipulation was filed August 10, 1909. The reporter's transcript of the proceedings upon the trial was placed in the hands of Mr. Zabala, one of the attorneys for the appellant, on August 4th, but the preparation of the bill was not commenced until September 4, 1909. It was completed on September 6th, and was on September 20th placed in the hands of Mr. Hudson, one of the attorneys for respondent. Its settlement was promptly objected to for the reason that it was not served in due time. A motion was made by appellant to be relieved from the objection. Affidavits were presented and read upon the motion, and the motion denied.

[1] Appellant very candidly and correctly concedes at the outset that this court cannot interfere with the action of the trial court unless it clearly appear that the denial of the motion was an abuse of discretion. Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165. After a careful examination of the record before us, we are unable to say that it clearly appears that the trial court in its action denying the motion abused its discretion. Appellant's attorneys in the action were Jordan, Rowe & Brann, of San Francisco, and P. E. Zabala, of Salinas. The attorneys for respondent were Sheehy and Hudson, the first of Watsonville, and the second of Monterey. Sheehy is also the plaintiff. It appears without dispute that at the trial appellant was represented by Mr. Zabala and Mr. Brann, while respondent, P. G. Sheehy, appeared in his own behalf.

It was agreed between Mr. Zabala and Mr. Brann that Mr. Brann should prepare the bill of exceptions. Mr. Brann, however, left the city and county of San Francisco, where his offices were situated, on the 4th day of August, 1909, for a vacation, and did not return from his vacation until the evening of August 30th, and did not reach his offices until the morning of August 31st. From that time until September 4th he was engaged in the trial of another action. The reporter's transcript of the testimony had been forwarded from Salinas to Messrs. Jordan, Rowe & Brann August 4th, with a note from Mr. Zabala addressed to the firm, informing them that "Mr. Sheehy has kindly consented to give us until the 1st of September. He privately assured me that he might extend the time if necessary." Mr. Brann states in his affidavit "that the reason why he did not prepare it [the bill of exceptions] during the month of August, 1909, was that affiant was absent from the city and county of San Francisco on his said vacation." Mr. Zabala states in his affidavit that he arranged for the stipulation extending the time to September 1st with Mr. Sheehy, who at that time assured him that he would give additional time, and that he, Mr. Zabala, told Mr. Sheehy that Mr. Brann was going to be absent during the month of August on his vacation, and that said Sheehy then promised affiant additional time. On the 27th day of August, upon request from Messrs. Jordan, Rowe & Brann, Mr. Zabala attempted to telephone to Mr. Sheehy at Watsonville to request further time, but could not get him on the telephone; that he again, before the 1st day of September, tried to communicate with Mr. Sheehy over the telephone with the same result. During all of this time and until the 20th day of September Mr. Zabala was engaged in a trial for murder at Salinas. The affidavit of Mr. Zabala further states "that affiant, after his second attempt to get Mr. Sheehy over the telephone, and remembering that Mr. Sheehy had verbally promised him that he would extend said time further, and relying upon the same, and because of his engagements in said murder trial as aforesaid, made no further effort to get said time extended until the 3d day of September, 1909." On the other hand, Mr. Sheehy, in his affidavit states that when Mr. Zabala, early in August, applied to him for an extension of time in which to serve appellant's proposed bill of exceptions, he, Zabala, wished the time extended to October 1, 1909, but that he, Sheehy, refused to extend the time any further than September 1, 1909, and accordingly signed the stipulation extending the time to September 1st. The conversation was over the telephone, and the stipulation subsequently sent by mail.

Other matters are stated both in the affidavit of Mr. Sheehy and Mr. Hudson, tending to show that no promise to give additional time was ever made. The determination of the facts upon this conflict of evidence was entirely for the trial court.

[2] In support of the action of the trial court, we must assume that it took the view of the facts most favorable to the contention of respondent; in other words, that it believed that no such promise was made to extend the time beyond September 1, 1909. The reason why the bill was not prepared during August was that Mr. Brann, one of the four attorneys for appellant, was absent on his vacation.

[3] Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that it clearly appears that the trial court abused its discretion in denying appellant's motion.

The order is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1911.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 185*) — PAYMENT—DEFAULT.

Findings of the trial court in an interpleader by an insurance company to compel claimants to an amount due from it under a policy of insurance to interplead that the defendant, to whom the policy was issued, and another person, had previously entered into an executory contract for the purchase of the premises insured, to be held by cotenancy, and that, after certain payments were made, the other cotenant abandoned the contract and the premises in so far as he could, and that, after default in payments, the vendor with knowledge of all these facts accepted payments to a full amount from the remaining cotenant with knowledge of her intention to acquire the land as her individual property, justified conclusions that the default in payment operated ipso facto as a forfeiture of the vendee's rights under the contract, and that thereafter the acts and conduct of the vendor and the remaining party making the payments were such as to establish an implied agreement to sell and to purchase the land on the same terms as those of the contract of sale.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION—FINDINGS OF COURT.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case or other authorized method of bringing up the evidence, this court will presume that the findings are sufficiently supported, and this is equally so where the trial court files a written opinion in which it presents and discusses some of the facts which the evidence has established.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Interpleader by the Northern Assurance Company of London, a corporation, to compel Martha Stout, the Cramer Meat & Packing Company, a corporation, and others, to interplead their claims to an amount due from complainant under a policy of insurance issued by it to defendant Stout. Judgment for defendant Stout, and defendant the Cramer Meat & Packing Company appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman and Charles L. Donohoe, for appellant. Ben F. Geis, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Cramer Meat & Packing Company from the judgment on the judgment roll alone. The complaint was filed by plaintiff to compel the defendants above named to interplead their alleged respective rights to the sum of $400 which was due from plaintiff on a policy of insurance issued by it to the defendant Martha Stout, and underwritten on a building erected by her on a certain lot situated in Hamilton City, Glenn county, said building having been, after the issuance of said policy, destroyed by fire.

The facts, as adopted from the findings of the court, are these: On the 18th day of June, 1906, the Hamilton Land Company and one Joseph Dineen and the defendant Martha A. Stout entered into a contract in writing by which the first named agreed to sell said Dineen & Stout, and the latter agreed to purchase, a certain lot situated in said Hamilton City. The purchase price of said lot was $300, of which the sum of $50 was paid on the date of the execution of the agreement, and by the terms of said instrument the balance was to be paid in "twenty-five equal monthly installments on or before twenty-five months from date hereof, with interest thereon from date until paid, at the rate of five per cent. per annum." The second parties were to have possession of said premises from the date of the agreement and "to pay all taxes and assessments levied or assessed on said land after the date hereof as they become due and payable." The contract further provides: "Time is the essence of this contract, and the balance of the purchase price must be paid as it becomes due, and should second parties fail to make any payment at the time stipulated, then this contract is to be deemed canceled and of no effect, and first party may enter and take possession of said premises as if this contract had never been made, and all moneys paid prior to the time of said failure shall belong to first party and be deemed the amount due as rentals for the use of said property." It is then provided that when said land is paid for in full, according to the terms of said agreement, the first party will execute and deliver to the second parties "a good and sufficient deed conveying said land free from all incumbrances."

The findings further show: "The said Dineen & Stout took possession of said lot immediately upon the delivery of said contract, and began the erection of a building thereon, and it was their intention to conduct a restaurant in the building to be erected thereon, or in a part thereof as partners, and to that end a few hundred dollars was deposited in the partnership name of Dineen & Stout in a bank in Chico, California, and the partnership contracted a number of debts under the firm name, among them being the judgments hereinbefore described, but the said lot was not a part of the partnership property, but the said Dineen & Stout took said property as tenants in common. On July 11, 1906, Mrs. Stout and her family were sleeping on said lot and had partially moved into the building then in course of construction thereon; and on that day, and before any of said deferred payments had been made, said Dineen abandoned said property and said contract, and secretly left this part of the state of California for parts unknown, taking with him all of the partnership funds on deposit as aforesaid, amounting to about $350, and since the departure of said Dineen as aforesaid he has never asserted any interest in or claim to said property or said contract, nor made or offered to make any payments on said contract, nor has he returned to this part of the state. After the departure of said Dineen and before any of the deferred payments had been made as provided in the contract, and before any of the payments hereinafter set forth had been made, defendant Stout and said Howe, the agent of the land company, who had full knowledge of the foregoing facts, discussed between themselves the advisability of allowing the said contract to lapse by forfeiture by nonpayment of the installments remaining unpaid, to the end that Mrs. Stout might then acquire the property in her individual right, but no agreement was made to that effect, and neither the defendant Dineen nor the defendant Stout paid the first monthly installment within the time provided by the contract. That thereafter, on the 24th day of July, 1906, for the purpose of acquiring said property in her individual right and with the belief that her and said Dineen's rights under said contract were forfeited and that she could so acquire the legal title thereto, all of which was then and at all times since known to said land company, defendant Stout paid said land company $10 toward the purchase of said property, and thereafter continued to make monthly payments of $10 each until said property was fully paid for, and the said land company, with full knowledge of all of the aforesaid facts, accepted all of said payments and credited them on the original contract, and on the 18th day of July, 1908, indorsed the said contract as paid in full.

"The account on said land company's books respecting these payments was carried throughout the whole time covered by said payments in the name of Dineen & Stout, but the defendant Stout did not consent to or have knowledge of the fact that said account was so kept, and, after all payments had been made as aforesaid, defendant Stout demanded a deed from said land company conveying said property to her, but the land company refused to comply with her demand on the ground that the contract was made in the name of Dineen as well as in the name of the defendant Stout. On September 25, 1906, while said building was in course of construction but not fully completed, defendant Stout was residing therein with her family and occupying the same as the home of herself and family, at which time she had made three monthly payments of $10 each toward the purchase price of said lot as aforesaid, said defendant Stout duly executed and acknowledged according to law and filed with the county recorder of Glenn county her declaration of homestead."

On the 31st day of October, 1906, the plaintiff executed to said Martha Stout its policy of insurance, to which we have hitherto referred, "whereby it insured her for a term of one year from said date against all the loss or damage by fire to an amount not exceeding $400, covering a dwelling house' situated on the lot involved in this controversy. On the 19th day of September, 1907, said dwelling was destroyed by fire, and "thereafter said Martha Stout duly presented and filed with plaintiff her proof of loss under said policy, duly verified, for the full amount thereof." On the 25th day of April, 1907, and the 27th day of April, 1907, respectively, the defendants Hamilton Mercantile Company and Cramer Meat & Packing Company obtained judgments in the justice court of the Second judicial district of Glenn county against Joseph Dineen and Martha A. Stout, the first named for the sum of $213.82, with interest, etc., and costs then amounting to the sum of $29.80, and the last named for the sum of $123.85, with interest, etc., and costs then amounting to the sum of $30.40. On October 5, 1907, executions were issued upon said judgments in said actions, and each was regularly served as a garnishment upon the plaintiff of the money due upon the said insurance policy issued to said Martha Stout and underwritten upon the dwelling erected upon the land in question by Dineen & Stout.

Upon the facts as found by the court and as briefly presented in the foregoing statement, the sole question submitted here for determination is as to the validity of the alleged declaration of homestead filed upon the premises concerned in this action by Martha Stout.

The contention of the appellant Cramer Meat & Packing Company is that the land company waived the forfeiture of the contract and the rights of Dineen & Stout occurring by virtue of the default in the payment as prescribed by the contract of sale; that the payments were made by Stout and accepted by said company and the installments so paid credited on said contract in execution of its terms; and that no implied contract of sale between said company and Martha Stout could under such circumstances have arisen. But in a well-considered written opinion filed herein by the learned trial judge, Hon. Wm. M. Finch, the greater part of which opinion is set forth in the brief of respondent, he holds that, as time for the payment of the installments is expressly made by the contract of the essence thereof, the default on the part of Dineen & Stout in the payment of a certain installment, as called for by said contract, operated ipso facto as a forfeiture of the same and of the rights of the vendees thereunder; that thereafter the acts and conduct of the land company and Mrs. Stout with respect to the property, as disclosed by the evidence, were such as to establish an implied agreement upon the part of the former to sell said property to Mrs. Stout in her individual right and an agreement upon her part to so purchase the same on the terms disclosed in the former agreement to which she was a party.

[1] Unless we can say that the court's conclusions of law from the findings are erroneous or not in accord with the findings, the judgment cannot be disturbed. We perceive no inconsistency between the findings and the conclusions of law. To the contrary, no other just conclusions could well follow the findings.

[2, 3] As to the latter, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, or a statement of the case or other authorized method of bringing up the evidence, this court must assume that the findings are sufficiently supported. And this proposition is equally true where the trial court, as here, has filed a written opinion in which it has presented and discussed some of the facts which the evidence has established, for obviously the opinion of the court, however elaborately it may purport to deal with the facts, cannot supplant or be made to serve the purpose of a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case or any other recognized form of certifying the testimony to a court of appeal, and consequently cannot disturb in the slightest degree the presumption that must be indulged in favor of the findings where the appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. We could therefore, if we so desired, well rest the decision of this case on the findings and the judgment. But we are satisfied with the opinion of the trial judge stating and applying the law to the facts as found, and we shall therefore adopt from said opinion, as it appears in the brief of respondent, the following part thereof:

"In the making of the contract the land company was represented by Reuben Howe, who is admitted to have been the agent of the company. The said purchasers took possession of the lot, and began the erection of a building thereon. It was their intention to conduct a restaurant in the building as partners, and to that end a few hundred dollars was deposited in the partnership name of Dineen & Stout, all of which Mrs. Stout testifies belonged to her. The contract for the purchase of the premises in question was not made in the partnership name, but the second parties took the property as cotenants. On July 11, 1906, Mrs. Stout and her family were sleeping on the lot and had partially moved into the building then in course of construction; and on that day, and before any of the deferred payments had been made, Dineen abandoned the property and secretly left this part of the state, taking with him all of the partnership funds on deposit, some $350.

"After the departure of Dineen, Mrs. Stout and Mr. Howe, the agent of the vendor, had a conversation as to the advisability of letting the contract lapse by forfeiture for non-payment, to the end that Mrs. Stout might then acquire the property in her own name. Neither of the second parties paid the first monthly installment within the time provided by the contract, but on the 24th of July, 1906, Mrs. Stout paid the land company $10. Thereafter Mrs. Stout continued to make monthly payments of $10 on or before the 18th of each month, except that the payment for the month of April following was made on the 19th, and the company credited these payments on the contract, and on July 18, 1908, indorsed the contract as paid in full. We here insert the finding upon this question, which is as follows: 'That thereafter, on the 24th day of July, 1906, for the purpose of acquiring said property in her individual right and with the belief that her and said Dineen's rights under said contract were forfeited and that she could so acquire the legal title thereto, all of which was then and at all times since known to said land company, defendant Stout paid said land company $10 toward the purchase of said property, and thereafter continued to make monthly payments of $10 until said property was fully paid for; and the said company, with full knowledge of all the aforesaid facts, accepted all of said payments and credited them on the original contract, and on the 18th day of July indorsed the said contract as paid in full.' On the 25th of September, 1906, at which time the building was not fully completed, but Mrs. Stout was living therein with her family, and she heretofore having made three monthly payments of $10 each, she executed and filed with the county recorder her declaration in due form claiming the premises as a homestead.

"The account on the land company's books was carried throughout the whole time in the name of Dineen & Stout, but it does not appear that Mrs. Stout consented to or had any knowledge of how the account was kept. After all payments were made Mrs. Stout demanded a deed of the property to her and the company refused on account of the fact that the contract was in the name of Dineen as well as Mrs. Stout. Dineen has never since his departure asserted any interest in the property, or made or offered to make any payments on the contract, nor has he returned to this part of the state. Mrs. Stout insured the building with the plaintiff, and it was thereafter burned. Certain judgment creditors hereinbefore referred to levied upon the proceeds of the insurance in the hands of the plaintiff, and, since Mrs. Stout also claimed the same money, the plaintiff brought this action to have it determined to whom the money should be paid, making all of the claimants defendants. At the trial it was stipulated by the parties that the court should determine the sole question of the validity of the alleged homestead, and render judgment for Mrs. Stout, if the homestead was found to be valid, and otherwise for the other defendants.

[4] "The authorities are uniform that one who holds possession of land under an executory contract of purchase may declare a valid homestead therein.

[5] "The decisions in this state are equally uniform in holding that a valid homestead cannot be created in lands held in cotenancy. The important question, then, is whether Mrs. Stout and Mr. Dineen were cotenants when the declaration of homestead was made. There can be no doubt that from the date of the contract of purchase to the departure of Dineen they were tenants in common of the property, and the question is whether there was a severance of such cotenancy. The only rational conclusion to be drawn from the conduct of Dineen under all the circumstances of the case is that he intentionally abandoned the contract and the premises. In determining his intention in leaving, the court may consider all of his subsequent acts and omissions as well as the circumstances under which he left; not that a subsequently formed intent can in any manner qualify the act of leaving, but his subsequent conduct may be looked to in ascertaining what his intent was at the time he left.

[6] "In so far as Dineen was able to do so he abandoned his rights in the premises. Could he divest his title by mere abandonment? It seems clear that title in fee cannot be so divested. Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597. It is equally clear that title by naked possession can be so divested. Gluckauf v. Reed, 22 Cal. 469; St. John v. Kidd, 26 Cal. 264; McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31.

"Title under an executory contract of purchase not being dependent upon the fact of possession, it is at least doubtful whether under the circumstances of this case Dineen could divest himself of title by mere abandonment, independent of any question of estoppel, adverse possession or forfeiture. Then as to forfeiture:

[7] "By the terms of the contract, time of payment is made of the essence thereof, and failure to make payment at the time provided worked a forfeiture without the necessity of the vendor's indicating its election to claim a forfeiture, and the effect of such forfeiture was to nullify the agreement, and the vendor was thereafter entitled to act as if the contract had not existed. 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 683.

[8] "Thereafter, of course, the vendor could have waived the forfeiture, so long as the rights of third persons did not intervene, but not otherwise. 'After a forfeiture, where the vendor has resold the land, the rights of the vendee will prevent the vendor's waiving the forfeiture.' 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 685. A state may waive a forfeiture, and if, before a waiver, the state resells the land forfeited, the waiver will not have the effect to divest the rights acquired by the second purchaser. Borland v. Lewis, 43 Cal. 569. Where time is of the essence of a contract of purchase, failure to make payment at the time specified works a forfeiture. McAdams v. Felkner, 140 Cal. 354, 73 Pac. 1064. Under the facts of the case last cited, the decision supports the doctrine that after default in payment under a contract of the character of that in this case, if the vendor resells the land, the rights of the second purchaser will prevent the vendor's waiving the forfeiture.

"By nonpayment of the installment due July 18, 1906, Mrs. Stout and Mr. Dineen forfeited all their rights under the contract, and thereafter the land company was at liberty to resell the property, either to Mrs. Stout or to any other person. Had Mrs. Stout then purchased the property by agreement with the land company, after the forfeiture, in the absence of fraud, she would have taken it freed from any claim of Dineen as cotenant or otherwise. There was a severance of the cotenancy by the forfeiture. All interests were united in one person, the land company. The forfeiture was complete without the necessity of any affirmative action by the vendor, and, while the vendor might have waived the forfeiture, it did not do so. If the contract had provided for a forfeiture at the option of the vendor, and after default the vendor had declared the contract forfeited, the parties would then have been in the same position that they were after the default in this case. In either case it would still have been within the power of the vendor to waive the forfeiture, either expressly or by unequivocal acts manifesting an intention to waive it. Had the contract provided for a forfeiture, not absolutely, but only at the option of the vendor, in the event of nonpayment at the time specified, then, of course, the act of one cotenant after forfeiture and prior to the exercise of such option by the vendor would inure to the benefit of his cotenants; but, after the forfeiture is complete, then a cotenant may proceed as if the cotenancy had never existed. The principle is not unlike that involved in a redemption by a cotenant of lands sold under foreclosure. Prior to the expiration of the period allowed for redemption, the purchase of the property or its redemption by one cotenant will inure to the benefit of all, but after the period of redemption has expired either of the former cotenants may purchase the property as his own, without incurring any liability to his former cotenants.

[9, 10] "Since the knowledge of Howe, the agent, was the knowledge of the land company, it must be held that the company was aware of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction, the abandonment of the property by Dineen, the default in payment, the fact that Mrs. Stout was making the payments thereafter for herself and not for the cotenancy; and, while the company did not expressly resell the premises to her as it might lawfully have done, it did accept her payments to the full amount of the purchase price first agreed upon, with full knowledge of the facts, knowing that such payments were made by her with the intention and expectation of acquiring the premises as her individual property, and in such a case I am of the opinion that an implied contract resulted between the parties in the terms mutually understood between them, though not expressed in words.

"An implied contract may be said to exist where the intention of the parties, though not expressed in words, may be gathered from their acts, viewed in the light of surrounding circumstances. It will be implied that a party did make such agreement as under the circumstances disclosed he ought in fairness to have made. The land company having accepted payment from Mrs. Stout for the property, it ought in fairness to transfer it to her, and I do not understand that the land company is endeavoring to escape that obligation, but that in its refusal to convey to Mrs. Stout its only purpose was to be protected from any claim which Dineen might have to the property.

Mrs. Stout's tender of payment, in view of the circumstances under which it was made, must be treated as an offer to purchase the property, and the unqualified acceptance of such payment by the company was in effect an acceptance of her offer. A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting. Civ. Code, § 1589; Simmons v. Bedell, 122 Cal. 341 [55 Pac. 3, 68 Am. St. Rep. 35.]"

We think the judgment is a just one, and, for the reasons stated in the foregoing, it is affirmed.

California. June 22, 1911.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 299*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in an action involving the issue of fraudulent conveyance held to sustain a finding that the judgment debtor purchased the property with her separate funds, and took title thereto in her daughter's name with intent to defraud the judgment creditor.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 230*)—EFFECT AS TO CREDITORS.

Under Civ. Code, § 3439, declaring a transfer of property, with intent to defraud a creditor, void against the creditor, a judgment debtor having bought property with her separate funds and taken title in the name of her daughter with intent to defraud the judgment creditor, such creditor may levy on and sell the property as that of the judgment debtor.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 181*)—UNDECLARED VOLUNTARY TRUST.

There having been no declaration of a voluntary trust, duly executed, till C. delivered money to her daughter, which was after C. had become indebted to others, the fact that she had been secretly holding the money which belonged to her as heir of a decedent for her daughter, because decedent wanted the daughter to have it, gave the daughter no right thereto as beneficiary of a voluntary trust against the creditors.

4. EXECUTION (§ 288*)—RIGHTS AGAINST PURCHASER—VOLUNTARY ADVANCEMENTS.

The payment of taxes and assessment against and installments on the purchase price of property by one not the owner or claiming to be the owner thereof constitute a voluntary advancement, giving him no interest in the property as against the purchaser on execution against the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Flora K. Clifton and her husband against C. N. Herrick and another, Judgments for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, for appellants. F. C. Austin and W. P. L. Stafford, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title to real estate. Plaintiffs were husband and wife, and by a complaint in the usual form in such cases alleged that Flora K. Clifton was the owner of the property in question, and that defendant C. N. Herrick and his codefendants wrongfully and without right asserted a claim and interest therein. Defendants answered, denying Flora K. Clifton's ownership of the property, and alleged that title thereto was vested in C. N. Herrick under and by virtue of a sheriff's deed made and delivered to him by virtue of a sale under an execution issued upon a judgment against Kate Cockran, the mother of plaintiff Flora K. Clifton, who, it is alleged, purchased and paid for the property with her separate funds, and while the judgment was in force caused the same to be conveyed to plaintiff Flora K. Clifton for the purpose of defrauding the holder of the judgment.

The court, in effect, found that Flora K. Clifton was not the owner of the lot in question and had no estate or interest therein; that on October 1, 1902, and while Kate Cockran, mother of said Flora K. Clifton, was a judgment debtor of Ann Herrick, she, said Kate Cockran, with her separate funds, purchased the lot and took title thereto in the name of Flora K. Clifton with intent to defraud said Ann Herrick and hinder and delay her in the collection of said judgment so held by her against said Cockran; that thereafter Ann Herrick duly assigned said judgment to defendant C. N. Herrick, who brought suit thereon and obtained a renewal thereof, upon which an execution was issued and levy thereof made upon said lot and the same was thereafter sold to defendant C. N. Herrick, to whom, in due time, the sheriff made and delivered his deed conveying the property to said C. N. Herrick, by virtue of which he became the owner thereof in fee; that at the time of the sale under said execution said Kate Cockran, the judgment debtor, was the real owner in fee of the lot so standing in the name of Flora K. Clifton, who held the title as a secret trust for the benefit of Kate Cockran.

Upon these findings the court rendered judgment that Flora K. Clifton had no right, title or interest in the property. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellants' sole contention for a reversal is based upon the claim that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It appears that the purchase price of the lot, which was bought in October, 1902, was $2,650, of which sum $300 was paid in cash and the balance thereof paid in monthly installments of $25 each. Appellants contend that Flora K. Clifton paid this $300 out of $600 left to her by Jane Poindexter, her grandmother, that upon the purchase of the property she rented it to her parents, who paid her $20 per month rent, and this rental, plus $5 per month taken from the remainder of the $600 so left her by Poindexter, was used in making the monthly payments upon the property. There is evidence tending to show that Jane Poindexter, the mother of Kate Cockran, died intestate in 1892, leaving as her sole heir the said Kate Cockran, her daughter; that a few days after her death Kate Cockran discovered among her effects $600 in cash. No administration was had upon the estate, and it does not appear that Jane Poindexter at any time expressed any wish to Kate Cockran as to the disposition of the $600; and while the husband testified to the fact, wholly immaterial, that he heard Jane Poindexter in her lifetime say that she wanted all her property to go to Flora K. Clifton, it does not appear that he ever informed his wife of the wish so expressed. Nevertheless, Kate Cockran testifies that she regarded the money as belonging to her daughter Flora K. Clifton, and from the time of her mother's death until the daughter reached the age of 18, comprising a period of eight years, she held this $600 intact in denominations as found, and in moving from place to place kept it in her house and delivered it to her daughter on her eighteenth birthday.

Upon the purchase of the property, Kate Cockran and her husband took possession thereof, and from that time continued to occupy the same down to the date of the filing of the complaint, December 24, 1907, a period of some 62 months, the husband testifying that during said time he paid Flora K. Clifton $20 per month rent thereon, and she testifying that she used this $20, together with $5 of her own money, which included the remainder of the fund claimed to have been left by the grandmother, in payment of the monthly installments due upon the purchase price of the property. This continued to the time that Flora K. Clifton was married, during which time without, so far as disclosed by the record, the payment by her of anything on account of board or lodging. The evidence further tends to show that the negotiations for the purchase of the property were conducted by Kate Cockran, who personally made the payment of $300 thereon and at the time stated to the agent of the seller that the sum paid "represented about all she had in the world and she wanted to be careful of it," and that she stated that she was buying the property for her daughter. There was also evidence to the effect that Kate Cockran had said that she put the property in Flora's name so that Ann Herrick could not get hold of it, and that Flora should always speak of it as her property, together with other testimony of like character. We are of the opinion that this evidence is ample to support the findings.

[2] The fraudulent intent being established, the transfer of the property as against Herrick, the holder of the judgment, was void. Section 3439, Civ. Code. Being void, the property remained that of Kate Cockran, the judgment debtor, and Herrick was authorized to levy upon and sell the same as though no transfer had been attempted. 1 Freeman on Executions, § 136; Bull v. Ford, 66 Cal. 176, 4 Pac. 1175; Bekins v. Dieterle, 5 Cal. App. 690, 91 Pac. 173.

[3] It is strenuously argued by appellants that as to the $600 Kate Cockran was a self-constituted trustee for Flora K. Clifton. The record gives no support to the contention that the latter acquired this money from Jane Poindexter. Under the statute of descents and distribution, it descended to Kate Cockran subject to the right of administration of the estate of the deceased. In the absence of an exercise of such right, Kate Cockran, the sole heir, converted the same to her own use. Until the delivery of the money to her daughter, there was no declaration of a voluntary trust duly executed, as urged by appellants. Therefore the case of Estate of Webb, 49 Cal. 541, cited, has no application, and does not support appellants' contention. The money, $1,500, which forms the basis of the Herrick judgment, was borrowed from Ann Herrick in 1896. Hence it clearly appears that Kate Cockran at that time was in possession and control of this $600 and did not execute the alleged self-imposed trust until some four years after becoming indebted to Ann Herrick. The $600, like property otherwise acquired, became Kate Cockran's property and subject to the payment of her debt to Ann Herrick. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of the principle that she had no right to make either the money or the property bought therewith the subject of a gift to her daughter in fraud of her creditors. The facts here presented are substantially the same as those involved in the case of Lander v. Beers, 48 Cal. 546, wherein it was held to be the duty of a court of equity at the suit of a judgment creditor to declare the deed fraudulent and void as against such creditor.

[4] There is some evidence that after the marriage of Flora K. Clifton she and her husband contributed something towards the monthly payments on account of the purchase price of the property, as well as paid something on account of assessments and taxes, and appellants contend that, if for no other reason such payments entitled plaintiffs to some interest in the property, and for that reason a new trial should be granted. It appears from the record that only $300 of the $600 left by Jane Poindexter and converted by Kate Cockran was applied in making the initial payment upon the property, leaving, as shown by the evidence of Flora K. Clifton, the sum of $300 in her possession. This balance of $300, exclusive of interest thereon, together with the $20 per month, claimed to have been paid as rent by Kate Cockran and her husband, would constitute a fund practically sufficient in amount to cover all of the deferred payments up to the time of instituting the suit. The husband of Flora K. Clifton testifies that he paid taxes upon the property, but he does not state the amount of such taxes, and assuming that he would be entitled to an interest in the property by reason of such payment, a fact which we do not concede, nevertheless, it cannot be determined upon this record what sum he paid. We are of the opinion, however, that inasmuch as he did not own the property, nor claim to own it, the payment of taxes and assessments by him, and instalments upon the purchase price as well, must be deemed voluntary advancements under which he could be entitled to no interest in the estate itself.

The facts clearly established, together with the legitimate inferences which the court was justified in drawing from such facts (Maxson v. Llewellyn, 122 Cal. 195, 54 Pac. 732), fully support the findings, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

CREDITORS' UNION v. LUNDY. (Civ. 798.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 6, 1911.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 493*)—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—CONSIDERATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 21, making it a disputable presumption that a note was indorsed for a sufficient consideration, and Civ. Code, § 1614, providing that a written instrument is presumptive evidence of consideration, the introduction in evidence of a note assigned to plaintiff raised the presumption that it was given for a valuable consideration so as to make out a prima facie case for plaintiff, so as to place the burden of showing want of consideration upon defendant. Civ. Code, § 1615, providing that the burden of showing want of consideration to support an instrument is upon the party seeking to avoid it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1652-1662; Dec. Dig. § 493.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 96*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEW MATTER.

In an action on a note given to a nonresident life insurance company as a premium payment, the burden was upon defendant to show that the insurance company issuing the policy failed to comply with the laws relating to the transaction of insurance business in this state; that being new matter pleaded by it as a special defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-121; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 474½*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—OPINION OF AGENT.

In an action on a note given to a life insurance company, a soliciting agent of the company could not give his opinion as to whether under the circumstances stated in the application the company would have paid the policy upon defendant's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2220-2233; Dec. Dig. § 474½.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 158*)—BEST EVIDENCE—CERTIFICATE OF INCORPORATION.

A certificate of incorporation filed in the office of the Secretary of State was the best evidence of its contents as well as the best evidence of the incorporation of the company; Code Civ. Proc. § 1829, providing that a written instrument is itself the best possible evidence of its existence and contents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 510; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 28*)—DE FACTO CORPORATIONS—POWERS.

A de facto corporation could sue on a note assigned to it; Civ. Code, § 358, providing that the due incorporation of a company claiming in good faith to be a corporation and doing business as such shall not be inquired into collaterally in a private suit to which such de facto corporation may be a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 70; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 188*)—PREMIUM NOTES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action on a note executed by defendant to an insurance company for the first premium, there was evidence supporting plaintiff's theory that the negotiations for the insurance were merged into a completed and executed written contract of insurance enforceable against the company, a requested instruction by defendant requiring a verdict for defendant if there was at the beginning of the negotiations an oral agreement by the insurance company's agent that the note sued on need not be paid unless defendant finally concluded to accept the policy was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 187*)—PREMIUM NOTES—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

That insured's original application for a life policy stated that he had not paid the soliciting agent the first year's premium and the application was subsequently altered, without insured's knowledge, so as to state that the premium was paid, would not of itself authorize a verdict for insured in an action on a first-premium note given by him on the ground that no binding agreement had been executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—MODIFICATION.

There was no prejudicial error in modifying a requested instruction where the subject thereof was sufficiently covered in the court's charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Creditors' Union against A. L. Lundy. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Aitken & Aitken, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant, A. L. Lundy, made application to the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company for a policy of insurance upon his life, in the amount of $10,000, and gave his promissory note for the sum of $601.60 in payment of the first premium. The note was made payable to Clarence M. Smith, the general manager of the company, who personally paid to his principal the amount of the premium upon the issuance and delivery of the policy to the defendant. The note was subsequently assigned to the corporation plaintiff. When the note became due the defendant refused to pay it, and this action was brought to enforce payment. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict of a jury. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

As a defense to the action the defendant relied upon the absence of a consideration for the execution of the note, and also pleaded a total failure of consideration therefor if it should be found that a consideration ever existed. The defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[1] The introduction of the note in evidence as a part of the plaintiff's case carried with it the presumption that it was given for a valuable consideration (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 21; Civ. Code, § 1614), and established a prima facie case for the plaintiff. The burden of showing a want of consideration was upon the defendant. Civ. Code, § 1615.

[2] The plaintiff was not required to show as a part of its case in chief that the nonresident insurance company which issued the policy of insurance in question had theretofore complied with the existing laws governing the transaction of insurance business in this state. This was new matter pleaded by the defendant as a special defense to the action, and, assuming it to be a valid defense, the burden of proof in that behalf was upon the defendant. Coppedge v. Goetz Brewing Co., 67 Kan. 851, 73 Pac. 908; American Ins. Co. v. Smith, 73 Mo. 368; American Ins. Co. v. Cutler, 36 Mich. 261; Mason v. Edw. Thompson Co., 94 Minn. 472, 103 N. W. 507; Northrup v. Wills Lumber Co., 65 Kan. 769, 70 Pac. 879.

[3] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court sustaining plaintiff's objection to the hypothetical and speculative question put to the witness Dewey. This witness was merely a soliciting agent of the insurance company, and the question objected to called only for his conclusion based upon an assumed state of facts. Clearly the declarations of this agent as to whether in his opinion his principal under the circumstances assumed by the question would have paid the policy upon the death of the defendant could not bind his principal or the plaintiff in this case. The allegation of plaintiff's complaint that it was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state was denied by the answer of the defendant; and, in an endeavor to establish this fact the plaintiff was permitted to show that in the year 1903 it had filed articles of incorporation with the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco; that a copy thereof, certified to by the county clerk of said city and county, was forwarded to and filed in the office of the Secretary of State; and that the original articles of incorporation were destroyed by fire.

No complaint is now made of the admission of this particular testimony, but it is claimed that the court subsequently erred in allowing parol testimony of the contents of a lost or destroyed paper writing issued from the office of the Secretary of State, which acknowledged the receipt of a certified copy of the original articles of incorporation, and purported to recite and certify to the contents of the same. Although not so designated in the testimony, it is evident that the destroyed paper writing therein referred to was the certificate of incorporation required to be issued by the Secretary of State in conformity with the provisions of section 296 of the Civil Code. At the trial the defendant objected to the oral testimony of the contents of this certificate, upon the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, incompetent, and not the best evidence. The objection was overruled, and a subsequent motion to strike out denied. If the certificate of incorporation had been in existence, its production would have been primary evidence of the facts which it purported to declare and publish.

[4] In other words, the certificate itself was not only the best possible evidence of its contents (Code Civ. Proc. § 1829), but the best evidence as well of the plaintiff's incorporation (People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 183; Wall v. Mines, 130 Cal. 27, 62 Pac. 386). Upon proof of its due execution and that it was lost or destroyed, secondary evidence of its contents, by copy, or by the recital of its contents in some authentic document, or by the recollection of a witness, was admissible. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1855, 1937.

[5] Assuming, as defendant contends, that the plaintiff's case falls short of the evidence required to establish the creation of a corporation de jure, the record nevertheless discloses evidence amply sufficient to support plaintiff's existence as a de facto corporation, and as such it was entitled to maintain this action. Civ. Code. § 358; People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 530, 8 Pac. 84; First Baptist Church v. Branham Co., 90 Cal. 22, 27 Pac. 60.

[6] Complaint is made of the trial court's refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant, which required a verdict for the defendant if the jury found, as claimed by the defendant, that there was, at the inception of the negotiations for the contract of insurance, an oral agreement by the soliciting agent of the insurance company that the note in suit need not be paid when due unless the defendant then and finally concluded to accept the policy. Upon this phase of the case the evidence is in conflict, and the record further discloses that the defendant's written application for insurance was accepted and approved by the insurance company in the sum of $10,000, with a receipt acknowledging payment of the first year's premium, issued and delivered to the defendant. The instructions referred to directed a verdict for the defendant regardless of the plaintiff's theory of the case, founded upon the issues raised by the evidence, that the negotiations of the parties had been merged into a completed and executed contract of insurance expressed in writing which, in the event of the defendant's death, could have been enforced against the company, and for this reason, if for no other, the defendant's requested instructions in this behalf were rightfully refused.

[7] It appears that defendant's application for insurance as originally written contained a statement by the defendant that he had not paid the agent taking the application the first year's premium, and that the application had been subsequently and without the knowledge of the defendant altered so as to read that the said premium had been paid. This was a fact in the case which the jury might consider in arriving at a conclusion as to when the contract of insurance was completed and executed, if at all, but in and of itself it was not sufficient to justify a verdict for the defendant, and therefore the defendant's requested instruction No. 6 was properly modified by the trial court striking out that portion of the instruction which directed the jury to give a verdict for the defendant if the jury found that the defendant's application had been altered as stated.

[8] It is claimed that the trial court erred in modifying defendant's requested instruction No. 7, but the record fails to show whether the instruction was modified or refused, and, if modified, how and to what extent. In any event, the subject of this particular instruction, and of all the remaining requested instructions, was sufficiently covered in the charge of the court; and therefore, whatever the action of the court may have been in refusing or modifying the defendant's instructions it was free from error.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

McMURRAY v. BODWELL. (Civ. 805.)(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 12, 1911.)1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 100*)—FRAUD—COMPLAINT.

The complaint in an action to recover from the estate of plaintiff's daughter money which had been the community property of plaintiff and his wife, and had by the wife been saved and placed in a safety deposit box of the daughter, and on the mother's death had been appropriated by the daughter, brings the case within Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, providing that a cause of action for fraud is not deemed to have accrued till discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud, it showing that plaintiff had not known of his wife's saving the money, or of its existence, and so that the fraud was secret, the fund concealed, and that there was nothing about the transaction to excite plaintiff's suspicions, so as to make inquiry a duty.

2. WITNESSES (§ 168*)—COMPETENCY—ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—MATTERS OCCURRING BEFORE TESTATOR'S DEATH.

Plaintiff's testimony in an action against his daughter's executor on a claim against her estate for money his wife had placed in a safety deposit box, and the daughter had misappropriated after her mother's death, that it was not till after his daughter's death that he learned his wife had placed the money in the box, and that his daughter had misappropriated it, is not as to a matter occurring before the daughter's death, as to which he is by Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, declared incompetent to testify.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 249*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Money saved by a wife from a monthly household allowance is community property, in the absence of an agreement or understanding between the spouses that it was to be the wife's separate property.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 262*)—COMMUNITY OR SEPARATE PROPERTY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Defendant in an action for money saved by plaintiff's wife from her monthly household allowance, and which after her death her daughter, defendant's testator, appropriated, has the burden of proving an agreement or understanding between plaintiff and wife, that the money so saved, presumptively their community property, was to be her separate property.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 264*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action involving the question of there having been an agreement or understanding that money saved by a wife from her monthly household allowance was to be her separate property, in the absence of which it was their community property, held to sustain a finding that it was community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by John P. McMurray against Samuel P. Bodwell, executor of Eva F.

Craig, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Eisner and Harry K. Wolff, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action on a claim against an estate to recover money which it is alleged was fraudulently appropriated by the defendant's testatrix.

On October 28, 1889, Margaret McMurray died. At that time and for many years prior thereto she and the plaintiff were husband and wife, living together as such. At the time of Margaret McMurray's death the family consisted of the plaintiff, Kip McMurray, a son, and two daughters—Mrs. Eva F. Craig and Mrs. Carrie I. Barrows. Plaintiff was a contracting decorator, and he earned about $5,000 a year. It was his custom to make his wife a monthly allowance for the upkeep of the house and the support of the family. Out of this monthly payment Margaret McMurray, by doing nearly all the housework herself, was enabled to save "part of the allowance," which was regarded, so one of the witnesses testified, as separate property of Margaret McMurray by both herself and her husband. In October, 1882, Eva F. Craig rented in her own name a safe deposit box in San Francisco, to which she and her mother had exclusive access. On September 3, 1886, Margaret McMurray, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, purchased a lot of land in Berkeley out of said savings, the deed to said lot being taken in her own name. At various times during her life Margaret McMurray deposited sums of money in the said safe deposit box, which at the time of her death aggregated the sum of $1,800. About a month after her decease her two daughters, at the request of plaintiff, consented that the lot in Berkeley should go to and become the property of Kip McMurray. About this time Eva F. Craig told her sister, Carrie I. Barrows, of the existence of this $1,800, and, warning her to say nothing about the matter to any one, suggested that they divide this sum equally between them, and also agree to the plaintiff's proposal as to the disposition of the Berkeley lot, which was done. The estate of Margaret McMurray was probated, the only property accounted for being the said lot, which was treated as the separate property of the deceased. The estate being settled, Eva F. Craig delivered to Carrie I. Barrows $900 of the said deposit, and kept the remainder. The existence of this fund was not divulged to any one except to the husband of Carrie I. Barrows, who, notwithstanding that he was plaintiff's attorney in the administration of the estate of said Margaret McMurray, and was informed of the facts surrounding the accumulation of the $1,800 and its disposition, concealed them from the plaintiff. On February 20, 1900, Eva F. Craig died, leaving the whole of her estate to the defendant, to whom she was in no way related; and plaintiff now for the first time learned from Carrie I. Barrows the matters above related, and 30 days thereafter presented the claim, upon which this suit is based, against the estate of said Eva F. Craig. The present action is brought within three months after the rejection of the claim. In the trial of the cause witnesses testified that all knowledge of the $1,800 was carefully concealed from plaintiff until he was made aware of it by Carrie I. Barrows as just mentioned. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied, whereupon defendant rested without introducing any evidence. Thereafter plaintiff, in open court, waived all right to recover against the defendant a judgment exceeding $900 and interest on that sum; and judgment was accordingly rendered in the sum of $1,040.35 and costs.

This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Defendant asks for a reversal of the judgment upon three grounds: (1) That the complaint fails to state a cause of action in this, that the cause of action alleged in the complaint is barred by the provisions of subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc. (2) Error of the court in permitting certain questions to be asked of the plaintiff during the trial. (3) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the court. Of these in their order.

[1] This action was commenced 12 years after the transaction complained of; and defendant insists that the allegations of the complaint fail to bring it within the protection of subdivision 4, § 338, Code Civ. Proc. Said subdivision reads as follows: (The periods prescribed for the commencement of actions other than for the recovery of real property are as follows: Within three years.) "An action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. The cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." The allegations of the complaint bearing on this point read as follows (paragraph 10): "That all of said facts were concealed from plaintiff by said Eva F. Craig during her lifetime." (Folios 19 and 20): That plaintiff "was wholly ignorant of the existence of said money, or that said money had ever been placed or deposited by said Margaret McMurray in said safe deposit box, or that she had said money, or any part thereof, at the time of her death, or that possession of said moneys or any part thereof had been obtained, or that said moneys had been appropriated by said Eva F. Craig after the death of said Margaret McMurray. * * * That the first time that plaintiff had any knowledge or means of knowledge of such facts, or any of them, was within three months prior to the commencement of this action."

As stated in the statute, an injured party is barred unless he brings his action within three years after becoming aware of the fraud, and in this connection it is a familiar rule of law that he is deemed to have knowledge of the fraud or mistake if he had the means of knowledge, or the circumstances were such as to put a prudent man on inquiry. Archer v. Freeman, 124 Cal. 529, 57 Pac. 474. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, at section 917, after stating that the time within which to bring an action for fraud commences to run from the knowledge of the fraud, or of facts and circumstances which would impart to him knowledge, says: "To thus rule there is one limitation: It applies only when the fraud is known or ought to have been known. No lapse of time, no delay in bringing a suit, however long, will defeat the remedy, provided the injured party was during all this interval ignorant of the fraud. The duty to commence proceedings can arise only upon his discovery of the fraud; and the possible effect of his laches will begin to operate only from that time." The rule on the subject is also stated in a note to the same section.

It is very true, as contended by defendant, and as stated by Mr. Justice Shaw in the case of People v. San Joaquin, etc., Ass'n, 151 Cal. 797, 91 Pac. 740, that "it is not enough that plaintiff merely aver that he was ignorant of the facts at the time of their occurrence and has not been informed of them until within the three years. He must show that the acts of fraud were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have any knowledge of them—as that they were done in secret or were kept concealed; and he must also show the time and circumstances under which the facts constituting the fraud were brought to his knowledge, so that the court may determine whether the discovery of these facts was within the time alleged." It is clear from the facts in the case at bar that the plaintiff was wholly ignorant of this deposit of $1,800, and that he was aware at no time, until informed by Mrs. Barrows, of any circumstance that would have put a prudent man upon inquiry; and having pleaded these facts with ample sufficiency, he has, we think, brought his case within the exception to section 338, permitting an action for relief upon the ground of fraud commenced within three years after the discovery by the injured party of the facts constituting the fraud. Cases sustaining this position are Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 565, 27 Pac. 924, 25 Am. St. Rep. 219; Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 55 Pac. 759; Matthews v. Sontheimer, 39 Miss. 174; Shiels v. Nathan, 12 Cal. App. 604, 108 Pac. 34.

In the first of these cases the court held in sustaining the complaint that the plaintiff had no knowledge and no reason to suspect that fraud was being practised on him; that, therefore, there was nothing to put him upon inquiry, and under such circumstances, said the court, "we do not see that it can be said that he failed to use due diligence to detect the fraud, or how he can be presumed to have known about it." Tarke v. Bingham, supra, was an action brought to reform a mortgage in respect of a note incorrectly copied therein and made a part thereof. It was commenced more than three years after the execution of the mortgage. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations. The evidence in the case was to the effect that the plaintiff did not discover the mistake until a few days before the action was begun. The court held that the cause was not barred, saying (in the course of its opinion) "that it was not sufficient for a plaintiff in an action based upon fraud merely to plead or prove ignorance of the fraud at one time, and discovery or knowledge at another; that it was incumbent upon a pleader to show diligence and that he has not failed to avail himself of sources of information of which he had knowledge, and then proceeds: "But the converse of the proposition is equally true. Where no duty is imposed by law upon a person to make inquiry, and where under the circumstances 'a prudent man' would not be put upon inquiry, the mere fact that means of knowledge are open to a plaintiff, and he has not availed himself of them, does not debar him from relief when thereafter he shall make actual discovery. The circumstances must be such that the inquiry becomes a duty, and the failure to make it a negligent omission. In this case, though means of information were open to the plaintiff, it does not appear that there was any duty devolving upon him to make use of them. Nothing had occurred to excite his suspicion, or to put him upon inquiry, and for these reasons, under the facts of this case, we think the finding of the court sufficient and sufficiently supported by the evidence." So in the recent case of Shiels v. Nathan, supra, plaintiff and her husband by reason of differences had agreed to separate and live apart after dividing the community property. Appraisers were appointed to make a correct inventory of the property, and to divide it equally between the spouses. A division was made. Contrary to his agreement, the husband failed to notify the appraisers of the existence of certain community property, which the wife did not discover until the lapse of considerably more than three years, at which time her husband had died and she had been appointed the representative of his estate. It was held that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations, and in so holding the court said: "Accepting the settlement upon the belief that her husband had returned all the community property, she had a right to rest in that belief and was not called upon to pursue an independent search for other property." In the case at bar the fraud was secret, the fund was concealed, and there was nothing about the transaction to excite the suspicion of the plaintiff, and we think the case falls squarely within the exception contained in the statute.

[2] 2. Plaintiff was called to the stand, and, over the objection and exception of defendant, answered two questions, each of which defendant claims was concerning matters of fact occurring before the death of Eva F. Craig, and therefore, as this is an action on a claim against the estate of a decedent, the evidence elicited was, so defendant argues, inadmissible under section 1880, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc. In answer to these questions, plaintiff testified that it was not until after the death of Eva F. Craig that he learned that his wife had money placed in a safe deposit box, and that Eva F. Craig had misappropriated the same. Plaintiff's said answers related obviously to matters occurring after the death of the deceased, and hence the evidence thus adduced is not within the inhibition of the section mentioned. Cowdery v. McChesney, 124 Cal. 363, 57 Pac. 221; Corbus v. Leonhardt, 114 Fed. 10, 13, 51 C. C. A. 636; City Bank of Savings v. Enos, 135 Cal. 167, 67 Pac. 52; Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 Pac. 284, 60 Am. Rep. 539.

Defendant finally contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that Mrs. McMurray had any such sum of money as is claimed, and also that, even if there was money left by Mrs. McMurray, it was her separate estate.

The evidence is clear and uncontradicted that Margaret McMurray saved the $1,800 from money given her by plaintiff for the upkeep and support of the home and family. We also think that the evidence is amply sufficient to support the finding of the court that the money in question was community property. That Mrs. McMurray took the deed to the Berkeley lot in her own name, and that the property apparently was regarded in the probate proceedings as her separate estate, tends to prove that the lot was in fact her separate property; and if the plaintiff so regarded the lot that circumstance would tend, in some degree, as argued by defendant's counsel, to prove that all money saved by Mrs. McMurray in the manner indicated became, by the acquiescence of the husband, her separate property. But the fact that in the probate proceedings the lot was treated as her separate property is a matter of slight significance, for as, by the agreement of the plaintiff and his daughters, the lot was to go the latter's brother, it was doubtless a matter of indifference to the plaintiff whether it was regarded as the community property of himself and deceased wife, or the latter's separate estate. In any event, having no knowledge, according to the evidence, of the existence of the $1,800, any action he took with regard to the lot could have very little influence upon the character of this fund, whether community property or the separate estate of his wife. The testimony of Carrie I. Barrows that the plaintiff and his wife regarded said savings as the wife's separate property, besides being a mere conclusion of the witness, manifestly referred only to those savings of which he had knowledge; 1. e., those that went for the purchase of said lot.

[3, 4] There can be no doubt that money saved by Mrs. McMurray from the monthly household allowance was community property, unless there was an agreement or understanding between the spouses that it was to be her separate property, and the burden of proving such an understanding was on the defendant. Davis v. Green, 122 Cal. 364, 55 Pac. 9; Rowe v. Hibernia S. & L. Soc., 134 Cal. 403, 66 Pac. 569.

[5] The trial court held, in effect, that the presumption that the $1,800 was community property of both spouses was not overcome by the evidence introduced, and we think the conclusion reached by the court is both just and correct. The following cases support this view: Moseley v. Heney, 66 Cal. 478, 6 Pac. 134; Martin v. S. P. Co., 130 Cal. 285, 62 Pac. 515; Rowe v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, supra.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

FOUNTAIN et al. v. CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO. OF HARTFORD. (Civ. 625.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 3, 1910. Opinion Supplementing Order Denying Petition for Rehearing April 6, 1910.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF—DEFENSES.

The burden was upon defendant in an action on a fire policy to prove by a preponderance the affirmative defense that the building in which the insured goods were fell from an earthquake before the fire attacked the goods, so as to avoid the policy under the provision making it void in such case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1645-1658; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action on a fire policy, in which defendant claimed that a part of the building had fallen from earthquake before the fire began, held to sustain a finding that the fire attacked the insured goods before a substantial part of the building had fallen from the quake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS—CONFLICTING TESTIMONY.

The jury's finding on substantially conflicting evidence will be sustained.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 598*)—"PREPONDERANCE OF THE EVIDENCE."

Whether a fact is established by a "preponderance of the evidence" is not determined alone from the number of witnesses or by the fact that the affirmative evidence may be direct, while the negative evidence may be circumstantial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 598.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5516-5518; vol. 8, p. 7761.]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 994*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS—CREDIBILITY.

It is for the jury in the trial court to pass upon the credibility of witnesses, and draw any reasonable inferences from their testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3901-3906; Dec. Dig. § 994.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1005*)—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

After the trial court has refused to set aside a verdict as not sustained by the evidence, it is not sufficient to authorize an appellate court to set it aside that it is against the preponderance of the evidence, or that another conclusion might be justified, if there be any evidence to support it.

7. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a fire policy, providing that it should be void if any part of the building fall except as a result of fire, in which defendant claimed that a substantial part fell from earthquake before the insured goods were attacked by fire, the court instructed that the falling wall clause should not be literally understood, so as to avoid the policy if a minute part of the material in the building fell, but that it meant some substantial part, the falling of which "would destroy its distinctive character as such," so that if the front windows or part of the front wall fell, but the building was substantially standing as a building so as not to increase the risk to the goods by fire, and was burned in that condition, the clause would not exempt from liability. The court also instructed that it was not necessary that the building as a whole should fall to avoid the policy, but only a material part, and that if a part fell, and by reason thereof the contents were placed in a condition whereby they were more readily subject to fire than if such part had not fallen, the policy was void. Held, that the question whether a substantial part of the building had fallen when the fire attacked the goods was correctly submitted, the use in the first instruction of the words "destroy its distinctive character as such" not having misled the jury, when construed with the other instructions, as to what would constitute a substantial part of the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 324*)—FIRE INSURANCE—FALLEN BUILDING CLAUSES—CONSTRUCTION.

A provision in a fire policy that if the building or any part thereof fall, except as a result of fire, all insurance on the building or contents shall cease, releases the company from liability where the building falls as a structure or such a substantial part thereof falls as to impair its usefulness as a building, and leave the remaining part subject to an increased fire risk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 749; Dec. Dig. § 324.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTING TOGETHER.

Instructions should be read and considered together.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

10. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where the instructions given fairly and sufficiently presented a question involved, a requested instruction on the same subject-matter was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1070*)—HARMLESS ERROR—SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES—MATERIALITY.

In an action on a fire policy, which provided that all insurance should cease if a part of the building fall except by fire, in which defendant claimed that a material part fell from an earthquake before the fire, the jury answered, "Don't know," to interrogatories as to whether, if a part of the building fell before its destruction from a cause other than fire, its usefulness was impaired for the purpose for which it was constructed by reason of such falling, whether the falling of any such parts exposed the interior to the inclemency of the weather, and whether such falling occurred before the goods were attacked by fire. The jury had answered that the insured goods had been attacked by fire before a substantial part of the building had fallen, and that parts of the building had fallen before the building had been destroyed by fire, but that such parts were "trivial and inconsiderable." Held, in view of the questions directly answered, that the three questions not so answered were immaterial to the issue, so that failure to answer them directly did not prejudice defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1070.*]

12. INSURANCE (§ 654*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—CONDITION OF OTHER BUILDINGS.

In an action on a fire policy, which made the policy void if any part of the building fell except from the fire, in which defendant claimed that a material part fell from an earthquake before the insured goods were fired, evidence as to the effect of the earthquake upon other buildings located in the block and as to the condition of the whole block after the earthquake was properly excluded, in the absence of a showing that the construction of the other buildings was substantially similar to that of the building containing the insured goods, and that the force of the earthquake was practically uniform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1680-1685; Dec. Dig. § 654.*]

13. EVIDENCE (§ 5*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Courts cannot take judicial notice of the character of other buildings in the block with the building in which the insured goods were.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

14. EVIDENCE (§ 8*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The courts cannot take judicial notice of the fact, if so, that the great earthquake of April 18, 1906, operated with approximately the same force over the area covered by a city block.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

15. WITNESSES (§ 392*)—IMPEACHMENT—INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

Where defendant's witness, whose office was situated over the building in which the insured goods were, testified in an action on a fire policy that he was near the building a half an hour after the earthquake accompanying the fire and saw no fire in the building, plaintiff could show that he filed an affidavit with another insurance company to the effect that his office furniture was destroyed by fire on the morning referred to, Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, permitting a witness to be impeached by evidence that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1249-1251; Dec. Dig. § 392.*]

On Rehearing.

16. WITNESSES (§ 330*)—IMPEACHMENT.

A witness may be asked for purpose of impeachment any question, a favorable answer to which would tend to weaken or contradict his testimony, or destroy the harmful impression made thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1106-1108; Dec. Dig. § 330.*]

17. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1053*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Any error in admitting evidence in an action on a fire policy, in which defendant claimed that a material part of the building in which the insured goods were was destroyed by earthquake before the fire, that the building was "doomed to destruction by fire whether or not it had fallen by reason of the earthquake," was not prejudicial to defendant where the only issue was whether the fire attacked the goods before a substantial part of the building fell, and the court instructed the jury to find for defendant if it appeared that a substantial part of the building fell before the goods were attacked by the fire.

18. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Under the Constitution, an appellate court can set aside a verdict as not sustained by the evidence only where it can declare as a matter of law that it is not sufficiently supported; it not having power to require the trial judge or jury to give a certain amount of weight to the testimony of particular witnesses in preference to other testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by O. Fountain and another against the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Ware and T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. T. J. Geary, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiffs to recover upon a policy of insurance issued by the defendant and covering certain goods or merchandise contained in a certain brick building in the city of Santa Rosa, known as the "Shea Building." The complaint sets out in general terms the conditions and covenants of the policy, and alleges that on the 18th day of April, 1906, the goods upon which said policy was issued were destroyed by fire; that thereafter and in due time plaintiffs furnished the defendant with proof of their loss; and that said defendant has not paid the said loss or any part thereof, etc. The answer, in addition to denials of the material allegations of the complaint, pleads as an affirmative defense the claim that the building in which the insured goods were situated at the time of their destruction by fire, or a substantial part of said building, had before said fire had attacked the goods fallen as a result of the shock of the earthquake which occurred on said 18th day of April, 1906. This defense is founded on the following provision of the policy declared upon: "If a building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease." The cause was tried by a jury and verdict returned in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $1,000, the sum for which the policy called together with interest on said amount in the sum of $116.66. The court thereupon entered judgment for plaintiffs in conformity with the terms of said verdict. This appeal is from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Besides the general verdict, the jury returned answers to a number of particular questions of fact submitted to them by the court.

The validity of the general verdict and the answers to the particular questions of fact are assailed by the appellant upon several grounds: (1) That they are not justified by the evidence; (2) that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law; (3) that the court erred in its rulings admitting and rejecting certain testimony; (4) that the court erred in refusing to compel the jury to return definite answers to certain of the particular questions of fact submitted to them. It is further insisted that the refusal of the court to submit to the jury certain instructions proposed by the defendant involved rulings prejudicial to the defendant.

The dispute between the parties to this action is one of a number of the same kind and involving like issues of law and of fact which have found their way into the courts of this state through the earthquake and fire occurring in many of our coast cities in the month of April, 1906, and the real controversy here, around which revolve all the points upon which a reversal of the order is demanded, arises out of the question presented by the affirmative defense set up in the answer, viz., whether there had fallen prior to the time at which the fire attacked the insured merchandise a material or substantial part or parts of the building in which the plaintiff's store was situated.

[1] The burden was cast upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence the contention founded upon its affirmative defense. If the court's interpretation of the "fallen building" clause of the policy sued on, as declared in its charge to the jury, is correct, then, in our opinion, there plainly exists a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the vital point or issue tendered by the special or affirmative defense. Or, to put the proposition more accurately, assuming the court properly interpreted the clause mentioned, the defendant failed to sustain the burden cast upon it to satisfactorily prove the claim involved in its affirmative defense.

[2] We think the law of the case was well and correctly stated by the court, as we shall presently undertake to show by both reason and authority. We shall therefore first briefly examine the testimony for the purpose of showing that the most that can be claimed by the defendant in that regard is that some of its witnesses gave testimony which, had it been accepted by the jury, would undoubtedly have been sufficient to have sustained a verdict returned in harmony therewith against the power of a reviewing court to disturb it. The store in which the insured goods were situated and destroyed was a part of a building known as the "Shea Building," but sometimes referred to by the witnesses as the "Eagles' Building" and the "Fountain Building."

As already stated, a majority of the witnesses for the defendant testified to facts from which it would follow that a substantial part of the building had fallen before the fire broke out, or, at least, before there was any visible evidence of fire in the building. But, after the defendant had rested its case, the plaintiffs introduced proof which, while in its nature largely circumstantial, tended to contradict that of the defense, as will appear from the following brief reference to the testimony of witnesses testifying on behalf of plaintiff.

The witness Hahman, member of a firm engaged in business in a building adjoining the one occupied by the plaintiff Fountain, reached the block in which his and the Fountain store were located shortly after the earthquake shock was first noticed by him, and he testified in part as follows: "Our store occupied the storeroom of the Kinslow Building, adjoining the Fountain (Shea) Building. I went into the building. The main part of the store was intact. Part of the gallery was down. Our stock of goods and merchandise, as far as I could observe, was some of it shaken off the shelves, but no material damage done. As near as I can tell the west, east, and north walls of our storeroom were intact, when I went in there. I remained in our store that morning a very short time. Not over two or three minutes, I believe. I left because I was afraid the fire might catch me inside the building. I heard the crackling of the flames in the adjacent building there, the Fountain Building on the east. The noise made by the fire in the Fountain Building was sufficient to make me think my life was in danger to stay in the storeroom. I expected to see it break through our walls there at any moment. * * * It was half an hour after the earthquake that I heard the fire in the Fountain store. When I got out of my store, there were flames burning in some of the adjacent buildings. I think it was along there in the Fountain Building and the saloon adjoining. The Fountain Building and the Pohley saloon were afire at that time. * * * As near as I can remember, the back walls of the Fountain Building were intact at that time. * * * I did not pay much attention to the front walls of the buildings. There was some debris in the street."

L. W. Burris, cashier of the Santa Rosa Bank, testified: "I am the cashier of the Santa Rosa Bank. I was a member of the city government on April 18, 1906. I made an examination of the front and rear of the Fountain Building on the morning of April 18, 1906. The rear wall towards Fifth street did not seem to be damaged. The lower walls, I didn't see any trouble with them. I didn't notice any breaks in the structure of the storeroom occupied by Mr. Fountain. For the purpose of ascertaining whether there were fires in there or not, I looked into the Fountain store, and it seemed to be shook up inside, goods scattered and things of that sort. I did not see any break in the structure of the lower walls of that building."

M. G. Hall stated that within 60 seconds after the earthquake he observed a large column of smoke issuing from either the Moodey or Shea Building. (These buildings adjoined each other.) He said that when he first noticed the smoke it had arisen to a height of 75 or 100 feet. After he reached his own office, which was located near the Fountain store, he could hear the "crackling of the flames" either in said store or in the Moodey Building.

Dr. Hoffer, a dentist, had an office in the upper story of the Shea Building, over the Fountain store. Immediately after the earthquake he reached his office. He testified: "Dr. Mallory had an office right over Fountain and I had the hall opposite. Between Dr. Mallory's window and mine the brickwork was about eight or nine feet in width. My office was about 12 feet in width. The staircase between my office and Dr. Mallory's office was about five feet wide. When I got into my office the floor was intact and the floor of my office was over the ceiling of the stores below, and was not broken. I did not pay any attention to the lower story, but I think they were all right. The party walls of the Eagles' Building were up. I could not see the rear walls. The two side walls were up. The side wall on my side of the office was up, but Dr. Mallory's walls I could not see."

Mrs. Martin, who, at the time of the earthquake, lived in the Doyle & Overton Building, situated two doors from the Shea building, testified in part as follows: "The west wall of the Doyle & Overton Building constituted the east wall of the Moodey Building. A fire broke out in the Doyle & Overton Building a very short time after the earthquake, hardly an appreciable time the fire broke out. I saw fire before I got back to my office—I was right out in the hall. While the earthquake was still acting, I saw fire in the room adjoining my offices. I could not tell by seeing it through a glass door, and I broke it open and found it raging. There was gas in those offices and evidently the gas pipes had broken and something had ignited it, and it was roaring. This was within a minute after the earthquake had ceased."

From the foregoing brief review of the evidence as we find it in the record, it is very plain that there is a conflict between the testimony produced by the defendant and that of the plaintiff upon the vital point submitted as the special defense.

[3] It is true, as counsel for the appellant maintain, that witnesses introduced in behalf of the defendant testified that they were present at the scene of the fire which destroyed the building in which Fountain's store was situated immediately after the first noticeable vibration of the earth from the temblor, and that a material part of said building had fallen before the fire was observed by them. And it is also true, as we have stated, that the evidence presented by the plaintiff was largely circumstantial in character; but the circumstances to which plaintiff's witnesses testified were, in our opinion, sufficiently forceful to overcome the effect of defendant's testimony, or, at least, to create a substantial conflict upon the proposition to which the evidence for both sides was mainly addressed, which is all that was required to justify the jury's conclusion. Besides, some of defendant's own witnesses failed to fully sustain the special defense. For instance, Dr. Mallory, who had previously testified for the defense, upon being recalled for further cross-examination by plaintiff, admitted that after the fire he made an affidavit of loss and filed the same with the New Zealand Fire Insurance Company, in which he deposed that his personal property, consisting of office equipments, contained in his office situated directly over the Fountain store, had been destroyed by fire on the morning of the 18th of April, 1906. Again, the chief of the fire department of Santa Rosa, having testified as defendant's witness, made the following statements on cross-examination: "I made an examination of the buildings in the block in which the Fountain store was situated, not over 20 minutes after the earthquake and I concluded that that block was doomed by fire. Within 15 minutes after the earthquake, every building in the block was doomed, whether the earthquake touched them or not. Within 15 minutes after the earthquake I could see a blaze or two, but I could see smoke coming out of at least five or six buildings. Within 15 minutes after the earthquake there was considerable smoke coming from these buildings." This witness further testified, referring to the quantity of brick and other debris in the street directly in front of the Shea Building, that the upper front of the said building was composed of large bay windows, and that "there was not enough brick in the upper front walls of the Shea (Fountain) Building, exclusive of the fire wall, to have caused any considerable amount of brick to have fallen on the street, when the bay windows are taken out." He further stated that the fire wall constituted the largest part of the brick in front, and that "excluding that, and if you had taken every other brick in front of the Eagles' Building and dumped it on the sidewalk, it would not have been brick enough to have made any considerable pile of bricks extending out into the street. * * * The pillars (iron) that I spoke about were merely placed against the wall. When the earthquake commenced shaking, they fell away, but the wall did not fall out with them. The presence of those iron pillars in the street did not indicate the destruction of the building behind."

[4] As declared, we perceive no substantial ground upon which we would be justified in holding that the jury's verdict does not find sufficient support from the evidence. After all, the meaning of the verdict is simply that the defendant failed to establish its affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence, and, as is well understood, the question whether a fact is established by a "preponderance of the evidence" is not determinable alone from the mere number of witnesses whose testimony goes to the proof of such fact, nor is it determinable alone by the fact that the testimony addressed to the proof of the fact in dispute may be direct, while that offered to overcome it may be entirely circumstantial. There are other elements and other tests equally as important as either the fact of the number of witnesses testifying one way or the character of the testimony, whether direct or indirect, which may be considered and invoked for the purpose of determining upon which side the preponderance of the evidence prevails.

[5] "It was for the jury to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and to draw any reasonably permissible inferences from their testimony." Clayburgh v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 708, 102 Pac. 812. For aught that we can determine from the record to the contrary, the jury might have deemed the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant as entitled to no weight whatsoever. We must at least assume that they regarded it with little favor, and we must, moreover, assume that they had good and sufficient reasons for so treating it. That it was within the peculiar province of the jury to totally discard any testimony which, in their judgment, did not bear the ear-marks of verity, is a proposition which will not, of course, be challenged.

[6] It must be borne in mind that the trial judge, whose mind is trained in and accustomed to weighing testimony, declined to grant defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground, among others, of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and, as is said in the case of Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 381, 38 Pac. 82, "the refusal of the trial court to set it (the verdict) aside is itself of great weight, and shows that in the opinion of the judge who heard the case the evidence was sufficient to uphold it. It is not sufficient thereafter upon an appeal to point out, or even demonstrate to this court, that the verdict is against the preponderance of evidence, or that upon the same evidence other persons would come to a different conclusion. If there is any evidence upon which the jury could have found its verdict, it must be upheld." (Italics ours.) But no question can arise as to the rule as it is thus explained. It is too plainly elementary to require the citation of authorities for its exposition or application. The real question here is, as stated, Did the defendant support its special defense by sufficient proof to justify a verdict in its favor? To this question the answer is to be found in the verdict of the jury.

Upon the question whether a substantial conflict arises in the evidence upon the principal issue upon which the trial was had, it is important to keep in mind the testimony of the chief of the Santa Rosa fire department, brought out on his cross-examination. There was, according to his version of the situation, but little debris—brick, etc.—in front of the Shea Building immediately after the first noticeable evidence of the shock. The fire, he said, originated in all the buildings in the block in which the Shea Building was situated in the north and east ends, at which points there was, at the time he first observed the Shea Building, no evidence of any part of the structure having fallen before the fire was noticed. He could see from the front into the interior of all those buildings, including plaintiff's store, and declared that the goods appeared then to be intact on the shelves, "as though piled there yesterday." He further stated, it will be recalled, that the "upper front of the building was composed of large bay windows," and that, excluding the fire walls, "there was not enough brick in the upper front walls to have caused any considerable amount of brick to have fallen on the street, when you take out the bay windows," the fire wall being, he continued, "the biggest part of the brick in front."

Counsel for appellant subject the testimony presented by the plaintiff to an analytical examination in an attempt to demonstrate its utter unreliability as a support for the verdict from any standpoint from which it may be viewed. The argument thus adduced, addressed to those to whose judgment questions of fact must be submitted and committed, is persuasive, if it may be assumed that nothing appeared in the manner in which the witnesses for the defendant testified which justified the jury, after a full and fair consideration of their testimony, which we must assume they gave it, in disregarding it. This, as we have shown, they had the right to do, if, in their conscientious opinion, it did not carry with it sufficient weight to lead to the conclusion that defendant's resistance to recovery was sustained. On the other hand, if the jury believed, from the testimony of Mrs. Martin, Dr. Hoffer, Hall, Muther, and other witnesses, whose testimony in behalf of plaintiff was not direct but involved only circumstances, that the fire broke out and attacked the goods of plaintiff before any material or substantial part of the building in which they were situated had fallen as the result of the earthquake shock, we cannot say, from the record before us, but that they were thus justified in reaching their conclusion, for, we think, from those circumstances the fact that the fire did attack the goods before the building or any substantial part thereof fell is reasonably inferable.

It is a fact within the range of common knowledge, and worthy of remark in connection with the question we are here considering, that the average person is generally so disconcerted in mind on the occasion of a seismic disturbance that his subsequent recollection of the exact nature and order of events necessarily following one after another with lightning rapidity during the progress of such disturbance is exceedingly hazy and dubious. This is true, perhaps in not so great a degree, in cases of fire and conflagrations. No two persons, it is safe to say, can ordinarily be found who, relying upon their own recollection, can even approximately agree as to the length of time during which an earthquake shock of unusual severity has lasted. Often the most exaggerated notion of the duration of a temblor is conceived and adhered to, and frequently, while it lasts, some ordinarily very courageous men temporarily lose their better judgment and betray themselves into the most absurd and ridiculous attitudes and antics. And a severe earthquake, immediately succeeded by a fiercely raging conflagration, whose progress cannot be successfully resisted, would probably intensify the situation, with the result that every spectator, particularly every owner of property doomed to inevitable destruction, would, quite naturally, be in a state of confusion and excitement. These are facts, we say, within common knowledge, and thus readily may it be perceived how, many months after so exciting an event, witnesses could be honestly mistaken in an attempted recital of the many and varying circumstances attending it; and how a jury could well conclude, without impugning or challenging the honest intentions of such witnesses, that their testimony was unworthy of credence or weight.

We do not question the soundness of the position of appellant that, if any substantial part of the building in which plaintiff's store was situated had fallen before the fire had attacked plaintiff's goods, then, in that case, defendant would not be liable under the clause of the policy upon which its defense is interposed. But, as we think we have satisfactorily shown, the jury, either because the testimony presented by the defendant was not of sufficient probative strength to establish its defense to the requisite degree, or because the proof of plaintiff destroyed whatever force its testimony, standing alone, might possess, has by their verdict, of necessity declared that the plaintiff's goods were attacked by the fire before any material part of said building had fallen from a cause other than from the fire.

[7] The claim is vigorously put forth that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant in submitting to the jury the following instruction: "I instruct you that the falling wall clause in the policy of insurance in this action is not to be literally understood so as to avoid the policy if some minute portion of the material in the assured building fall. It means some substantial portion of the building, the falling of which would destroy its distinctive character as such. (Italics ours.) So that if the proof in this case establishes the fact that the front windows fell away from the building mentioned in the policy, or part of the front wall thereof, fell away, but that, notwithstanding such injury to the building it was substantially standing as a building so as not to increase the risk to plaintiff's goods by fire and in that condition it was burned, the clause in the policy as to the falling of the building or any part thereof would not exempt defendant from liability, if otherwise liable, as before explained."

In Home Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tompkins et al., 30 Tex. Civ. App. 404, 71 S. W. 812, the trial court instructed the jury in the following language: "* * * To avoid the policy, the falling must be of some substantial part of the building; that is, such an integral part of the building, as a whole, as that the falling of the same would destroy the distinctive character of the structure." The Texas court, condemning said instruction as erroneous and prejudicial and reversing the judgment of the trial court, said: "By the instruction given the jury in this case they were required to find, in order that the policy should be avoided, not that some material or substantial part of the building, as such, had fallen, but that there had fallen such an integral part thereof as a whole as that the falling of the same would destroy the distinctive character of the structure.

According to the decisions in this state under the valued policy law, the jury were required to believe that the building had been totally destroyed, before they could find for the defendant, thereby nullifying the stipulation as to a part entirely (citing Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 103, 18 S. W. 337, 59 Am. Rep. 613). While the part that should fall in order to avoid the policy should be a substantial and material part of the building, it would not be necessary for it to be so great a part as would destroy the distinctive character of the structure. In such case the structure could no longer be considered a building, but only débris or ruins." The foregoing language furnishes the inspiration for the criticism of the challenged instruction in the case at bar that the court thus in effect told the jury that, in order to avoid the policy, it was necessary for the defendant to show that the building had been entirely destroyed or become a mass of ruins before the fire broke out and attacked the insured merchandise.

[8] The accepted interpretation of the "fallen building" clause of fire insurance policies, such as the one contained in the policy here, is as it is stated in Nelson v. Traders' Ins. Co., 181 N. Y. 472, 74 N. E. 421. It is there said: "The meaning of the clause in question, when reasonably interpreted, is that the insurer is excused from its obligation by either the fall of the building as a structure, or of such a substantial and important part thereof as impairs its usefulness as such, and leaves the remaining part of the building subject to an increased risk of fire." See Clayburgh v. Agricultural Ins. Co., supra, and Home Mut. Ins. Co. v. Tompkins, supra.

We are of the opinion that an impartial examination of the entire charge in the case at bar will disclose that the court kept fairly well within the rule as laid down by the foregoing authorities. And we further think that a comparison of the challenged instruction in this case with the instruction condemned by the Texas Court of Appeals will make it very plain that there is a marked distinction between the two; for, whatever interpretation may justly be given the language, employed in both instructions, "the distinctive character of the structure," when considered alone and without regard to other parts of said instructions, we think it becomes very clear that the instruction in the present case, when considered in its entirety, as it should be to get its full meaning, furnishes no possible ground upon which its effect may properly be subjected to the interpretation which the Texas court gives to the instruction to which it was called upon to give attention. In the instruction here there is a clear explanation by the trial court that the meaning intended to be conveyed by the language, "the falling of which would destroy its distinctive character as such," was not that the building should be completely destroyed, so that "the structure could no longer be considered a building, but only débris or ruins," but that the clause upon which the special defense is based was not contravened if the proof established the fact that the front windows only fell from the building, or part of the front wall thereof fell away, but that, "notwithstanding such injury to the building, if it was substantially standing as a building, so as not to increase the risk to plaintiff's goods by fire and in that condition it was burned," the defendant would not in that case be exempt from liability under the clause of the policy upon which it founds its resistance to the payment of the indemnity to which it obligated itself. Moreover, the court, in another part of its charge, in clear and unmistakable language, specifically pointed out to the jury that "it is not necessary that the said building as a whole should have fallen in order that all insurance under the said policy shall be avoided." "It is only necessary," the court declared, "that a material part of said building should fall in order that all insurance under the policy shall be avoided." In the same instruction the court further instructed the jury: "As to what is a material part, I charge you that if you find that a portion of said building fell, and that by reason of said portion falling said building or its contents were placed in a position or condition whereby the same were more readily subject to fire than they would have been if said portion of said building had not fallen, then, in that case, I instruct you that it is your duty to be governed by the evidence, and you should return a verdict in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff." Thus, it will be observed, the court explicitly explained to the jury what would constitute such a falling of the building as would avoid the insurance under the policy—that is, it plainly put before the jury the real, pivotal proposition in the case, by declaring that if such portion of the building had fallen before the fire attacked plaintiff's goods as would increase the risk of fire, or as would "more readily subject the building and goods to fire than they would have been if said portion of said building had not fallen," then defendant would not be liable. And we think that this instruction is equally as clear in explaining the meaning of the phrase, "material or substantial part of the building," as the instructions upon the same subject approved in Clayburgh v. Agricultural Ins. Co., supra. Among other instructions given to the jury the court in that case, construing the "fallen building" clause of the policy, said: "As to what constitutes a falling of the building within the meaning of this clause, I charge you that the meaning of the language is that the building must have fallen in whole or in part to such an extent that its integrity as a building was destroyed or substantially impaired." The contingency against which by the adoption of the "fallen building" clause in an insurance policy an insurance company seeks to protect itself is manifestly the assumption of a risk not contemplated by the policy of insurance—that is, to protect itself against a risk which is not involved in the destruction of the subject of insurance by a fire originating from unusual and extraordinary causes. There is, so far as we are able to understand them, practically no distinction, in effect, between the last referred to instruction in the present case and the instruction from which we have just made an excerpt in the Clayburgh Case. In the latter the court very properly assumes that if the building "had fallen, in whole or in part, to such an extent that its integrity as a building was destroyed or substantially impaired," then there would have been shown such a destruction as would increase the risk of fire beyond that contemplated by the policy and assumed by the company; hence the latter would be immune from liability under the policy. In the case at bar, as we have seen, the court expressly declared that, if so much of the building had fallen as would increase the risk beyond that assumed by the company under the terms of the policy, then the company would not be liable. Thus it must readily become manifest the question whether a material or substantial part of the building within the meaning of the clause under consideration had fallen before plaintiff's goods had been attacked by the fire was fairly placed before and submitted to the jury for determination. And, furthermore, the language, "the falling of which would destroy its distinctive character as such building," employed in the first instruction here to which we gave our attention, was by the last instruction referred to fully and clearly explained to mean, not that the whole building must have been destroyed in order to avoid the policy, but that only such portion thereof as would be material or substantial or as would increase the risk of fire to plaintiff's goods. Throughout its entire charge the court, time and again, declared that, while the destruction or falling of a mere trivial or minute part of the structure would not suffice to avoid the policy, the falling or destruction of any material or substantial part thereof would.

[9] It appears very clear to us that when the instructions are read in connection with each other, as they should be so read and considered, the jury could not have been misled by the language in the first instruction, "the distinctive character of the building as such," assuming that said language involves an erroneous statement, and that it would be prejudicially misleading when read alone.

[10] Counsel complain because the court refused to submit to the jury the instruction, requested by the defendant, expressly declaring that "if such part of said building fell as would, if said building were not repaired, have impaired the usefulness of said building, then, and in that case, all insurance under the policy herein sued on is void." The rejected instruction perhaps states the law correctly, and it would have been just as well to have allowed it; but we think that the charge of the court covered the principle therein declared, and, as stated, fairly and correctly presented to the jury the law, by the aid of which they were enabled to intelligently consider the evidence addressed to the important question of fact tendered as the main issue in the case, and to reach a just and intelligent conclusion upon the evidence. The refusal to give the instruction could not, therefore, have resulted in any harm to the defendant.

[11] At the request of the defendant, the court submitted to the jury certain particular questions of fact, to which, save in three instances, direct answers were returned. These answers were, briefly, that the building did not, as a whole, fall prior to its destruction by fire from a cause other than fire; that a part or parts of said building did fall prior to the destruction of said building by fire, from a cause other than fire, but that such part or parts were neither a material nor substantial part or parts of said building, but only "trivial and inconsiderable"; and that neither a substantial nor a material part of said building fell from a cause other than fire prior to the burning of the "stock of goods of plaintiffs contained in said building."

To the following questions the jury answered, "Don't know":

- (1) "If you find that a part or parts of said building * * * fell prior to the destruction of said building from a cause other than fire, was the usefulness of said building for the purpose for which it was constructed impaired by reason of said falling?"
- (2) "If you find that a part or parts of said building * * * fell prior to the burning of said building and from a cause other than fire, state whether or not the falling of such part or parts exposed the interior of said building to the inclemency of the weather?"
- (3) "If you find that any part or parts of said building * * * fell prior to the burning and from a cause other than fire, state whether such falling occurred before the said goods were attacked by fire?"

Counsel for appellant undertake to show by an ingenious treatment of the special findings of the jury that there is no finding by the jury, either in its general verdict or by its special findings, with regard to the time at which the fire attacked either the building or the insured merchandise—whether before or after the falling of a material or substantial part of the building. We shall not follow counsel in their rather subtle or metaphysical reasoning in their arraignment of the special findings. We perceive in none of them anything inconsistent with the general verdict. To the contrary, they appear to sustain it. To one of the particular questions the jury unqualifiedly replied that a substantial or material part of the building had not fallen prior to the burning of the insured goods. There is no incongruity between this and the other special findings, and it reinforces the general verdict. Nor do we see anything in those questions to which neither affirmative nor negative direct answers were returned which would have shed any light upon the main issue had they, or such of them as were capable of being intelligently answered, been directly answered in one way or the other.

The first of these questions was too general to call for a direct and unqualified answer. Besides (and this may be somewhat technical, yet not lacking altogether in substance), there was no evidence introduced disclosing the purpose for which the building was constructed.

The second question, not directly answered, was whether the part or parts of the building which fell prior to the burning of said building and from a cause other than fire exposed the interior of said building or its contents to the inclemency of the weather. It is very evident that the mere falling away of a window to a building might expose the interior thereof or its contents to the inclemency of the weather, yet the falling of such a trivial part of a building from a cause other than fire would not be deemed sufficient to avoid a policy of insurance under the "fallen building" clause of the policy here. Hence an affirmative answer to the question we are now considering would not necessarily mean that such part or parts of the building as would avoid the policy had fallen prior to the burning of plaintiff's goods from a cause other than fire. The question was misleading, and the jury's failure to answer it directly was immaterial and without prejudice.

An affirmative answer to the third of the unanswered questions would not have militated in the least either against the general verdict or any of the special findings. The jury had answered that the stock of goods of plaintiff had been attacked by fire before a substantial or material part of the building had fallen. They had also answered that a part or parts of the building had fallen before the building had been destroyed by fire, but that such part or parts were "trivial and inconsiderable." What material difference, then, could it make whether, before or after such part or parts had fallen, the goods of plaintiff had been attacked by fire? In other words, the jury having already specifically found that the goods had been burned or were attacked by fire prior to the falling of a material or substantial part of the building from a cause other than fire, what, then, would be the necessity for further inquiry whether the goods had been burned or attacked either prior or subsequently to the falling of an inconsequential part or parts of the building? What substantial purpose could be accomplished by a further answer that the goods had been attacked after such part or parts had fallen? The failure of the jury to answer this question was harmless.

There were some of the particular questions requested by the defendant which the court refused to submit to the jury, and it is claimed that the court committed prejudicial error by such refusal. We have examined these rejected questions, and have found that most of them involve propositions which are substantially covered by those which the court gave to the jury.

The instructions of the court are further attacked, because, it is contended, the jury were told that it was the duty of the defendant in order to maintain its claim of exemption from liability under the "fallen building" clause to show that the falling from the earthquake or from a cause other than fire occurred before the fire had attacked either the building or the indemnified goods; whereas, the defendant was only required to show, in order to avoid the policy, that the building or a material part thereof had fallen prior to the fire attacking the goods. The court, in a number of its instructions, explained to the jury in very clear terms that the defendant must prevail if it were satisfactorily shown that the building or any material or substantial part thereof had fallen before the goods were attacked by the fire; and, while in some of the instructions the building and the goods were referred to in this connection in the disjunctive, from which phraseology, if taken alone, the jury might gather the impression that the court meant to say that if the building were attacked by fire prior to the falling of a material part thereof the defendant would not be exonerated from liability, the instructions, read as a whole or in their entirety as the charge of the court, could have left no other impression upon the minds of the jury than that it was necessary that the insured property should have been attacked prior to the falling before recovery upon the policy would be justified. The following may be given as an example of the instructions to which appellant objects in the respect mentioned: "If you believe and find from the evidence that the building described in said policy or a part thereof fell, and that by reason of the falling of said building, or a part thereof, said building or the contents thereof were placed in a condition or situation whereby said building or said contents were more easily subject to fire, then, and in that case, I instruct you that your verdict should be in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiffs." This instruction correctly states the law, and, when carefully scrutinized, is not inapplicable to the fact in this case—that is, the fact that the property insured were the goods and not the building. If the falling were of such a character as to subject the building the more readily to fire than if the falling had not occurred, it is very clear that the contents of the building would thus be exposed to a greater risk of destruction by fire, and, while perhaps the instruction could have been more clearly expressed, it could not, as stated, when considered with the other instructions, have produced any injury to the rights of the defendant.

It is, lastly, urged that the court's rulings upon certain questions involving the admissibility of certain testimony were prejudicially erroneous.

[12] The refusal of the court to allow the defendant to prove the effect of the earthquake upon other buildings located in the block in which the building containing the insured merchandise was situated was in our judgment perfectly proper. In order to have rendered such proof relevant and competent, it must first have been shown that there was a substantial similarity in the character of the construction of the other buildings to the one in which the insured property was situated and that the force of the earthquake was practically uniform in said block. No such preliminary showing was made, and there was therefore no foundation for the proffered but rejected proof. The proof of the destruction or falling of a frail building by a heavy gale of wind or an earthquake would not necessarily be proof that such wind or earthquake was the cause of the destruction of another building situated in the same block where another cause, like fire, had intervened and might have been the cause of the falling or the destruction of the latter structure. If, however, as suggested, proof were made that two buildings situated in very close proximity to each other were constructed in equally as substantial a manner in all respects, proof that one had fallen from the effect of a wind or an earthquake would doubtless be competent as tending to sustain the theory that the other had likewise fallen or been destroyed.

[13, 14] There appears to have been no effort made to make such proof, and the courts cannot take judicial notice of the character of the other buildings in the block in which the building containing the insured goods was situated, nor can the courts take judicial notice of the fact, if it was a fact, that the earthquake on the morning of April 18, 1906, operated with uniform or approximately the same force over the area covered by the block. If evidence addressed to both these propositions could have been secured, counsel should have produced it, and thus have laid the foundation for the proof which they vainly sought to make.

[15] Nor did the court err in permitting the plaintiff to cross-examine the witness Mallory with reference to an affidavit be filed with the New Zealand Fire Insurance Company, in which he deposed that his office furniture and equipments, which were insured in that company, had been destroyed by fire on the morning of the 18th of April, 1906. Mallory's office, it will be recalled, was situated over plaintiff's store, and on direct examination he testified that he was at or near the building a half an hour after the quake, and that he saw no fire in Fountain's store. The cross-examination, to which objection is made, was proper as showing that there had been previously made by him a statement inconsistent with his testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052. Counsel's specific objection, however, is that the witness' testimony on direct was confined to the question whether there was a fire in Fountain's store, and that he was not thus asked whether either the earthquake or fire had anything to do with the destruction of his property. But the fact that he was not questioned on his direct examination about the destruction of his own property or the manner in which it was destroyed rendered the cross-examination none the less pertinent and proper, since the necessary inference from his direct testimony was that there was no fire in the building in which his office and Fountain's store were situated, and that consequently the plaintiff's goods must have been exposed to greater risk by the fall of the building from the shock of earthquake than they otherwise would have been subjected to.

There are some other specifications alleging error in the court's rulings on the evidence, but they are not of sufficient importance, in our judgment, to require special attention.

We have discovered no valid reason for interfering with the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and said order is therefore affirmed.

Opinion Supplementing Order Denying Petition for Rehearing.

We deem it proper to notice a few of the propositions to which the petition for a rehearing of this cause directs special attention.

We are satisfied with the conclusion at which we arrived with respect to the ruling of the court on the cross-examination of the witness Dr. Mallory, and to which we paid brief attention in the original opinion filed herein. The object and tendency of Dr. Mallory's direct testimony, given in behalf of the defendant, was to show that neither the Fountain Building nor plaintiffs' property was attacked by fire before a material part of the building had fallen as the result of the earthquake. That there could be no other object of the testimony is a proposition so obvious that no intelligent person could fail to readily discern its purpose, and it is, therefore, plain that the jury so understood its purpose, and to that extent at least its inevitable tendency was to achieve the purpose for which it was offered and received. We know of no rule of evidence which will permit one party to introduce proof which tends, however remotely, to establish the truth of his theory as to the ultimate fact, and thus furnish some ground upon which the jury may gather the impression that the truth is on his side, and then preclude the opposite party from a full cross-examination of the witness giving such testimony, not alone upon the matter to which he has specifically testified, but as to all relevant matters which may naturally be inferred therefrom.

[16] In other words, a party should be permitted to ask a witness upon cross-examination any question, an answer to which favorable to the cross-examiner would either tend to contradict or weaken his direct testimony or destroy the injurious impression naturally to be gathered from such testimony. Singular as it may appear, appellant seems to think that because Mallory testified solely that there was no fire in the Fountain Building half an hour after the earthquake, the cross-examination complained of was entirely erroneous and prejudicial. But manifestly the plain and natural inference from such testimony is that there was no fire in said building and that the goods of plaintiff could not consequently have been attacked by fire prior to the falling of the building or a substantial part thereof. Admittedly, the building did fall at some time, either from the fire or the earthquake.

But it is declared that Mallory's affidavit did not state that his office equipments, on which there was a policy issued by the New Zealand Fire Insurance Company, were destroyed by fire on "the morning of the 18th day of April, 1906, or at any other time." This contention only represents another case of "a drowning man grasping at a straw." The affidavit of Mallory is not in the record, and therefore we are not advised, except through his cross-examination, what statements his affidavit contained. But it is as clear as language can make any proposition from his cross-examination that his affidavit related to the destruction of his office furniture and other equipments by fire on the morning of the 18th day of April, 1906, and that counsel for plaintiffs, in conducting this cross-examination, referred to the fire of that morning. That counsel for the appellant must have so understood the cross-examination is conclusively shown by the fact that they nowhere at any time during the progress of said cross-examination, made any such objection as is urged here, nor offered as a reason for the general objection that the cross-questions of counsel for plaintiff did not constitute "proper cross-examination," the one urged here against the pertinency of respondents' cross-examination of Mallory on the lines here considered. The only fire to which reference was made or could have been properly made in the cross-examination of Mallory was the fire which the jury found destroyed the goods of plaintiff, and there is not a single line in the record indicating in the remotest degree that the jury could have formed any impression that any other fire was referred to in Mallory's affidavit, to which the cross-examination related, from the nature or form of the questions constituting such cross-examination.

There are some of the rulings of the court excluding and allowing certain testimony to which we felt that there was no necessity for giving special attention in the main opinion. Counsel are of the opinion that we misapprehended the importance of these rulings and the significance of their objections thereto.

Among these objections was one addressed to the ruling of the court refusing to allow defendant to show the condition of the whole block in which the Fountain Building was situated. In the original opinion it is held that testimony showing or tending to show that other buildings in the same block were thrown down by the force of the temblor was inadmissible in the absence of a preliminary showing that all the buildings were substantially the same kind of structures and that the force of the quake was practically or approximately uniform throughout said block. The principle governing this ruling is equally as applicable to the ruling excluding the proffered testimony of the "condition of the whole block." It does not necessarily follow that, because one building in a particular block might fall into a mass of ruins from the force of an earthquake shock, other buildings in the same block would likewise fall from the same cause. It is not an improbable proposition that all the buildings of the block, except one might fall to the ground from the shock of an earthquake, and that that one would remain standing perfectly intact. The relevant effect of testimony of the general condition of the whole block upon a particular building in said block would of necessity depend upon the circumstance whether all the buildings, including the particular building, were built alike as to strength of foundation and superstructure, and the further proposition whether the force of the earthquake was uniform throughout such block. No such conditions were shown to exist in this case, and we think, therefore, that the court's ruling excluding that testimony was eminently proper.

[17] It is further said in the petition that the trial court seriously erred in permitting the witness Muther to say, in response to his cross-examination, that "the Fountain Building was doomed to destruction by fire whether or not it had fallen by reason of the earthquake." Muther was the chief of the fire department of Santa Rosa at the time of the fire and earthquake of 1906. The claim is that the testimony thus elicited was "wholly irrelevant." Admitting but not deciding it to be so, still the answer could not have been prejudicial in view of the instructions of the court clearly explaining the circumstances which would absolve the defendant from liability under the policy. There was but one single important question of fact submitted to the determination of the jury, to wit: Did the fire attack the goods before or after a material or substantial part of the building fell? Upon this question the court, in its instructions, repeatedly told the jury that their verdict must be for defendant if it appeared from a preponderance of the evidence that the building or a substantial part thereof fell before the goods were attacked by the fire. To hold, therefore, that Muther's statement to the effect that the building was doomed to destruction by fire, whether or not it had fallen by reason of the earthquake, was prejudicial, would be to impute to the members of the jury, without justification from the record, and, in the face of the well-understood presumption on that proposition, the densest ignorance or the most flagrant dishonesty.

We find nothing in the petition for a rehearing which would justify a departure from the conclusion reached in the original opinion that it was a matter entirely with the jury to determine and decide whether the special defense of the defendant was sustained by a preponderance of the evidence.

The power of reviewing courts to disturb verdicts of juries or findings of trial courts under our system, by which juries are made the exclusive judges of questions of fact and the courts of questions of law, is necessarily restricted to very narrow limits. Article 6, § 19, Const. Our law provides that juries are the exclusive judges, of the value and effect of evidence in all cases where the evidence is not, for reasons of convenience and public policy, declared by law to be conclusive proof of the fact in dispute. Section 2061, Code Civ. Proc. There may arise cases, it is true, where the court, for the sole purpose of illustrating the application of its instructions, may, with perfect propriety, state the testimony, but in such cases the court "must inform the jury that they are the exclusive judges of all questions of fact." Section 608, Code Civ. Proc. The appellate courts of this state may in effect set aside the verdict of a jury or the findings of a court where it can properly be said from the record that the evidence is either insufficient to sustain the verdict or findings or that there is no evidence whatsoever to support them.

[18] In such case manifestly a question of law is presented, and it is obviously only where an appellate court can declare from the record as a matter of law that the verdict or findings are not sufficiently supported or not supported at all that such court has any right, according to the plain terms of the Constitution, to interfere with a judgment or order for that reason. But it is beyond the constitutional province and right of an appellate court to declare that a judge, trying the questions of fact, or a jury should have given credit or a certain amount of weight to the testimony of certain witnesses in preference to other testimony upon which their conclusions must have been founded. Plainly, if appellate courts possessed such power, they could set at naught and render nugatory, according to their pleasure, the rules laid down by the Legislature for the determination and decision of questions of fact. Nor has a reviewing court the right to say that a jury committed error for which the judgment or order or both should be reversed because their verdict indicates or clearly shows that they attached no weight to certain testimony; for, while juries have no right to arbitrarily reject the testimony of a witness, no one will gainsay their right, as the exclusive judges of the value of testimony, to disbelieve any witness and reject his testimony as possessing no probative value, if they have sufficient reason for so regarding it. And who but themselves and perhaps the trial judge can say that they were without sufficient reason for rejecting as unworthy of belief the testimony of any witness or any number of witnesses?

If the established rules governing the determination and decision of questions of fact are to be respected, then this proposition is impregnable: That where there is some competent evidence supporting a verdict of a jury or the findings of a court, and the testimony is not of that character that it may justly be said to be inherently improbable or unbelievable, a reviewing court plainly transcends its power and right under the Constitution when, in such a case, it reverses the judgment or the order upon the ground that the verdict or the findings are not supported by the evidence. A judge or jury must know, before reaching a just conclusion upon the facts, upon which side of the controversy the truth prevails, and whether witnesses tell the truth or an untruth is a question which no human can determine who has not seen and heard them give their testimony. And whether a fact has been or is sustained by a preponderance of the evidence is a question as far removed from the proper cognizance of an appellate tribunal as is the determination of all other questions of fact which it is the constitutional duty of juries to determine, except, as pointed out, in those cases where the testimony, on its face, bears the indubitable earmarks of improbability.

To follow appellant's suggestion and order a retrial of this cause upon the ground that the evidence does not support the verdict would, of course, be tantamount to holding that defendant's special defense was supported by a preponderance of the evidence, and this would most certainly amount to a clear invasion of the right of trial by jury as guaranteed by our state Constitution.

For the reasons stated in our original opinion and those added here, the petition for a rehearing is denied.

16 Cal. App. 532

LOOMIS v. CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO.
(Civ. 678.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. June 28, 1911.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a fire policy which provided that the insurance should cease if the building or any part thereof fell, except by fire, evidence held to show that a substantial part of the front wall fell from an earthquake before the fire attacked the building or goods, but that the rear and side walls were not materially damaged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 324*)—FIRE INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—CAUSE OF DAMAGE.

In order to exempt the insurer from liability under the provision of a policy that all insurance should cease if the building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, a material or substantial part of the building in which the insured goods were must have fallen from another cause than fire "before" the building or goods were attacked by fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 749; Dec. Dig. § 324.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 652*)—FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on a fire policy negating liability if the building or any part thereof fell, except from fire, in which defendant claimed that a part of the building fell from an earthquake before attacked by fire, evidence of the effect of the earthquake on other buildings was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 652.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action by F. C. Loomis against the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Ware and T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. T. J. Geary, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is to recover upon a policy of fire insurance issued by defendant and covering certain goods of plaintiff while contained in the two-story brick building, No. 521 Fourth street, north side, between B and Mendocino streets, Santa Rosa. The loss occurred April 18, 1906, by fire. Defendant based its defense upon the following clause in the policy: "If the building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease." The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict on which judgment was duly entered. The appeal is from the judgment on the verdict and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

In addition to the general verdict the jury answered certain particular questions as follows:

"(1) Did the building * * * fall as a whole from a cause other than fire before plaintiff's stock of goods was attacked by fire? No.

"(2) Did said building fall as a whole from any cause after plaintiff's stock of goods was attacked by fire? No.

"(3) Did a part or parts not constituting a material or substantial part of the building * * * fall from a cause other than fire before said stock of goods was attacked by fire? No."

Four was not answered because the answer to No. 3 was "No."

"(5) Did a part or parts of the building * * * fall from a cause other than fire after plaintiff's stock of goods was attacked? No."

Six was not answered because of the last negative answer.

"(7) Did a material or substantial part or parts of said building * * * fall from a cause other than fire before plaintiff's stock of goods was attacked by fire? No."

Eight was not answered because of this negative answer.

"(9) Did the building * * * or a material part thereof fall from a cause other than fire prior to the occurrence of fire in said building? No.

"(10) Did the building * * * or a material part thereof fall from a cause other than fire after the occurrence of fire therein? No."

While urging certain errors committed by the trial court, appellant states that the principal grounds relied upon for a reversal are: First, that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to introduce evidence of a waiver by defendant of the plaintiff's compliance with the provision of the policy relating to the furnishing of notice of loss; and, second, that the jury, in finding upon the issues presented to it under the "fallen building" clause, "wholly disregarded the undisputed evidence before it," and "based its conclusion solely upon its prejudice against the defendant."

We find it unnecessary to consider the first objection.

[1] After a careful examination and analysis of the testimony we are satisfied that it appears without substantial conflict in the testimony that a material and substantial part of the front wall fell before the fire attacked the building or the goods of plaintiff.

There was evidence sufficient to show that

the rear wall and the side walls of the building, except towards the front, were not materially damaged, although there is evidence to the contrary. As to the second story front wall, there is much evidence that it went out as far down as the floor of the second story, and that the front part of the roof was down to this floor, slanting back to where it was not disturbed. The testimony relates to what certain witnesses observed at the rear of the building on Fifth street, and what certain others observed at its front on Fourth street. Only one witness, Frank Muther, the chief of the fire department, seemed to have been in a position to observe the entire building, and he was the one most likely to have made his observations with a cool head and some deliberation. Both parties quote quite freely from his testimony. He was called by the defendant. He resided two blocks from Fourth street. He had a store at No. 513 and plaintiff's store was No. 521, east in the same block. He testified: "When the shock first began I was in my bed, that was two blocks from Fourth street. As soon as I could stand on my feet and gather myself together, I slipped on part of my clothes and took the rest in my hands, and I skinned down the street towards Fourth street. * * * When I went up towards my store, I went somewheres around the center of the street. I know where the Loomis store was. I was at 513 and his number was 521. That was the same block, I believe, same side of the street. I saw my store and all the other stores that morning. I went up on top of them. Q. What store did you go on top of? A. Well, it was about 50 feet between my store and Loomis'. I won't be positive exactly which store these conditions were. It was either the electric light works or the store next door. I got up on the roof by climbing over the débris. The débris came from the top of the buildings. I saw the front and back of the Loomis store that morning, and I was on top of it. The roof was in pretty good condition in the rear, but it was not in the front. In front the upper story had fallen down through the awning, as far as the windows were concerned, but the lower story I think was in pretty good tact. The side walls also stood in the middle of the building. The front part of the roof slanted towards the front. The top of the roof had not sagged down or settled uniformly, because some of the windows had fallen down further out than the other and the roof lay promiscuously, and it was uneven. With reference to the floor in the second story, the roof was in some places down pretty low and in some places seemed to be pretty near intact. Of course, the walls were broken more or less. I couldn't say as to the floor of the second story, whether it was broken, because I was on top of it. I couldn't see down through where there was any holes broken through, anything of that kind. I don't think there was. I couldn't swear positively. The building in front was faced with cast iron, and the lintels that crossed were out. Them buildings were only just faced. This cast-iron stuff was only there for a veneer. It didn't hold nothing, and they were all shook away on every building in the block. The lintels were the cast irons that went over the doors of the lower story in front. They had gone out into the street or onto the sidewalk, but the brick did not. The lintels all left the buildings on every building in the block, because they were all cast-iron veneer. They are not built into the building; only stuck up there. On the Fourth street side the awning, the top, the fire wall was pretty well broken down, and went through the building and some places it had broken the windows and some of the parts between the windows were down. Some stood up uneven, of course. The rear wall was not down, and the roof was resting in the center. The front part of that building was the worst, the Fourth street side. The roof might have been resting on the second floor right in front where the front broke out. I went into that building from Fourth street by climbing over the débris. I had no ladder there. There were awnings. The brick came down and went through these awnings, and I partly used the awnings and partly piled over the stuff that leaned against the building, and climbed up that way. I went up there a purpose to take in the situation of the fire, and what to do to fight the fire, and at that time there were fires next adjacent to this building, also in the drug store, and in the electric light office next door. Q. At that time was there any fire in the Loomis Building? A. There was in the store next door and in the one next to that. Q. I ask you the question: At that time when you were up there was there any fire in the Loomis Building; that is, anywhere on the top of the roof? A. Well I am stating where I am standing, Mr. Ware. I am not stating whether it was one store or two. I think it was two stores in that building, wasn't there? Q. No, only one. A. Only one? Well, then, there was not. But the next store to that towards mine was afire, and that next one to that was afire; that is, the electric light office and the drug store. From the information I got from my men at the engine house, when they were drove out of the engine house, there was fire there as soon as they came out in the electric lighting company. I remained on the top of that building long enough to make up my mind that the block was doomed and I would get down and fight the frame district, and let the brick district go. It couldn't burn up soon enough to suit me. I knew it had to burn, and, when it was gutted, it would stop jeopardy to other property, my own included. Of course, I said that the rear wall was not down. I mean by that in a general way. I do not know that there was not a brick off from it. There might have been, because there was not time that morning to look very close. There was plenty of work to do, but in a general way the rear wall was up. The upper story of the front wall was broken out. The lower story was all right, I think. Those iron pillars were nothing but facing. I am not positive that there were any iron posts or pillars that supported the lintels for the doors, because those fronts have been changed around so often. I don't know how old a building the Loomis Building was, but it had been there a good many years. The Loomis Building was like all of them buildings was, mostly 13-inch brick walls, and then patched over a dozen times in front, and change the stores around a half dozen times since I have been in this town. The lintels lay on the sidewalk. I think that after the earthquake anybody could have entered that store by the lower door, if they had been willing to take chances. I wasn't willing to do it. I peeped into those places front and back. I could have crawled in. I looked into all of them stores to see if it was broke down inside or not, in front and back. I didn't see a fire in that store. There was next door."

Cross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: These lintels in there was a stiff sheet of cast iron that was placed on the building for ornamental purposes; did not support any weight at all. The second story front of that building was made up of two large bay windows, occupying almost the entire front of it, more window than brick, and then a line of brick between the bay windows and at the edge of the bay window, and the roof rested on that, so when those windows broke out, it let the front of the roof sag down, and they had very heavy fire walls up there, very high ones, to make a showing, and, of course, those high walls soon went. I don't know how high the fire wall was in the Loomis Building. It was on the same line to me and mine was seven feet. A fire wall is a wall that projects over the main building, above the roof which is called a fire wall, because in case of fire next door the blaze could not catch the roof. The blaze could go on up. It necessarily projects over the roof line, carrying no weight on it whatsoever, only its own weight, no bracing, no timbers or anything. Loomis occupied one store in the Clute Building and Brooks the other store. Next to my place was a millinery shop. Next to that was the Davis drug store. Then came the electric light company and then Loomis and then Brooks. Loomis was immediately adjoining the electric light building. When I climbed up, I couldn't tell within 10 feet one way or what. My object in going up on top of the building was to observe the condition of the town. There was a fire back, and there was a fire in the electric lighting company. There was a fire in the Davis drug store, one in the Doyle Block in Newman's, and it looked like there was another one right in back of King's somewhere, or back of the Grapevine saloon. There was one fire back of Loomis' or one back of the electric company, or the Newman drug store. There was one in the electric light company and there was one back of the next door, the drug store, and there was one in Mrs. Carither's on the other side. I could see the rear part of these buildings where Mr. Loomis' store was. The stairs alongside the wall of them in the back yard was already afire. Just as fast as I could run two blocks and get there, I was on top of that building. I hardly think it was within five minutes after the shock; it was almost 10 minutes. Q. At that time all the rear of the Loomis Building and the electric light building was then on fire? Mr. Ware: To that we object, the witness has not so stated, and it assumes a fact in reference to the Loomis Building that is not in his testimony. Mr. Geary: Go back and read the answer. The Witness: Well, I said there was a fire back there from the Loomis building, but not in the Loomis store; in back of his store and back of the next store. That is it. Mr. Geary: You say it was in the same building? A. Back of it. The fire engine house was situated in the rear of the Davis store and the others on Fifth street. I went on top of the Loomis store and took that observation of the fire adjoining the Loomis store before I went to the engine house, and, when I came down there by that time, the boys were getting the rigs out. * * * Q. How soon after you got there did you see the wooden buildings in the rear of the brick buildings on the north side of Fourth street on fire? A. When I got there, they were afire. The alleyway back of the Loomis store, Brooks' store, and back of the electric light company all along there were piled all kinds of boxes as high as they could pile them up, all along there and wooden sheds. When I looked over there from the top of the Davis Building they were afire and the wooden buildings in the rear were on fire and traveling right towards the engine house. * * * The firemen had already commenced playing water upon the rear of the Loomis store when I got there, and I ordered it stopped. The Davis drug store was immediately adjoining the Loomis store. * * *

Redirect examination: "To Mr. Ware: Immediately back of the Loomis Building about 20 feet there I think was vacant. There were all kinds of sheds in the rear of the Loomis Building. The sheds did not face on Fifth. They were back against the building, and them sheds connected with other sheds that did go up against these other buildings. Some of the sheds, the woodsheds that were on fire in the rear, were immediately adjacent to or in rear of the Loomis Building. * * * The sheds which connected the Loomis store on the west side clean to the firehouse was all connected to one another and fences and everything else. There were different owners and different sheds all built together. When I went up on the roof of the Loomis Building there was no fire in the Loomis Building or the Brooks store."

Witness Hearn, for defendant, testified: "I was up and around and dressed at the time of the earthquake. I was tending bar in Mr. Bloom's. (Nearly opposite the plaintiff's store.) I jumped over the bar and ran out in the middle of Fourth street right in the middle of the track. The earthquake had not ceased when I got to the middle of the track. As the result of the earthquake shock, so far as I could judge, the block including Mr. Loomis' store was pretty well down from the first story up. I could not tell much about the bottom story. Of course, I did not look close enough for it, but I could see that the upper story was pretty well down.

* * * At that time there was no fire in that building." On cross-examination he testified: That he did not notice the Loomis Building particularly any more than any other building; that he stood there some minutes; saw fire in the block after the earthquake at Pohley's saloon, 60 or 80 feet away from where he was standing; also on the corner of B and Fourth streets. Witness Barnes, for defendant, testified that he passed along Fourth street in front of the Loomis Building eight or ten minutes after the earthquake; that the buildings were all down as far as he saw; did not see any fire in the Loomis Building. On cross-examination he testified: "I cannot separately state to the jury what was the condition of the Loomis Building." On redirect he testified: "I cannot describe the Loomis Building separately. There was none in the block standing but I could not say it separately."

Witness Ward testified that he lived about a block and a half from Fourth street on Mendocino: "I observed the buildings on the north side of Fourth street between Mendocino and B somewhere from 10 to 20 minutes after the earthquake. * * * At that time I couldn't tell for the life of me which was the Loomis Building. Q. Why? A. Well, because of the dilapidated condition. Q. What? A. They were down, had fallen down mostly all along there, and I could not tell one building from another. In front of that building and the other buildings in that block there was debris all along there from Mendocino down on that day. I walked down Fourth street about the center of the street. I don't think any one could have walked on the sidewalk."

Cross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: I went from my house to the crossing of Fourth and Mendocino and then over to Hinton avenue and looked in the jail, then turned and went down Fourth street. I think I was considerably excited. I remember some things I saw, of course. I did not stop to look for any particular building as I went down Fourth street. I walked down Fourth street. Q. Now, then, was the roof still on the Loomis Building when you passed it? A. As I said before, I could not recognize the Loomis Building. Q. I am asking you now where was the roof of the Loomis Building when you went by. If you saw anything, what did you see? A. Well, mashed in more or less like all the rest. I could not designate the Loomis Building. It is like all the rest of them, down. I have not a distinct recollection of how the Loomis Building was at that time, not particularly the Loomis Building."

Witness Wilson testified that he came down to his place of business immediately after the earthquake. He testified: "I went straight down Fourth street, past the St. Rose. That was at the corner of Fourth and A. I know where the Loomis store was. I passed that. I saw the block on the north side—the buildings on the north side of Fourth street, between Mendocino and B, that morning. Nearly half an hour from the time I left home. I could not tell the condition of the Loomis Building or of any particular buildings. They were all down it seemed to me. Taking all of the buildings from Mendocino street clear through to B, two-story brick, on the north side, they appeared to be all down to me."

Witness Owen testified: "I know where the Loomis store was. I passed by there that morning. It could not have been more than three-quarters of an hour after the earthquake when I passed that store. The brick buildings on the north side of Fourth street, between B and Mendocino, including, of course, the store occupied by Mr. Loomis, looked to me as though they were all down. The street in front of those buildings and on the north side was pretty well filled up with debris. I mean by debris the walls of the fronts of the buildings falling towards the street. These fallen walls covered much of the street."

Cross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: * * * I passed by in front of the Loomis store and stopped and observed the buildings as I went along. I did not observe the rear wall. I was not on Fifth street. I could not see the rear wall because the roof was sloping this way, the wall was sloping."

Witness Broback testified: "I was living in the city of Santa Rosa on the 18th of April, 1906, at 415 A street. I was at my residence at the time of the earthquake. I know where the place of business or store of Mr. Loomis was. I passed by his store that morning, probably from a half to three-quarters of an hour after the earthquake. I observed the buildings in the block between Mendocino and B street on the north side of Fourth street as I passed by, including the Loomis Building, and I believe it was down. The buildings looked to me like they were all shaken down, some one way, some in another, some in the street; in fact, you could hardly get up the street. I could not get up the street on account of what was shaken in the street, or what was in there. Bricks and wood. Some of them were directly in the street, some of them were clear out in the car track in the center of the street. Q. Now from B street to Mendocino street, on the north side of Fourth street, was there any brick two-story building standing? A. No, sir; I didn't see any."

Cross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: Q. Did you notice the building which was occupied by Mr. Loomis as you went by there that morning? A. No, sir; I don't believe I could have found the building. I didn't make any effort to find it. I cannot give to this jury any separate impression of the condition of the Loomis Building that morning. I had no interest in observing the condition of any building. I don't believe I could exactly describe the building next to the Loomis Building, its condition as I passed by it. I did not stop to look at any particular building as I went by in any particular."

Redirect examination: "To Mr. Ware: Those buildings most all looked about alike to me. Q. Why was it that you could not answer Mr. Geary's question as to want of ability on your part to identify any particular store or number of building between Mendocino and B on the north side of the street? A. I don't think I could have found any one building without making a particular—looking particularly for it. Q. Why? A. In the condition they were in. Q. Well, describe that condition to this court and jury, please. A. I don't know as I can do that exactly. They were all shaken down in such a shape that I did not look for any particular building. Q. Why is it that you could not identify any one store that you passed by? A. Well, in the first place, I did not pay particular attention to any one store, and then they were in such shape that I don't believe I could have found a store unless I had some interest in it in looking at it. The Court: Why was it? What do you mean by 'they were in such a shape,' what do you mean by that? A. Well, they were shaken down in such a condition that, if I did not have any particular interest in the building, I didn't notice it any more than I did all the rest—just merely walking along, looking at them all."

Recross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: I don't believe I saw the roof of the Loomis building that morning as I went by. I do not know whether the roof or the rear wall was down. I don't believe I know whether the sidewalls were down."

Witness Simpson testified: "I reside in Santa Rosa and have resided in Santa Rosa for a little more than 30 years. My business is that of a contractor and builder. I know the building where Mr. F. C. Loomis did business up to the time of the earthquake. My firm put in new fronts, store fronts, lintels, in that building. The lintels that were put in by my firm were constructed of steel. They were anchored to the store joists and also to the other lintels at the ends. These lintels were supported at the end by the pilasters of the walls and the center by cast-iron columns. These lintels were 12-inch 35-pound steel T-irons, two of them, put about 11 inches apart, and supported with bolts through them, and at the ends there were holes for the anchorage, from the one to the other. They were all anchored together, with straps of iron and boltings. Usually we have two columns of what is called three-quarter cast columns that go in the corner of the show-windows, made out of cast iron. At the bottom there is iron sills for those columns to rest on, and then the woodwork came in between that. Then on top, of course, the brick was built from there up. On the face of the lintels was a wooden facing, which came down up to the ceiling on the inside, usually about one foot below the ceiling inside was the bottom of the lintel, and these lintels were anchored above to the joists. Usually a 20 foot would be anchored in the center, a big one in the center like that, and would go back four or five feet into the building. That is the way they was constructed at that time. The lintels supported the brickwork of the building immediately above the lintels. * * * The Loomis Building was built when I came here, and I have been here 30 years. The front of that building had been changed four or five different times, probably."

Cross-examination: "To Mr. Geary: The columns in front on the first story of the Loomis Building which held up the lintels were iron. There was wood inside these columns. The weight of the second story front of that building would be something like four tons. The iron columns each of them would carry about 27 or 28 tons. There were two iron columns there. If there had been no columns there at all the lintels would carry the weight."

Redirect examination: "Mr. Ware: Q. With reference to the vibration, if the vibration comes and these columns slant and the lintels go out of the building, what would they support? A. They wouldn't support anything, I suppose. Q. The lintels are placed above the columns, aren't they? A. Yes, sir. Q. When the lintels go out, the columns would go with them? A. I suppose they must go. I don't see how—they could not stand there alone unless the framework held them. Q. Assuming now that the lintels of the Loomis Building went out from the effect of the earthquake—assuming that; and they were out in the street, what would there be to support the brick and mortar above the windows? A. There is no question; if the lintels could go out, of course, the brickwork would go down—there is no question about that. How it could do it I couldn't say. I don't know anything about that."

Witness Mathews testified: "I resided in this city on April 18, 1906. I was rooming at the Ramona rooming house, on the south side of Fourth street, between B and Exchange avenue. Q. How nearly opposite to Loomis' store, where Mr. Loomis then had his store? A. Just a little west, about one store west I should say. I remember the occurrence of the earthquake. I was at the Ramona rooming house at that time. I stayed in bed until the thing was over, and then I got up and got out, walked out on the bricks. Those bricks came from the building I was in. I saw some of the buildings on the North side of Fourth street, between B and Mendocino. It looked to me as though they were all down, and I was just across the street from the Loomis Building. I paid no particular attention to any one building there, but the street was pretty well filled up with debris on both sides, from the side I was on and the other side."

The plaintiff introduced no testimony as to the condition of the front wall of the building following the earthquake. The testimony upon this point is without conflict. Plaintiff's rebuttal is addressed exclusively to the condition of the rear wall and the side walls and to the time the fire was first discovered in or about the building. As already observed, the evidence justified the finding of the jury so far as concerned the rear wall and the greater part if not all of the side walls. But we think it insufficient to justify the findings when applied to the front wall, for we can reach no other conclusion from the uncontradicted testimony than that a material and substantial part of the front wall had fallen. The only question admitting of controversy is, Did this front wall fall before the fire attacked the building or plaintiff's goods within the building? Defendant states the theory of the instructions given the jury as follows: "That, in order for the insurer to be exonerated from liability under the 'fallen building' clause of the policy, both of two events must have happened: First, a material or substantial part of the building, in which the insured goods were contained, must have fallen from a cause other than fire, i. e., earthquake; and, second, that such falling must have occurred before either the building or the insured goods, contained therein, had been attacked by fire." Defendant disputes the correctness of the second proposition.

The jury found that no part of the building fell by reason of the earthquake shock, either before or after the fire had attacked the goods of plaintiff therein, but it seems not to have considered whether the falling occurred before or after the fire and it could not have found on this fact by its general verdict, for it found explicitly that there was no falling at all from any cause. In this state of the case defendant contends that, if the finding of the jury that a material or substantial part of the building did not fall by reason of the earthquake shock, is unsupported by the evidence, the judgment must be reversed for the jury made no finding as to the time of the falling, and the appellate court cannot supply a finding upon that question—citing Smith v. Immigration, etc., Ass'n, 78 Cal. 289, 20 Pac. 677, 12 Am. St. Rep. 53, and other cases. In the case noted the court held that, although the evidence was sufficient to have supported the omitted finding, the court had no authority to supply it.

[2] There is force in the point made, but we think the theory of the instruction given is supported by reason and authority. Western Assurance Co. of Toronto v. J. H. Mohlman Co., 83 Fed. 811, 28 C. C. A. 157, 40 L. R. A. 561; London L. F. & I. Co. v. Crunk, 91 Tenn. 376, 23 S. W. 140. "If the building, or any material part of it, should fall before any fire broke out and caused damage to the property insured, the insurer would not be liable." Nelson v. Traders' Ins. Co., 181 N. Y. 472, 74 N. E. 421.

That a material and substantial part of the front wall of the building went out before the fire attacked the building or plaintiff's goods satisfactorily appears. The evidence is that the earthquake occurred at 5:13 a. m. and lasted about 45 seconds. Fire Chief Muther was on top of the building eight or ten minutes after the earthquake shock, and there was no fire in the building then, although the fire had attacked adjoining buildings and the sheds and boxes and other inflammable material at the rear of plaintiff's store were on fire. Several witnesses saw the fire in these outbuildings or sheds at times varying from five to ten minutes after the earthquake. Plaintiff himself arrived at the rear of his store building five or ten minutes after he was aroused by the shock and these sheds were on fire. He testified that the fire had burned through the rear door of the building, and he could see that the fire was attacking his goods. He did not go to the Fourth street front, and did not know its then condition. The evidence was that this fire in the rear of the block was first discovered back of the Davis and the electric light company building and spread to other of these sheds. There was no evidence such as appeared in the case of Davis v. Conn. F. I. Co., 158 Cal. 766, 112 Pac. 549, showing that the fire occurred through the breaking of electric wires by the earthquake and appeared simultaneously with the shock. In the present case the fire is traceable to the earthquake indirectly, but it is reasonably certain that the fire had nothing to do with the falling of the walls, and it is also reasonably certain, as appears from the evidence, that the walls had fallen before the discovery of any fire in the building or among the sheds and debris immediately in its rear.

Appellant makes no complaint of the instructions given, and it seems to us that they correctly state the law and substantially meet the object of defendant's requested instructions, pointed out in its brief, which the court refused.

[3] One other point made in appellant's brief should be noticed. It sought to prove the effect of the earthquake on other buildings—the courthouse, among them. We think the court rightly denied the offer. We passed upon the point in Fountain v. Conn. Fire Ins. Co., 117 Pac. 630. See Wigmore on Ev. § 442.

The judgment and order are reversed.

COOK et al. v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 5,724.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 781*)—DISMISSAL—COMPLIANCE WITH JUDGMENT PENDING APPEAL.

The powers of the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco being derived from the charter of such municipality, and the only authority given it to strike names from the list of eligibles prepared by it, being the charter provision that it may strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon two years, its action in setting aside such a list, prepared by it after an examination, taken pending its appeal from a judgment against it declaring the examination void and ordering the list annulled, was beyond its authority; and so was not ground for dismissal of the appeal, as leaving only a moot question.

MELVIN, J. An appeal was taken to the district court of the first appellate district from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, setting aside and annulling an examination which had theretofore been held by the civil service commission of that city and county, for promotion of certain captains in the fire department to the rank of battalion chief. On motion the district court dismissed the appeal for the reasons shown in the following order: "It appearing in this case that the civil service commission, defendants, in an action brought in the superior court to annul and set aside an order made by them, prosecuted this appeal from that order, and that since taking said appeal they have complied with the order made by the said superior court and have of their own volition obeyed the order made by the superior court of which they complain, and they being the only parties before this court, the proceedings here relate to what is now a moot question, and that any decision this court might make would avail nothing except to probably lay the law for other parties, the appeal is dismissed."

This court granted a petition for hearing here, and the matter now comes up for action. The dismissal of the appeal is opposed upon several grounds, but, in view of the conclusion which we have reached, only one of them need be noticed. It is insisted that the attempted compliance with the judgment of the superior court was utterly without effect, because of lack of power in the civil service commission to make an order vacating the examination and setting aside the eligible list which had been made as a result thereof. The civil service commission derives its powers from the charter of the city and county of San Francisco. Among those powers is not the arbitrary right to strike names from the list of eligibles. The only authority to remove names from such a list is given by section 10, art. 13, of the charter, which provides: "The commissioners may strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years." True, the superior court had declared the examination void and had ordered the list annulled, but, an appeal having been taken from that judgment, it was of no binding, mandatory effect until made final by the action of a court of competent appellate jurisdiction. If the commission could have set aside the eligible list while the matter of the validity of the examination was sub judice, it could have done the same thing in the absence of any proceeding, and without any order of court. The very purpose of holding examinations by the civil service commission was to create a permanent eligible list not subject to expunction upon the caprice of any board or officer of the municipal government. There was no grant of power directly given by the charter, or necessarily implied from the prerogatives conferred, which enabled the commission properly to set aside its own action after it had declared a list of eligibles, except in the single instance cited above. It follows that the board acted beyond its authority in taking the action which was the basis of the order of dismissal by the district court of appeal. There is nothing in this conclusion conflicting with the reasoning in the opinion in Nunan v. Valentine, 83 Cal. 588, 23 Pac. 713. In that case there was no question that prima facie the appellant had the right to dismiss the appeal. Here, however, we are called upon to determine the power of a municipal agency, created and limited in its authority by charter, to make an order setting aside its previous action.

The motion is denied.

COOK et al. v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 5,724.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1911.)

CERTIORARI (§ 28*)—EXAMINATION BY CIVIL SERVICE BOARD.

The office of the writ of certiorari being limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, to review of acts of a body exercising "judicial functions," and that only when it has exceeded the conferred jurisdiction, it will not lie to set aside an examination held by the San Francisco Civil Service Commission, though it had not complied with the charter provision that it shall make rules to carry out the purposes of the article relating to civil service, which shall be forthwith printed for distribution; the commission's holding of examinations and the declaration of the percentages attained by the various candidates not being judicial acts, and the provision as to adopting rules being merely directory, so that their adoption is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to the holding of the examinations by the board.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Certiorari by Walter A. Cook and others against the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and John T. Nourse, Asst. City Atty. (Chas. W. Slack, of counsel), for appellants. Choynski & Humphreys and John T. Williams, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on certiorari, setting aside and annulling an examination which had theretofore been held by the civil service commission of that city and county, for promotion of certain captains in the fire department to the rank and standing of battalion chief. Cook, who was one of those taking the examination, petitioned with several of his associates for the writ, setting forth five separate counts, on the first and third of which the matter was finally submitted.

The first and most important question presented by this appeal, and, indeed, in view of the conclusion we have reached the only one we need to consider, is whether or not certiorari will lie in a case of this kind; and in this connection it will be necessary to quote those parts of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco which we deem applicable to the matter before us. Article 12 of the charter deals exclusively with the subject of civil service. Section 3 is as follows: "The commissioners shall make rules to carry out the purposes of this article, and for examinations, appointments, promotions, and removals, and in accordance with its provisions may from time to time make changes in the existing rules. All rules and changes therein shall be forthwith printed for distribution by the commissioners." In the opinion of the learned judge who issued the writ and gave judgment according to petitioner's prayer it is shown that his conclusions were based upon the following errors: (1) The civil service commission had failed to adopt the necessary rules for promotions before calling and conducting examinations as provided by section 3 above quoted. (2) Improper credits were given for "seniority of service." (3) No credits on "ascertained merit" were given at all, but certain arbitrary markings were made for "meritorious service," which the court held to be by no means synonymous with "ascertained merit."

There is a great diversity of decision upon the question of the applicability of the writ of certiorari, due almost entirely to the difficulty of determining in many cases the line of division between functions of a judicial nature, and those of legislative, administrative, or executive character. By section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure the office of the writ is limited to a review of the acts of an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, when such tribunal, board, or officer, has exceeded the conferred jurisdiction, and there is no appeal, nor any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Did the civil service commissioners perform a judicial function, and did they act beyond their jurisdiction when they declared the list of eligibles for promotion to the rank of battalion chief after an examination held without the previous adoption of rules, and the printing and distribution of said rules? We think that the great weight of authority in this country is that the conducting of an examination is not in itself the exercise of a judicial function. The courts are slow to interfere by certiorari with the acts of boards or officers, unless it appears that such acts are clearly judicial in their nature, and it is now almost universally held that the exercise of the judgment of such an officer or board in determining the existence or non-existence of facts is not necessarily nor usually a judicial act. The rule was thus expressed in Fraser v. Rader, 124 Cal. 134, 56 Pac. 797: "All political, executive, legislative, and ministerial boards, bodies, and officers are constantly, and indeed perpetually called upon to make decisions affecting the conduct of matters intrusted to them. They exercise their judgments in so doing, and they determine the existence or nonexistence of facts. No street in any municipality of the state may be ordered improved until the proper authorities have first decided as a fact that public necessity or convenience requires it. Such decisions, however, are not judgments pronounced by a judicial tribunal. They do not, as to be judicial decisions they must, declare the law and define the rights of the parties under it. But this subject has been discussed so recently and so fully in Quinchard v. Board of Trustees, 113 Cal. 664, 45 Pac. 856, and in People v. Supervisors, 122 Cal. 421, 55 Pac. 131, that it would be supererogatory to continue."

In the Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 317, 74 Pac. 997, this court held that the action of the mayor of San Diego in removing an appointive officer was not reviewable on certiorari where the charter did not provide for the filing and hearing of charges and deciding their sufficiency before the mayor might act. The modern tendency is to limit, we think, rather than to extend the functions of this writ. Our attention has been called by respondents' counsel to the case of Robinson v. Board of Supervisors, 16 Cal. 208, in which this court (Field, C. J., dissenting) held that the action of a board of supervisors in passing an ordinance by which the salaries of certain officers were fixed was judicial and reviewable upon certiorari. While the case has never been formally overruled, we think that the doctrine announced in the opinion has been long abandoned. In Quinchard v. Board of Trustees of Alameda et al., 113 Cal. 667, 45 Pac. 856, it was held that the complicated duties of the trustees of a municipality in the matter of street improvements are legislative, and that the functions of the street superintendent are ministerial in their character. This case was cited with approval in People ex rel. Dean v. Board of Supervisors of Contra Costa County, 122 Cal. 423, 55 Pac. 131, decided by the court in bank, in which the granting of a franchise by a board of supervisors was declared to be not a judicial act subject to examination on certiorari. See, also, Brown v. Board of Supervisors, 124 Cal. 276, 57 Pac. 82; Borchard v. Supervisors, 144 Cal. 13, 77 Pac. 708. Whitney v. Board of Delegates of the San Francisco Fire Department, 14 Cal. 494, is also called to our attention. That was a case in which the board authorized by law to canvass the votes for the office of chief of the fire department declared, after hearing a contest, that no one had been elected, and passed a resolution to annul and set aside the election. But the question presented to us here was not before the court in that case. There was objection to the use of the writ to review the acts of a purely voluntary association, but, after holding that there was no merit in that contention, the court said: "It is not disputed that the controversy before the board of delegates was judicial in its nature; and it is conceded that the powers of the board were sufficient for the determination of all questions involved in the controversy."

Although the court did not determine whether the act of the board of delegates in canvassing the election returns was judicial in its nature or not, we apprehend that the judicial functions which in the opinion of the court authorized the issuance of the writ of certiorari were those appertaining to the hearing and decision of the election contest. Certain it is that the great weight of authority declares the act of a board in canvassing election returns to be ministerial, and not a subject for examination under a writ of review. Lansdon v. State Board of Canvassers, 18 Idaho, 596, 111 Pac. 133; State v. Osburn, 24 Nev. 195, 51 Pac. 837; Bouldin et al. v. Lockhart, 3 Baxt. (Tenn.) 262; Esmeralda Co. v. Third Judicial District Court, 18 Nev. 438, 5 Pac. 64; State v. Barber, 4 Wyo. 56, 32 Pac. 14; 15 Cyc. of Law and Procedure, 399.

It is conceded by respondents' counsel that the giving of an examination by a board of civil service commissioners is not a judicial function, but they assert that the promotion was a judicial matter, and that many things connected with the promotion require the exercise of judicial discretion, as, for example, the making of the schedule of credits for the different subjects upon which examinations were held. But the promotions were to be made by the fire commissioners. The holding of examinations and the declaration by the civil service commissioners of the percentages attained by the various candidates for promotion were not judicial acts. In People ex rel. Schau v. McWilliams, 185 N. Y. 94, 77 N. E. 785, there was an effort made to review the action of the civil service commission in refusing to certify the relator's pay as battalion chief of the fire department. The court held that certiorari was not the relator's proper remedy. In that case the commissioners had refused to take the office of battalion chief out of the competitive class, and of that matter in delivering the opinion of the court Cullen, C. J., said: "I admit that the propriety of classifying this office as competitive or noncompetitive involves in a high degree the exercise of judgment, but the judgment is that of the legislative or executive officer rather than that of the judge. Its proper determination involves considerations which cannot well be the subject of judicial inquiry. I do not assert that the action of the commissioners in failing to so place offices which should, under the constitutional provision, be placed in the competitive class, is not subject to control, but as said by Judge Martin in People ex rel. Sweet v. Lyman, 157 N. Y. 368, 375 [52 N. E. 132, 134]: 'The obvious purpose of this provision (the constitutional one) was to declare the principle upon which promotions and appointments in the public service should be made, to recognize in that instrument the principle of the existing statutes upon the subject and to establish merit and fitness as the basis of such appointments and promotions in place of their being made upon partisan and political grounds. It then declares that merit and fitness shall be ascertained by examinations, and also the extent to which they shall be thus determined. The extent to which examinations are to control is declared to be only so far as practicable. This language clearly implies that it is not entirely practicable to fully determine them in that way. It was the purpose of its framers to declare those two principles and leave their application to the direction of the Legislature.' If it should appear that there was a plain violation by the commission of its duty to classify as competitive an office which was clearly and manifestly so, there should be a remedy in the courts. But there is necessarily a large debatable field as to cases within which there will be great differences of opinion, even among the most intelligent and fair-minded men, and as to this field it seems to me that it is not reasonable that the judgment of an appellate court should be substituted for that of the commissioners. Yet, if the action of the civil service commission is to be reviewed by certiorari, there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that ultimately the classification of every officer or employé in the service of the state, or its political subdivisions, must be determined by this court, for, if the classification presents a question of law reviewable by the Supreme Court, that question survives in this court. Surely such a result was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution or by the Legislature when it enacted the civil service laws. It would cast upon the courts a burden which would not only be difficult for them to bear, but which they are by no means the officers best qualified to discharge. The proper classification of a part of the civil service depends in no small degree on the practical operation of the classification. A priori arguments must often yield to actual experience. Take the present case. If we should affirm the action of the civil service commission, and it should appear in the future that the classification failed to secure competent officers, surely the classification should be changed. Should the action of the commission be again brought before us for review? It appears that in some of the cities of the state similar offices to that sought by the relator are filled by competitive examinations, and in others not. If the question of the classification is always a judicial one, then there must be the same classification everywhere, for there must be at least some degree of finality in judicial determinations. It does not at all follow that the action of the civil service commission is not in any case subject to judicial control; but that such control is a limited and qualified one to be exercised by mandamus."

This language is peculiarly applicable to the present case. If the petitioners here had been dissatisfied with the announcement made by the civil service commissioners that examinations were to be held on certain dates, and setting forth the subjects and the percentages attainable, they might have compelled the commissioners by mandamus to make the general rules prescribed in the charter. This they failed to do, but they submitted themselves to the examination by a body authorized to give such examinations. See, also, People ex rel. Buckley v. Roosevelt, 19 App. Div. 431, 46 N. Y. Supp. 517. The section of the charter requiring the adoption of general rules for examinations, etc., by the commissioners, expressed, not a mandatory, but a directory admonition. There is nothing in the language of the act which makes the adoption of such rules a jurisdictional prerequisite to the holding of examinations by the board. These rules were merely "to carry out the purposes of this article"; i. e., those relating to civil service. The rules were to be a part of the scheme of testing the fitness of candidates for promotion, but the right to examine candidates was not made to depend upon the adoption of these general rules. Having jurisdiction to act, and not acting judicially in holding examinations, the civil service commissioners, even if acting unfairly, could not have their action subjected to examination by a writ of review. Greene v. Knox et al., 76 App. Div. 405, 78 N. Y. Supp. 779; Devlin v. Dalton, 171 Mass. 338, 50 N. E. 632, 41 L. R. A. 379.

We have carefully examined the cases cited by respondent, but are still convinced that the great weight of authority is against the employment of certiorari in a case of this kind. People v. Collier, 175 N. Y. 196, 67 N. E. 309, cited by respondent, was expressly overruled in People ex rel. Schau v. McWilliams, supra. Of the other cases cited in this behalf in respondents' brief, nearly all, if not all of them, differ so materially in their facts from this one as to be of little value. Dill v. Wheeler, 100 App. Div. 155, 91 N. Y. Supp. 686, holds that mandamus will not lie to compel a classification of the position of battalion chief. The opinion does not express the theory that certiorari will lie, and in the affirming opinion (Matter of Dill, 185 N. Y. 106, 77 N. E. 789) the court held that "the position or office of battalion chief in the fire department of Buffalo is one of that character the classification of which rests in the discretion and judgment of the civil service commission, and is not properly the subject of review by the courts." The case of People ex rel. Schau v. McWilliams, supra, is cited, and the ruling is expressly based on the doctrine of that case. The case of Chittenden v. Wurster, 152 N. Y. 345, 46 N. E. 857, 37 L. R. A. 809, also cited by respondent, is thus distinguished in the case last cited above: "That whether a particular position in the civil service of the state or its subdivisions is or is not exempt from examination may present a judicial question within the constitutional provision requiring appointments thereto to be made 'according to merit and fitness, to be ascertained so far as practicable by examinations, which, so far as practicable, shall be competitive,' has been held by this court. Chittenden v. Wurster, 152 N. Y. 345, 46 N. E. 857, 37 L. R. A. 809. Any other principle would allow the constitutional mandate to be violated with impunity. But, granting that principle to its fullest extent, it by no means follows that the action of the civil service commission can be reviewed on certiorari." People v. Common Council of Troy, 78 N. Y. 33, 34 Am. Rep. 500, was another case in which mandamus was held not to be the proper remedy. There was no hint that certiorari would lie to review the determination by the common council that the relator was not one of the four official papers of the city, but, even if there had been such suggestion, the case of People v. Wiggins, 199 N. Y. 382, 92 N. E. 789, upon the same state of facts, holds that the function of the city council was administrative, and that a writ of review should not issue. In People ex rel. Myers v. Barnes, 114 N. Y. 317, 20 N. E. 609, 21 N. E. 739, the court held that certiorari was the proper remedy to review the action of a board of auditors after refusal to pay a claim against a municipality. We do not see the applicability of the doctrine of that case to the one at bar, but, even if it were apposite, the Californian rule is different. See Andrews v. Pratt, 44 Cal. 318; Townsend v. Copeland, 56 Cal. 615. In re Ricketts, 111 App. Div. 669, 98 N. Y. Supp. 502, was a proceeding in mandamus. The functions of the writ of certiorari were not considered, and we cannot see its applicability as an authority.

From the foregoing we conclude that petitioners did not select the proper remedy. The commissioners' failure to pass general rules, and the errors, if any, in establishing the possible percentages in the awarding of credits, were not matters of judicial fiber, and in no wise affected the jurisdiction of the commission.

The judgment is reversed.

GARDINER v. BANK OF NAPA.

(S. F. 5,366.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1911.
Rehearing Denied September 22, 1911.)1. CORPORATIONS (§ 225*)—EXTENT OF STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Const. 1879, art. 12, § 3, provides that a stockholder shall be individually liable for such proportion of the corporate debts contracted while he was a stockholder as the amount of his stock bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock. Art. 22, § 1, provides that all laws in force at the adoption of the Constitution not inconsistent therewith shall remain in force until altered or repealed. Civ. Code, § 322, as it existed at the time the Constitution of 1879 was adopted, provides the same liability for stockholders as that fixed by art. 12, § 3, and further provides that any creditor may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders for the proportion of his claim payable by each, and that the court must ascertain the proportion of the debt for which each defendant is liable, and render a several judgment therefor against each. Held, that the constitutional measure of a stockholder's liability was not curtailed by section 322, but that the liability thereunder is for such proportion of the creditor's total claim as the amount of stock owned by him at the time the debt was contracted bears to the whole subscribed capital stock, and not a sum equal to such proportion of the total corporate indebtedness contracted while he was a stockholder as his stock bears to the total subscribed stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 872; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 351*)—DIRECTORS' LIABILITY FOR EMBEZZLEMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Under Const. 1879, art. 12, § 3, which provides that during the term of their office the directors or trustees of corporations shall be jointly and severally liable to creditors and stockholders for money embezzled by officers of the corporation, the recourse of creditors and stockholders is by an action in equity, whereby the creditors would be brought in as parties, so that each might receive his distributive share of the funds created for the benefit of all.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1492-1493; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 279*)—CONTRIBUTION AMONG STOCKHOLDERS.

Where a stockholder has paid his liability for the debt of the corporation in proportion to the amount of his stock, he has no cause of action against any other stockholder for the money so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1177-1185; Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 18*)—CONSTRUCTION—ADOPTION OF PREVIOUS CONSTRUCTION OF PROVISIONS.

During the existence of a constitutional provision making each stockholder individually liable for his proportion of all the corporation's debts, it was decided under one of two existing statutory provisions for carrying that provision into effect that a creditor could collect his whole claim from a single stockholder, provided it did not exceed in amount such stockholder's proportion of the corporation's entire indebtedness, and, when the Constitution of 1879 was adopted, the Civil Code contained section 322 in its present form, which is substantially the one of the former statutory provisions on which the decision was held not to rest, and the law at that time furnished no substitute for that provision on which the decision had been rested. Held, that the previous decision as to a stockholder's liability was not adopted by Const. 1879, art. 12, § 3.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Gardiner against the Bank of Napa. Judgment for plaintiff for partial relief, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter K. Tuller, Frohman & Jacobs, and Titus & Creed, for appellant. Percy S. King, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. [1] Judgment was entered in favor of appellant in the superior court, but being dissatisfied with the court's computation of respondent's liability, and consequently with the amount awarded, he has taken this appeal. The action was one by a creditor of a corporation against a stockholder thereof. The court held that plaintiff could recover such proportion of his total claim against the corporation as the amount of stock owned by defendant at the time the debt was contracted bears to the whole subscribed capital stock. Plaintiff contends that he is entitled to recover a sum equal to such proportion of the total corporate indebtedness contracted while defendant was a stockholder as defendant's stock bears to the total subscribed stock. In other words, he seeks to establish the right of a creditor to collect upon his individual claim a sum equal, if necessary to the satisfaction of the creditor's claim, to the stockholder's entire liability upon the debts of the corporation. The individual liability of a stockholder for the debts of the corporation is in California a matter of constitutional creation. Section 3, of article 12 of the Constitution of 1879 provides that: "Each stockholder of a corporation, or joint-stock association, shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock, or shares of the corporation or association. The directors or trustees of corporations and joint-stock associations shall be jointly and severally liable to the creditors and stockholders for all moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of such corporation or joint-stock association, during the term of office of such director or trustee." In addition to the constitutional provision we have section 322 of the Civil Code; the applicable portion of that section being as follows: "Each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation. Any creditor of the corporation may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders, for the proportion of his claim payable by each, and in such action the court must ascertain the proportion of the claim or debt for which each defendant is liable, and a several judgment must be rendered against each, in conformity therewith. If any stockholder pays his proportion of any debt due from the corporation, incurred while he was such stockholder, he is relieved from any further personal liability for such debt, and if an action has been brought against him upon such debt, it must be dismissed, as to him, upon his paying the costs, or such proportion thereof as may be properly chargeable against him." This section of the Civil Code would seem to be conclusive of the proposition that a single stockholder is liable to a single creditor for his proportion only of that creditor's debt. While conceding that section 322 of the Civil Code is probably not in accord with his contention, appellant insists that the measure of relief fixed by the Constitution is curtailed by that section, and that, to that extent, the section is unconstitutional.

Appellant's counsel lay great stress upon the use of the word "all" in the Constitution. In adopting the Constitution they say the people had the alternative of making a stockholders' personal liability a certain proportion of each debt of the corporation or of all debts incurred during the time he held the stock, and that by choosing the latter course they took away from the Legislature the power of providing a different rule by section 322 of the Civil Code. But the Code section does not change the rule. On the contrary, the first sentence of the Code section is practically identical with the first sentence of section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution. The constitutional provision fixes the liability, while the legislative enactment prescribes the manner of enforcing the rights of a creditor of the corporation as against a stockholder. We see no conflict between the Constitution and the Code. The Constitution, while fixing the measure of liability of a stockholder, does not provide any machinery for the enforcement of the creditors' rights. Under it, the Legislature might provide that any creditor should bring a joint or several action to enforce his claim (as it has done), or the law might require (as it does in some states) that all of the creditors be joined in an equitable action. Either method would leave the stockholder's liability the same. Even if it be conceded that without legislation the creditor could enforce his claim, such concession would not support appellant's theory that any single creditor may satisfy his whole claim out of the sum for which a stockholder is made liable under the Constitution. We apprehend that without a prescribed form of action the recourse of a creditor, if any, would be an action in equity, whereby all creditors would be brought in as parties, so that each might receive his distributive share of the fund created for the benefit of all.

[2] Indeed, that has been declared to be the rule with reference to directors who are made jointly and severally liable under this very section 3 of the twelfth article of the Constitution for moneys embezzled or misappropriated. Winchester v. Mabury, 122 Cal. 523, 55 Pac. 393; Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 439, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153.

[3] The liability of a stockholder is not joint and several, but as was said in Brown v. Merrill, 107 Cal. 447, 40 Pac. 558, 48 Am. St. Rep. 145: "Each stockholder has a several liability and that liability is proportionate to the amount of his stock; and, when he has paid his portion of any debt, or of all the debts of the corporation, he is freed from all liability, and has no cause of action against any stockholder for money so paid." The Legislature has seen fit to provide a method for enforcing the first portion of section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution by the adoption of the section of the Civil Code quoted above. We think that the method of establishing the claims of a creditor provided by that section must be upheld if not in conflict with the Constitution. The United States Circuit Court of the Northern District of California had occasion to discuss this matter in the case of Borland v. Haven (C. C.) 37 Fed. 404, and it was there held that section 322 of the Civil Code was continued in force upon the adoption of the new Constitution.

[4] Appellant relies upon the case of Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 155, as conclusive in favor of his contention. In that case, tried during the existence of section 36, of article 4 of the former Constitution, very similar to the one now in force (the only difference being that the present Constitution prescribes the method of computing a stockholder's liability, while the former one did not furnish any definite rule), the court held that, in view of the facts before it and the statute applicable to them, the creditor could collect his whole claim from a single stockholder, provided it did not exceed in amount the said stockholder's proportion of the corporation's entire indebtedness. When more than a decade later the people adopted a new constitutional provision practically identical with the old one, they read into it, according to appellant's theory, the interpretation given by Larrabee v. Baldwin, supra. There would be great force in this argument, were it not for the fact that in Larrabee v. Baldwin the court was construing, not alone that part of the Constitution fixing a stockholder's liability, but also the legislative enactment prescribing the creditor's remedy. There were two laws in existence at that time, with reference to the subject of the collection from a stockholder of his proportion of the corporation's indebtedness. Mr. Chief Justice Sawyer, who wrote the prevailing opinion, reached the conclusion that the litigation was governed not by section 32 of the general act concerning corporations (St. 1850, p. 350), but by section 16 of "An act to provide for the formation of corporations for certain purposes." St. 1853, p. 90. The Chief Justice quoted the latter section, and commented upon it as follows: "Each stockholder shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all the debts and liabilities of the company contracted or incurred during the time that he was a stockholder, for the recovery of which joint and several actions may be instituted and prosecuted. In any such action, whether joint or several, it shall be competent for the defendant or defendants, or any or either of them, on the trial of the same, to offer evidence of the payment by him, or them, or any or either of them, of any debts or liabilities of such corporations, and upon proof of such payment the same shall be taken into account and credited to the party or parties making such payment, and judgment shall not be rendered against the party or parties defendant proving such payment for a sum exceeding the amount of his or their proportion of the debts and liabilities of such incorporations, after deducting therefrom the sums proven to have been paid by him, them, or any or either of them, on account thereof. Laws 1863, p. 736. It would be no strained construction to so hold upon the first clause of the section down to the first period, if there had been nothing more. But, in that case the construction might be open to some doubt, whether it was contemplated that each creditor should be compelled to pursue each stockholder for his individual share of his debt, or whether he might make his money out of the first one he could find, whose liability is sufficient to cover the indebtedness, and where he could make it easiest. * * * That the Legislature did not contemplate that each stockholder should be the debtor of each creditor for a share of his whole liability, corresponding to the creditor's share of the whole debts of the corporation and no more, or that one creditor, by his diligence, should get no advantage over another, in case of the insolvency of the corporation and a portion of the stockholders, seems plain to our minds from the remainder of the section. It provides that 'in such action, whether joint or several, against a stockholder or stockholders to enforce the personal liability, 'it shall be competent to show on the trial payment by him, or them, or any or either of them of any debts or liabilities of such corporation, and upon proof of such payment the same shall be taken into account and credited to the party or parties making such payment, and judgment shall not be rendered against the party or parties defendant proving such payment for a sum exceeding the amount of his or their proportion of the debts and liabilities of such incorporations, after deducting therefrom the sums proved to have been paid by him or them, or any or either of them on account thereof.' This shows no intention to protect one creditor against the superior diligence of another, or to divide up the liability of the stockholder, giving a part to each creditor, but indicates a contrary purpose. It authorizes the payment of the whole liability to the first who comes with a demand sufficient to absorb it, and, by implication at least, authorizes the creditor to make his money out of any party liable to pay the amount."

After indicating that section 32 of the general corporation act had no application to the stockholders of the kind of corporation then before the court, the learned Chief Justice proceeded as follows: "Section 16 of the act of 1853, and section 32 of the act of 1850, were both amended by two several acts, passed on the same day, April 27, 1863, but neither amendment was made applicable to any class of corporations, except those provided for in the particular act to which it was an amendment. Section 16 of the act of 1853 has already been given. Section 32 of the act of 1850, as amended on that day, reads as follows: 'Each stockholder of any corporation shall be severally, individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities as the amount of stock owned by him in such corporation bears to the whole of the capital stock of the corporation, for the recovery of which joint and several actions may be instituted and prosecuted; and in any such action against any of the stockholders of a corporation, the court shall ascertain and determine the proportion of the debt which is the subject of the suit for which each of the stockholders who are defendants in the action are severally liable, and judgment shall be given severally in conformity therewith. If any stockholder in a corporation shall pay his proportion of any debt due by such corporation he shall be released and discharged from any further individual or personal liability for such debt.' It will be seen by comparison that those two sections are wholly different, that they could not be made to apply to the same subject-matter and could not possibly be intended to accomplish the same object. Both provide for prosecuting joint or several suits to enforce the liability, but section 32 provides that in any such action against any of the stockholders 'the court shall ascertain and determine the proportion of the debt which is the subject of the suit for which each of the stockholders who are defendants in the action are severally liable, and judgment shall be given severally in conformity therewith.' This provision expressly contemplates that each creditor shall recover a portion of the whole personal liability of the stockholder, corresponding to the portion of the whole indebtedness held by him, and no more, and directs the court to ascertain the proportion of the 'debt which is the subject of the suit,' each is severally liable for, and enter a several judgment in conformity therewith. There is no allowance for payment to other creditors. Section 16 contains no provision of the kind, but, on the contrary, contains a provision authorizing the defendant or defendants 'in any such action, whether joint or several,' to show that they have paid their full share of personal liability, or some part of it, to other creditors, and directs the amount so paid to be allowed to the party paying. Said section 32 provides that, if any stockholder 'shall pay his proportion of any debt, he shall be released and discharged from any further individual or personal liability for such debt.' He is not to be discharged from paying his proportion of other debts, although he may pay the whole of some particular debt. Under section 16 it is quite different, for in a suit upon one debt he may show that he has paid the whole or a part of his liability to some other creditor or creditors, and 'judgment shall not be rendered against him for a sum exceeding the amount of his or their proportion of the debts and liabilities, * * * after deducting therefrom the sums proven to have been paid,' etc. Thus the two sections, as to the rights of the creditors as against the individual stockholders, go upon different theories. One is based upon the theory that each creditor shall be entitled to hold each stockholder personally liable to himself for a portion of each stockholder's entire liability, corresponding with the amount of the share of the whole debt due from the corporation held by such creditor; and the other upon the theory that the vigilant creditor may reap the reward of his vigilance, by obtaining his money from any party whose liability is sufficient to cover his demand. It cannot be supposed that this difference is accidental, or that the Legislature, by adopting provisions so entirely diverse, intended to express the same idea, or confer the same rights. These two acts were before the Legislature at the same time, and were passed on the same day. That body had no difficulty in finding language to express its intention clearly in section 32; and, if it had in contemplation a similar result in passing the amendment to section 16, it is reasonable to suppose it would have adopted similar language. When in two laws under consideration and passed at the same time theories so diverse have been adopted, it must be presumed that it was with a design, and that the specific design in each section is in harmony with its own general theory. Why the Legislature applied a different rule to these different classes of corporations, they have not seen fit to inform us. Whether the policy is a wise one or not is no concern of ours. It is enough for us to know, if such be the fact, and so we think it to be that thus the law is written."

Larrabee v. Baldwin recognized two methods for carrying the existing constitutional provision into effect. When the new Constitution was adopted, practically re-enacting the old constitutional measure of liability, the Civil Code contained section 322 in substantially its present form, which is in its essence the same as section 32 of the old general incorporation act, and the law at that time furnished no analogue for section sixteen, the statute upon which Larrabee v. Baldwin was decided. Therefore that case is really authority against appellant's claim that the court's interpretation of section 16 of the special act was adopted with the Constitution. In Borland v. Haven, supra, the same Judge Sawyer, who, as Chief Justice of this court, wrote the opinion in Larrabee v. Baldwin, after quoting section 322 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1876, said: "Thus, taking the several provisions together, a stockholder is personally liable for his proportionate share of each debt of the corporation and of each debt only contracted while he is a stockholder. This section was in force at the time of the adoption of the amended Constitution in 1879, and it has never since been changed. Article 12, § 2, of the Constitution of 1879, is as follows: 'Dues from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the corporators, and other means as may be prescribed by law.' And section 3 of the same article provides that 'each stockholder of a corporation * * * shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him, bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation.' Thus, the section of the Civil Code, taking its provisions together, is precisely like this provision of the Constitution, except by express provision no one creditor can collect more than the share of his own particular debt of the stockholder, whether he has paid his share of the debts to other creditors or not; but the liability in the aggregate of the stockholders is precisely the same under each, since the aggregate of the stockholder's share of liabilities to each creditor is equal to his share of the liabilities upon the whole debt or liabilities of the corporation. It is urged that the Constitution on this subject is not self-executing, but that it requires legislation to give it effect; that section 322 of the Civil Code is inconsistent with section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution of 1879, and is therefore, under section 1, art. 22, repealed by it, and, since there has been no other legislation on the subject, since the adoption of the new Constitution, to give the constitutional provision effect, that this right of creditors to enforce the personal liability of stockholders has lapsed. Section 1, art. 22, referred to, provides 'that all laws in force at the adoption of this Constitution, not inconsistent therewith, shall remain in full force and effect until altered or repealed by the Legislature.' If, therefore, the provisions of section 322 quoted are not inconsistent with the provisions of article 12, § 3, they are, in express terms, continued in force. As we have already seen, they are clearly not inconsistent, but in all respects in harmony. Under both, the stockholder is liable in the aggregate for his proportion of all debts and liabilities of the corporation contracted while he was a stockholder, and no more. The Constitution does not provide how the liability shall be enforced, whether against each stockholder separately, or all jointly, while the statute goes further, and does so provide for its enforcement, and that provision is not inconsistent with the provision of the Constitution, but in the end it reaches the same result. Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 156, and other cases affirming it, establish this point. Were section 322 to be formally re-enacted now by the Legislature, would anybody pretend that it would be inconsistent with the constitutional provision now in question in such sense as to render it unconstitutional and void? I apprehend not. If it would not be inconsistent, and therefore unconstitutional and void, if formally re-enacted, it cannot be inconsistent, and therefore repealed now. If it could stand with the Constitution upon re-enactment, it can stand with it now. Not being inconsistent, as we have seen, it is in express terms continued in force. Section 36 of the old Constitution provided that 'each stockholder of a corporation shall * * * be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities.' This, as construed in Larrabee v. Baldwin, supra, and other cases affirming it, although couched in somewhat different language from that of section 3, art. 12, of the new Constitution, is in effect identical with the old, except that the new in terms limits the liability of the stockholder to those debts contracted while he is a stockholder, and the old does not. Yet in the case cited and in other cases the courts so construed the old, although there were no such express terms of limitation. Section 322 of the Civil Code was certainly not in conflict with section 36 of the old Constitution. If its provisions are not in conflict with the old Constitution on this point, they certainly are not inconsistent with those of the new. They simply provide for carrying the constitutional provisions into effect—for executing them. The defendants are therefore liable personally for their respective shares of the indebtedness unless exonerated or discharged therefrom on some other ground. It is insisted, that the only remedy in this case is necessarily in equity, as all the stockholders are interested and personally liable for their respective shares, and are necessary parties, and numerous authorities are cited on the point. But the cases cited arose where there was no statute expressly giving a remedy at law. Section 322 of the Civil Code of California, still in force, as we have seen, provides 'that any creditor of the corporation may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders for the proportion of his claim, payable by each, and in such action the court must ascertain the proportion of the claim or debt for which each defendant is liable, and a several judgment must be entered against each in conformity therewith.' This is mere procedure, in an action at law, especially given by the statute."

The opinion in Larrabee v. Baldwin does contain some general language to the effect that the part of the Constitution there considered, and repeated in substance in the statute, might justify the interpretation which appellant here seeks; but in Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 385, 1 Pac. 355, the court indicated as follows that the decision was based upon an entirely different theory: "The first clause of section 16 of the act of April 14, 1853, as amended by the act of April 27, 1863, read as follows: 'Each stockholder shall be individually personally liable for his proportion of all the debts and liabilities of the company contracted or incurred during the time that he was a stockholder, for the recovery of which joint or several actions may be prosecuted.' In Larrabee v. Baldwin, 35 Cal. 155, it was said it would not be a strained construction of that clause, standing alone, to hold that a creditor of the company might maintain an action against an individual stockholder on his personal liability, although it 'might be open to some doubt, whether it was contemplated that each creditor should be compelled to pursue each stockholder for his individual share of his debt, or whether he might make his money out of the first one he could find, whose liability is sufficient to recover the indebtedness.' But, after throwing out this intimation, the court decided the case before it, mainly, if not wholly, on other provisions of the same section."

Appellant's counsel, with much learning and force, have discussed the rules upon the subject of stockholder's liability in operation in certain other states, citing authorities; and respondent's attorneys, with equal ability and vigor, have sought to demonstrate that the statutes and Constitutions of those states differ so radically from ours that the cited cases furnish no aid to us in the solution of the present problem. Strongly as we are tempted to follow them into this interesting field, we are so certain of the rule long established in California that we refrain from further scrutiny or analysis of cases in other jurisdictions. Neither will we concern ourselves with the comparative desirability of the various methods whereby creditors are enabled to collect their claims from stockholders. Authors of text-books differ somewhat in their ideas upon this subject; but, when we admit the power of the Legislature to make laws for the enforcement of the claims of creditors of corporations against stockholders, we are not at liberty to uphold or overthrow such laws according to our opinions of their fairness or propriety. We are not even called upon to discover whether we can justify, if we may, any given act of the Legislature. It is enough for us to know that, "ita est scripta lex." Therefore we will resist the temptation to review the interesting discussion of counsel on both sides, regarding the reasons for the adoption by the framers of Constitutions, and by Legislatures, of various methods for making effective the rights of creditors in cases like this. The comparative advantages of one method over another do not concern us.

It follows from the foregoing that the judgment from which this appeal is taken must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Appeal by the heirs at law of John B. Rohrer, deceased, from an order settling the first account of R. I. Follmer, executor of decedent's last will. Affirmed.

Porter & Sutton, for appellants. A. J. Copp, Jr., and Jones & Weller, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal by the heirs at law of J. H. Rohrer, deceased, from an order settling the first account of R. I. Follmer, executor of the last will of said deceased. Two exceptions were made to the account, one based upon the alleged failure of the executor to include in the inventory certain real property of the value of $8,000 and the other relating to an allowed claim for $1,000 paid by the executor to his wife for nursing Rohrer during his last illness; but, as the first exception was evidently abandoned by appellants, we have only to consider that directed to the allowance of Mrs. Follmer's claim.

[1] The court allowed the claim not for $1,000, but for $600. No objection was made to the value of the services. Indeed, the testimony showed that for a period of nearly 19 months before his death the sick man required almost the constant attention of his nurse. The contention of the appellant is that Mrs. Follmer, whose husband was a nephew of the deceased, never expected any compensation for her services, and that, as she and her husband were living at the home of Mr. Rohrer without cost to them, her care of the sick man was prompted by motives of generosity alone. The evidence of Mrs. Follmer which was uncontradicted shows, however, that she had been promised compensation for the care of her husband's kinsman. She testified in part as follows: "No compensation was ever fixed for such services, and I never intended to charge him anything for such services, but he stated that I would be well paid for same. He at no time agreed to pay me any fixed sum for services rendered by me. I was prompted to perform such services out of kindness for Mr. Rohrer. I never kept any account whatever for such services. * * * I expected for such services a legacy or other remembrance. Mr. Rohrer never paid me anything for my services and I never asked him for anything for such services, and I never expected any compensation for such services in his lifetime." That an understanding between her and Mr. Rohrer existed with reference to her compensation is borne out by the fact that by his will he left her a legacy of $1,000. This was void because she was a subscribing witness to the will. She testified that she never intended to file a claim against the estate of Rohrer, but that she determined to do so when her attorney told her that the legacy was void. Appellants' attorneys argue that Mrs. Follmer cannot offer a claim founded on an implied contract, simply because an expected legacy failed, because the contract must have contemplated payment for the services to be rendered at the time the agreement was made. In this behalf they cite Andrus v. Foster, 17 Vt. 560; Murdock v. Murdock, 7 Cal. 513-514; Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 509; Estate of Hanson, 133 Cal. 38, 65 Pac. 14, and Crane, Adm'r, v. Derrick, 157 Cal. 667, 109 Pac. 31. But we fail to see why payment for services rendered should be denied merely because the contemplated method of compensation failed. Mr. Scarborough who drafted the will testified that the testator desired to make claimant a legacy of $1,000 as a reward for services rendered by her.

[2] This clearly shows that Mr. Rohrer intended to pay the claimant for her work as his nurse, and, taken in connection with the will itself and the testimony of Mrs. Follmer, it is amply sufficient to establish the contract. It has been held in New York that, even when a legacy has been left to a person seeking payment from the estate of one deceased for nursing him during his last illness, compensation should be allowed where the legacy was clearly insufficient to compensate for the services rendered. Porter v. Dunn, 131 N. Y. 314, 30 N. E. 122. There was no such relationship between Mr. Rohrer and Mrs. Follmer as would raise any presumption that the services were gratuitous. The facts that she was the wife of Mr. Rohrer's nephew, and that she and her husband resided in Mr. Rohrer's home, do not raise any presumption that she nursed the sick man without expectation of reward.

[3] Appellants also object to an allowance to A. J. Cook of an item of $100 on account of attorney's fees, but, as this objection is raised for the first time on appeal, we cannot consider it here.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

In re LOUCKS' ESTATE. (S. F. 5,625.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. DEATH (§ 6*)—SURVIVORSHIP—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The survivorship of one of two perishing in a wreck must be established by a preponderance of the evidence in a contest between the heirs of both decedents; it being the court's duty to determine the question of survival and heirship, irrespective of any contest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. DEATH (§ 5*)—SURVIVORSHIP—APPLICATION OF STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 40, providing that when two persons perish in the same calamity, and it is not shown from the circumstances or otherwise who died first, if one be under 15 or over 60 years of age and the other between those ages, the latter is presumed to have survived, would only apply where the times of death cannot be shown by direct or circumstantial evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Unless no rational view of the evidence upon the question of survivorship of one of two dying in a common disaster would sustain the trial court's finding that a daughter survived her father, such finding must be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3922, 3928-3934; Dec. Dig. § 1001.*]

4. DEATH (§ 6*)—SURVIVORSHIP—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in a contest between the heirs of a father and those of his daughter, both of whom perished in a railroad accident, held to sustain a finding that the daughter survived her father.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 104*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

In a contest between the heirs of a father and those of his daughter, both of whom perished in a railroad accident, in which the principal question was as to which survived, there was evidence that the girl was alive when witness started to town with her in a buggy after the accident, and that the father was placed upon the train at about the same time, and was then apparently dead. Two of the affiants on the motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence were witnesses at the trial, and testified fully as to the time consumed by the various occurrences immediately after the accident. Held, that alleged newly discovered evidence as to the time that elapsed between the departure from the place of accident of the body of the girl and the placing of her father on the train was merely cumulative, and not ground for a new trial, though it would tend to contradict the opinions of several witnesses; it not showing that the father did not die shortly after being injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 218-220; Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 280*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—ARGUMENTATIVE QUESTIONS.

In a contest between the heirs of a father and those of his daughter, both of whom perished in a railroad wreck, in which the question of survival was at issue, and there was evidence that the daughter was alive when her body was placed in a buggy, while her father was apparently dead when placed in a car, on cross-examination of a witness, who had testified that less than five minutes had elapsed between placing the girl's body in the buggy and that of her father in the car, a question calling his attention to an affidavit in which he had stated that five minutes had elapsed between those acts, and asking whether he could reconcile those two statements, was properly excluded, as tending to merely draw the witness into an argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 988, 990, 993; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 477*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—NONEXPERT WITNESS.

A nonexpert witness should not be asked whether it appeared to him that a man was alive at a certain time, not being qualified to answer the question.

8. EVIDENCE (§ 314*)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In a contest between the heirs of a father and those of his daughter, both of whom were killed in a railroad accident, a witness who had testified as to what he noticed when the father was placed in a car which would lead him to believe that life was not extinct was asked whether he knew why the father was placed on the stretcher while the girl was not. Held, that the question was properly excluded, its only purpose being to have witness testify that those placing the father's body on the stretcher believed he was alive, when their belief in that respect was not competent; only a statement of the physical facts supporting it being admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1168-1173; Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 91*)—EVIDENCE.

A motion to strike testimony which was admitted without objection was properly refused.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Wallace E. Loucks, deceased. From a decree of distribution decreeing a decedent's estate to his deceased child, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, an appeal was taken. Affirmed.

J. M. Walthall and L. L. Dennett (L. L. Cory and E. E. Shepard, of counsel), for appellants. Frank Kauke and Ernest Klette, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The brothers and sisters of Wallace E. Loucks, deceased, prosecute an appeal from a decree of distribution whereby the entire estate of said Wallace E. Loucks was given to the estate of his deceased child, Thelma G. Loucks, for the benefit of her heirs at law, her maternal grandparents. There is also an appeal from the order denying the motion of said brothers and sisters of Wallace E. Loucks for a new trial.

Wallace E. Loucks, his wife, Elsie May Loucks, and their infant daughter, Thelma G. Loucks, were killed in a collision between a railway train and the automobile in which they were passengers. The instantaneous death of Mrs. Loucks is unquestioned. The principal controversy, therefore, is upon the question whether or not Wallace E. Loucks survived his daughter, who was his only child. If he did outlive her, these appeals should be successful; if Thelma G. Loucks survived her father, the decree and order from which appeals are taken should be affirmed. The question of fact was tried by the court, a jury having been waived by all interested parties, and the court found that Wallace E. Loucks died leaving his daughter Thelma as his only heir at law.

The appellants contend that from the evidence received in the trial of the issues of fact it was impossible to determine with any satisfactory degree of accuracy whether the father or the child died first, and that, therefore, the presumption of our statute (subdivision 40 of section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.) should prevail in their favor. That subdivision is as follows: "When two persons perish in the same calamity, such as a wreck, a battle, or a conflagration, and it is not shown who died first, and there are no particular circumstances from which it can be inferred, survivorship is presumed from the probabilities resulting from the strength, age, and sex, according to the following rules: * * * Fifth. If one be under fifteen, or over sixty, and the other between those ages, the latter is presumed to have survived."

Appellants also assert that the burden of proving the survival of the child beyond the life of her father was upon respondents, and that the evidence is so unsatisfactory as to compel the conclusion that they failed to meet the obligation of this rule. Appellants advance the argument that the respondents having failed to establish by a preponderance of evidence the death of Mr. Loucks prior to that of his daughter, even if no resort be had to our statute of presumptions, the decision should have been made in accordance with the rule of the common law whereby the courts refused to determine who of two persons so related, killed by the same calamity, survived the other, but distributed the estates as if the deaths occurred at the same instant. Joseph v. Seward, 91 Ala. 597, 8 South. 682; Taylor v. Diploch, 2 Phillim, Eccl. Rep. 261; Mason v. Mason, 1 Meriv. 308; Underwood v. King, 19 Beav. 459, and on review 4 De G. M. & G. 633; Wing v. Angrave, 8 H. L. Cas. 183; Coye v. Leach, 8 Mete. (Mass.) 371, 41 Am. Dec. 518; Newell v. Nichols, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 604; Id., 75 N. Y. 78, 31 Am. Rep. 424. That this requirement of proof of survival by a preponderance of evidence was the rule at common law is not seriously doubted by respondents, although they deny its application under our probate system.

[1, 2] We think that the fact of survivorship must be established by a preponderance of evidence, not because the heirs of one decedent or of another begin a contest, but because it is the duty of the court to determine the matter of heirship and survival. This duty would still exist whether any one instituted any proceeding or not. Nor do we doubt that, if preponderating evidence were wanting to satisfy the court regarding this matter, the statute of presumptions would then be applicable to the solution of the problem to be determined; but the provisions of subdivision 40 of section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure, are only applicable when it is not shown "who died first and there are no particular circumstances from which it can be inferred." This is only another way of saying that the above presumption is to be applied only where the relative times of the death of persons perishing by the same disaster cannot be shown by direct or circumstantial evidence or both. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Miller, 8 Cal. App. 28, 96 Pac. 22. In the case at bar there was a conflict of evidence, and the court, after hearing all of the testimony, found the essential fact to be that the child Thelma survived her father.

[3] We do not see that this differs from the ordinary case wherein conflicting testimony has been given; and unless we find, upon a study of the record, that in no rational view of the evidence was the court below justified in the conclusion reached, we must sustain the findings of that court.

The accident occurred a short distance from the town of Reedley, in Fresno county, and the hour, according to the testimony of the train conductor, was 10:45 a. m. After striking the automobile the train proceeded but a short distance, and then backed to the scene of the accident. Mr. Loucks was still in the automobile. His head had been so crushed that the bones of one side of the skull were comminuted, and there was a hole in the side of his head. The baby lay on the ground. There was only a red spot on the top of her head, and, according to the testimony of at least one witness, there appeared to be no fracture of her skull. Different witnesses testified to the signs of life in Mr. Loucks and the baby when the train backed to the scene of the disaster. Of the child, one witness, Mr. Chambers, said: "I saw the baby wriggling on the ground. It seemed to be very active, wriggling back and forth. I went up pretty close to it. It was breathing, but not whining, crying, or anything—no noise. Some one came along with a buggy, and we decided to load it in the buggy. They thought probably they would save the life, thought it would be quicker to take it in the buggy than to delay for the train." The same witness said with reference to Mr. Loucks: "Mr. Loucks was sitting on the floor of the automobile with his hands over the dash board. His body was wedged in. On the side of his head he had an injury. It was a kind of blood clot or something like that, a lot of blood coming out, kind of pouring out. I didn't notice any brains or anything of that kind, but it just bled a big clot of blood on the side of his head. He coughed up something, I don't know what it was. * * * Q. Well, what did you see with reference to any movements, muscular or otherwise, about him? A. Well, he gasped, simply—that is my idea of it, simply gasped and that was all there was about it. I concluded at that time that he was dead. I didn't know that he was. Q. Anything afterwards at any time to make you change your mind? A. No. * * * This final gasp seemed to me like a contraction of the muscles more than anything else. Just simply that ended it. After he was put in the baggage car I saw him there. I saw nothing further that indicated life. As near as I can determine it the time from the time of the accident to the time the train started back to Reedley was about 15 minutes."

Mr. Chambers also said: "To the best of my recollection they were getting Mrs. Loucks in the car when they started off with the baby. It seems it all came around together. My recollection is she was practically in the car when they started to take the baby. Taking into consideration everything, I should think the train and buggy would get back to Reedley about the same time. Ordinarily the train would back a little faster." Mr. Golden, the baggageman, noticed a muscular relaxation just as Mr. Loucks was placed upon the stretcher before the body was lifted into the baggage car, but saw no movement afterwards. With reference to this matter he said: "Relaxation of the muscles is what I supposed I saw. I saw no other indications of life after that." No witness testified to any movement or other indication of life in Mr. Loucks after the train started for Reedley. Mr. Andrews testified that the baby Thelma was alive when he started with her in his buggy for Reedley, but she was apparently dead when he reached the hotel in town. She was breathing, however, when he arrived at a point one block from the hotel. If, as Golden testified, the train and the buggy reached Reedley about the same time, then the court was justified in concluding that Mr. Loucks expired first, because he last showed signs of life before the train started back to the town from the scene of the accident, while the child was alive after the buggy was in Reedley. It is true that the opposite theory may be sustained upon other portions of the evidence, and particularly by taking the estimates of the passage of time given by different witnesses. Mr. Andrews said he drove to town in four minutes after the baby was placed in his care. The conductor estimated that this was two or three minutes after the train returned to the place where the bodies were lying. The same witness stated that probably ten minutes elapsed between the time the train struck the automobile and the time the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Loucks were lifted into the baggage car, and counsel for appellants argue that, therefore, the father survived the child by three minutes. This computation fails to take into consideration the time consumed by backing the train; but, aside from that, conclusions based upon mere estimates of time are very rarely satisfactory. There are few things about which witnesses differ so greatly as questions of time. There was testimony tending to corroborate Golden's statement that the train and the buggy must have reached Reedley at about the same time. Mr. Andrews, after delivering the body of Thelma Loucks to Miss Works at the hotel in Reedley, hurried back in an automobile to the scene of the accident, and found that the train had gone. He said the train must have been at or at least near the station before he started from Reedley in the automobile; otherwise he would have seen it as it backed toward the town.

[4] Although the conclusion that Mr. Loucks survived his daughter might be deducible from certain selected portions of the testimony, there was also abundant evidence to justify the finding that Thelma outlived her father. The learned judge who tried the case, experienced as he is in weighing evidence, was satisfied upon this point. We cannot disturb his analysis of the conflicting evidence which he actually heard. If he had found it impossible to reach a satisfactory result from the evidence offered, doubtless he would have thrown the weight of the statutory presumption into the balance; but this he evidently found unnecessary.

[5] On the motion for a new trial appellants introduced certain affidavits reciting alleged newly discovered evidence to be offered for the purpose of showing the time that elapsed between the departure of Mr. Andrews with the baby and the placing of Mr. Loucks in the baggage car. This offered evidence was cumulative. Indeed, two of the affiants were witnesses at the trial and testified fully with reference to the time consumed by the various occurrences immediately after the accident. The affidavits of Drs. Pendergrass and Williams, who examined the body of Mr. Loucks upon its being exhumed after the hearing, were to the effect that the neck and jaw were not broken, and that death resulted from injuries to the head. While this testimony would have a tendency to contradict the opinions of certain witnesses, we do not see that it would detract from the conclusion that death must have resulted very soon after the injuries to the head of Mr. Loucks.

[6] Upon the cross-examination of Ed Dice, he was confronted with an affidavit in which he had deposed that five minutes elapsed between the placing of the baby in the buggy and the deposit of Mr. Loucks' body in the car. At the trial he said this period was, he thought, less than five minutes. Counsel asked this question: "Well, now, can you reconcile the two statements?" A general objection to the question was sustained, and this is assigned as error. The question was argumentative, and the objection to it was properly sustained. The two statements were clearly not reconcilable, and the question was doubtless asked for the purpose of involving the witness in an argument. "The question did not call for a fact, but for an argument in answer to the argument contained in the question." People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 21, 65 Pac. 11. This question was propounded to Dr. Steinwand: "Just describe, not necessarily in doctor's terms, but so we will understand them, what the extent of the injuries were." Objection was made on the ground that it was not shown that the head was in the same condition when the doctor examined it as it was immediately after the injuries were received. There was no force in this objection. True, the evidence showed some manipulation of the broken bones by the undertakers, but there was nothing to show any material change which could have been wrought by such mere handling of the head. The same may be said of a like objection made to a question regarding the immediate effect of such an injury. It was without merit.

[7] To the question propounded to witness Burgan, "Did it appear to you that the man was alive when he was placed in the car?" a general objection was sustained. The witness was not an expert. The ruling was proper, and the court suggested to counsel the correct method to be pursued, the judge saying: "The court did not rule that you cannot show those facts. It is simply to the form of the question—simply because it asks for an opinion on a matter he don't seem competent on."

[8] Thereafter the witness was permitted to state what he noticed at the time Mr. Loucks was placed in the car which would cause him to believe that life was not extinct. The objection to the question, "Well, do you know why he was placed on the stretcher and she was not placed on the stretcher?" was properly sustained. The only purpose of such a question would be to elicit a statement from the witness that those placing the body on the stretcher believed Mr. Loucks was alive. Their belief was not pertinent, but only a statement of the physical facts supporting such belief was admissible in evidence.

[9] A motion was made to strike out certain testimony of Dr. Booker. As the doctor testified without objection, there was no basis for such motion. People v. Samario, 84 Cal. 485, 24 Pac. 283; Evans v. Johnston, 115 Cal. 183, 46 Pac. 906.

From the foregoing it follows that the decree and order from which appeals are taken should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

In an action to enjoin defendant from violating a building restriction contained in a deed from the common grantor of the predecessors in interest of both parties, a finding that the parties thereto intended the covenant to be "for the benefit of the entire tract of land of which the land in controversy was a part," immediately following a finding that the parties did not intend to create an assignment for the benefit of the land subsequently acquired by the plaintiff "or of any land whatever," construed as an entirety as to that matter, is not a finding giving to the plaintiff a right to enforce the covenant made for the benefit of his land which was included in the grantor's original tract.

6. COVENANTS (§ 57*)—RUNNING WITH THE LAND—PRIVITY OF ESTATE BETWEEN COVENANTOR AND COVENANTEE.

Where the same instrument containing a covenant imposing a burden on the land conveyed conveys the fee therein to the covenantor,

7. COVENANTS (§ 70*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF COVENANTOR.

Whether a covenant contained in a deed creates an easement or is only a personal covenant should be determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reservation creating the right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 70, 71; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

8. COVENANTS (§ 69*)—RUNNING WITH THE LAND—COVENANT CONFERRING BENEFIT—PERSONAL COVENANT.

The owners of land conveyed a parcel of it adjacent to other land owned by them by a deed which "covenanted with a covenant running with the land herein conveyed" that a building should be erected upon the premises to be maintained as a first-class hotel, the main part of which should be located not less than seven feet from the front line and twelve feet from the southwest side line, the spaces between the buildings and side lines to be used for flower gardens, with a provision for a reconveyance on destruction of the hotel and failure to rebuild within a year. The hotel was constructed in accordance with the covenant, and the grantors afterwards conveyed the land adjacent to the 12-foot space by deed containing a restriction against placing any building nearer than seven feet to the front line, and by mesne conveyances title to this property, on which stood a dwelling house with lights on the northeast side, vested in the plaintiff. Held, in an action to enjoin the defendant from violating the covenant in the common grantor's deed of the first parcel, that the covenant was a personal one, not running with the land, and not capable of enforcement by the plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by John H. Berryman against the Hotel Savoy Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cryer & Tuttle, for appellant. Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the defendant corporation from violating a certain building restriction contained in a deed from the common grantors of the predecessors in interest of both parties. Judgment was given in favor of defendant, and we are called upon to consider appeals from said judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

There is very little, if any, material difference between the parties respecting the facts of the case; the only serious subject of controversy being the proper interpretation of the building restriction contained in the original deed, and the effect of a subsequent quitclaim deed whereby the original grantors sought to release the present defendant from any binding force of such restriction. In July, 1901, Abbott Kinney and Matilda Dudley were the owners of the Bay View tract in Santa Monica. Three lots and part of a fourth (all adjoining and forming one parcel) were sold to Abner L. Ross, defendant's predecessor, in title. The deed of conveyance from Kinney and Dudley, parties of the first part, to Ross, contained in addition to the usual covenants in a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, the following: "It is provided and covenanted with a covenant running with the land herein conveyed that a building and improvements shall be erected upon these premises to be maintained as a first-class hotel, to cost not less than five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, and the main part thereof shall be located not less than seven (7) feet from the front line and eight (8) feet from the N. E. side line and twelve (12) feet from the S. W. side line of said lot, which spaces between buildings and side lines are to be maintained as flower gardens, and all front porches shall be kept open and unobstructed on the front and ends thereof; said hotel to be erected and opened within sixty (60) days from date hereof. * * *

And, it is hereby covenanted that if the hotel should be removed from said grounds or should be destroyed by fire or other elements, that parties of the second part shall rebuild said hotel or make other improvements on said lots to the full value as heretofore agreed upon and on failure so to do within one year, the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, shall reconvey the said premises to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, on payment of twelve hundred and fifty dollars."

The hotel was constructed in accordance with the covenant above quoted. In September, 1902, one Junipher purchased from Kinney and Dudley's grantees of her interest in Bay View tract, property adjoining that previously conveyed to Ross. The deed to Junipher contained a restriction against placing any building nearer than seven feet to the front line of the property conveyed. By mesne conveyances the title to this property was vested in Mary A. Berryman in 1903. She erected a three-story building, one wall of which was on the line between her land and that of defendant. There are many windows for the admission of light and air to this building overlooking the 12-foot space on defendant's property. Mary A. Berryman on May 15, 1906, conveyed this last-mentioned property to her husband, the plaintiff, who owned it at the time when it is alleged defendant threatened to build on the 12-foot strip above mentioned in such a manner as to shut off light and air from the windows on that side of the building adjacent to defendant's land. In May, 1908, Kinney and Dudley quitclaimed to the Hotel Savoy Company all of the property previously conveyed by them to Ross; such conveyance being "given especially for the purpose of quitclaiming and releasing the covenants and restrictions contained in and provided by" their deed to Ross.

After a trial of the issues, the court found that the covenant providing for the maintenance of an open space next to the land afterwards acquired by plaintiff was not inserted in the deed for the benefit of "any particular property whatsoever," that it was not the intention of any of the parties to the deed to create an easement for the benefit of the land now owned by plaintiff, and that it "was the intention of the parties that said covenant should be for the benefit of the entire tract of land, of which the land in controversy was a part." The court also found that the title did not pass to defendant subject to the covenants contained in the deed to Ross; that such covenants created a mere personal right in favor of Kinney and Dudley; that this right was surrendered by the quitclaim deed; and that the covenants in the deed to Ross did not run with the land. It was also found that the wall of plaintiff's building encroached slightly on defendant's land.

Appellant contends that the deed to Ross and that to Junipher, each containing a restriction against building nearer the front line of the property than seven feet, creates reciprocal obligations enforceable in equity, either as covenants that run with the land or as personal covenants with which a court of chancery will compel compliance by persons taking the respective parcels with due notice of the mutual agreements. We cannot accept this view of the law.

[1] As was said in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 136 Cal. 42, 68 Pac. 310: "That there are personal covenants enforceable in equity against the grantee of the covenantor is conceded; but that proposition is far from being applicable in all cases, for, if it were, it would result that all purely personal covenants in any manner relating to land would have the same effect as those which do run with the land." The covenant in the deed to Ross is affirmative. By it the covenantor agrees, in the future, to erect a building at a certain cost and in a certain manner. On the other hand, the deed to Junipher contains a negative covenant, a typical building restriction whereby the covenantor agrees to place no building nearer the front line of his property than seven feet. There is no mention of adjoining property in the deed to Ross. Indeed, there is nothing in that deed to show that Kinney and Dudley, the grantors of Ross, had any interest in any property other than that described in the said deed. In other words, no dominant tenement is described to which the restriction in the deed to Ross might make his land a servient tenement.

[2] Appellant insists that judgment should have been entered upon the findings, because the court found that the parties intended the covenant in question to be "for the benefit of the entire tract of land of which the land in controversy was a part." Since the whole includes a part, we are asked to interpret this finding as giving to the plaintiff the right to enforce the covenant made for the benefit of his land which was included in the original Bay View tract. The finding upon this matter, however, must be read in its entirety. That part of it which declares that Ross and his grantors intended the covenant to operate for the benefit of the whole tract of land immediately follows a finding that the parties did not intend to create an easement for the benefit of the land subsequently acquired by Berryman "or of any land whatever." Read as a whole the finding is neither ambiguous nor in opposition to respondent's theory of the case.

[3] A covenant not running with the land may be for the benefit of property owned by the persons who may enforce it, but that fact does not take it out of the category of personal covenants and make it an easement. Examining the words of the covenant itself, we cannot see that it creates an easement running with plaintiff's land.

[4, 5] It purports to be a covenant running with the "land conveyed," and there is nothing in the deed itself to show that the grantors owned another foot of land in that vicinity. Defendant, therefore, as a subsequent purchaser of the land could not be charged with knowledge, derived from the record, that Kinney and Dudley owned other property to be benefited and the evidence adduced at the trial showed no such knowledge. He had the right to read the covenant in the deed to Ross, imposing as it did a burden on his property, as one creating no servitude that would pass with the land. To that covenant the language of this court in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., supra, is entirely applicable:

"It was not made for the benefit of the lot conveyed, but purported to impose a burden thereon by restricting its use; and while a benefit will pass with the land to which it is incident, a burden will adhere exclusively to the original covenantor, unless a privity of estate or tenure subsist or be created between the covenantor and covenantee at the time when the covenant is made. Webb v. Russell, 3 Term Rep. 393, 402; Hurd v. Curtis, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 459; Bally v. Wells, 3 Wils. 25, 29."

[6] "Here there was no privity of estate between the parties, for by the same instrument which contained the covenant the fee was conveyed to the covenantor. Under the feudal system the transfer of every estate created privity of tenure between the parties, and hence both the burden and the benefit of all covenants made by either bound and profited the assignee of either as an incident to the land. 'But, when the statute of quia emptores abolished subinfeudation, this privity no longer existed in cases where a fee was transferred and no reversion was left in the donor, and it became a rule that covenants which imposed any charge, burden, or obligation upon the land were held not to be incident to it, and therefore incapable of passing with it to an assignee. * * *

But, on the other hand, if the covenant were one intended to benefit the land, it was considered to be incident to and run with the land, and therefore whoever might become the owner of the land would also become entitled to the benefit of the covenant." Rawle on Covenants for Title, p. 314. So our Civil Code (section 1462) provides: "Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property, which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land"; and section 1461 of the Civil Code provides that "the only covenants which run with the land are those specified in this title, and those which are incidental thereto."

Appellant says that the judgment enables Kinney and Dudley to profit by their own wrong; that, after selling their property at high prices because of the improvements on the lots now owned by respondent, they quitclaim for a consideration to the hotel company that restriction upon which appellant had depended as insuring the free admission of light and air to one side of his building. But they are not parties to this action, nor are they seeking equitable relief. Respondent in purchasing the land in question had a right to depend upon the title as conveyed to his predecessors and to him. In the deed to Ross he found a provision which possessed all of the characteristics of a personal covenant. The deed provided that in the event of the destruction of the hotel by fire it must be rebuilt or improvements on the land must be made "to the full value as heretofore agreed upon," or otherwise the vendors or their assigns might repurchase at a stipulated price. There was no provision that the building restriction should apply to such new structure or improvements. True, as appellant says, this contingency never arose, but nevertheless the provision with reference to rebuilding in case of fire is very illuminating. It indicates that the parties did not intend the building restriction theretofore expressed in the deed to be perpetual and to pass as an easement, for, if such had been their intention, there would have been some effort to require the reconstruction of the building, in case of fire, upon the same lines and for the same uses as the original structure.

[7] The intention of the parties should be "determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reserve creating the easement." Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 549. As was said in Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 341, 57 N. E. 695 (50 L. R. A. 120): "It seems to us that in all these cases it is better to get at the intention of the grantor from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the attending circumstances, than to conjecture the intent from the circumstances, and then to make the language of the deed bend to that."

[8] Authority is not lacking to support the interpretation given by the trial court to the deed which was the basis of this action. In Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray (Mass.) 559, the facts were as follows: One Downing, the owner of a tract of land, conveyed to the defendant a certain lot, "subject to the following restriction: that no outbuildings or shed shall ever be erected westerly of the main building of a greater height than those now standing thereon." Downing subsequently conveyed the adjoining lot to another person, and plaintiff through various mesne conveyances acquired title to it. The bill whereby the plaintiff sought to enforce the restriction in the deed was dismissed, and in upholding this course the Supreme Court of Massachusetts said: "The infirmity of the plaintiff's case is that there is nothing from which the court can infer that the restriction in the deed from Downing to Boardman was inserted for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. If it appeared that the parties to that conveyance intended to create or reserve a right in the nature of a servitude or easement in the estate granted, which should be attached to and be deemed an appurtenance of the whole of the remaining parcel belonging to the grantor, of which the plaintiff's land forms a part, then it is clear, on the principles declared in the recent decision of Whitney v. Union Railway, 11 Gray (Mass.) 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, that the plaintiff would be entitled to insist on its enjoyment, and to enforce his rights by a remedy in equity. But there is an entire absence of any language in the deeds under which the parties claim, from which it can be fairly inferred that the restriction in the deed to the defendant against erecting his building above a certain height was intended to enure to the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. The restriction is in the most general terms, and no words are used which indicate the object of the grantor in inserting it in the deed. Nor is there any language in the deeds under which the plaintiff claims title which refers specifically to this restriction, or from which any intent is shown to annex the benefit of this particular restriction to the plaintiff's estate. Generally, when such a right or privilege is reserved, the purpose intended to be accomplished by it is stated in the conveyance or can be gathered from a plan referred to therein, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor. All parties then take with notice of the right reserved and the burden or easement imposed. But the conveyances in the present case contain no such clause, nor is there anything in the terms of the grant, or in the circumstances surrounding the parties when it was made, to lead to an inference in favor of the claim set up by the plaintiff. For aught that appears, it might have been intended by the parties for the benefit of the grantor only so long as he remained the owner of any of the land of which that conveyed to the plaintiff originally formed a part. However this may be, it is certain that the defendant took his grant without any notice, either express or constructive, that this restriction was intended for the benefit of the plaintiff's estate. This is the material distinction between the case at bar and that of Whitney v. Union Railway, above cited. And it is vital to the rights of the parties, because, as the case stands, the plaintiff is not entitled to avail himself of the equitable principle, that the defendant has taken his estate with notice of a stipulation for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff, which in equity by accepting the grant the defendant would be bound to observe. We are therefore of opinion that the clause in the deed to the defendant, creating the restriction on the enjoyment of his estate, must be construed as a personal covenant merely with the original grantor, which the plaintiff cannot ask to have enforced in this suit."

Jewell v. Lee, 14 Allen (Mass.) 145, 92 Am. Dec. 744, has many features resembling the case at bar. One Bates, who was the owner of land lying on both sides of Orient street, Swampscott, conveyed a portion on the southerly side, bordering upon the ocean, "upon condition that the granted premises shall be used for no other purpose or purposes than those for which they are now used, namely, for bathing and boating upon the beach, excepting only that low bathing-houses may be built thereon; it being understood and agreed that the grantee, his heirs or assigns, may ornament the granted premises in such manner as shall not be inconsistent with the foregoing condition." Subsequently Stephen Wardwell released his interest to Eben, and the latter conveyed the westerly part thereof to plaintiff subject to the condition expressed in the deed from Bates. In the following year Wardwell conveyed to Gray the lot adjoining plaintiff's property on the east, subject also to the aforementioned condition, and Gray quitclaimed to defendant. The property on the north side of Orient street was also conveyed by Bates to the Wardwells, and through mesne conveyances Jewell and Lee obtained title to lots immediately opposite their respective holdings on the south side of the street. Defendant with full knowledge of the restrictions in the deed from Bates to Wardwell prepared in violation thereof to move a house onto his lot. Plaintiff sued to enjoin him from so doing. After the suit was instituted, defendant procured and caused to be recorded instruments releasing all the owners of land on the south side of the street from the condition in the deed to the Wardwells. Plaintiff's bill was dismissed, the court saying, among other things: "So far as we are able to see, there is nothing to indicate that the original grantor of the premises, in annexing the condition, had any intent to regulate or control the possession or enjoyment of the premises for the benefit of subsequent owners or grantees of the estate, or any part of it, but that it was imposed by him solely for his own private and personal benefit, as the owner of other lots in the vicinity, in which the present plaintiff has no interest whatever."

Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381, was a case in which the owner of a tract of land subdivided it into lots for sale. Two adjoining parcels were sold subject for the term of 15 years to certain restrictions, one of which was that no building should be erected within 20 feet of the street. Plaintiff and defendant were subsequent grantees, and the former sought to enjoin the latter from building within 20 feet of the street. In discussing the bill the court used the following language: "It is not claimed that in regard to any of the lots there was any written covenant by the grantor, and it does not appear that there was any express stipulation or direct assurance on his part that any person who should purchase a lot on the north side of that street should have the benefit of a restriction binding all the other purchasers to leave an open space between their dwelling houses and the street. The only ground upon which the plaintiff can rest her claim that the restriction in question was intended to operate for the benefit of all the purchasers, and to establish a general plan of building, by which each one would acquire a right in the nature of an easement in the land purchased by the others, is to be found in the fact that in his transactions with two separate and independent purchasers the grantor conveyed a portion of the land in each case, subject to the terms and conditions set forth in the bill of complaint. * * * It is undoubtedly true, and has often been decided, that where a tract of land is subdivided into lots, and those lots are conveyed to separate purchasers, subject to conditions that are of a nature to operate as inducements to the purchase, and to give to each purchaser the benefit of a general plan of building or occupation, so that each shall have attached to his own lot a right in the nature of an easement or incorporeal hereditament in the lots of the others, a right is thereby acquired by each grantee which he may enforce against any other grantee. Whitney v. Union Railway Co., 11 Gray (Mass.) 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen (Mass.) 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632; Linzee v. Mixer, 101 Mass. 512; Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. Ch. 774. But in the case at bar there is nothing from which the court can infer that the restriction contained in the deed from Heath to the defendant was intended for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. No such purpose can be gathered from the plan, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor. It purports to be a condition imposed by the grantor, and the deed points out the mode in which he, his heirs, or devisees may enforce it. Neither of the deeds under which these parties respectively claim purports to give the grantee any such right against any other grantee. For aught that appears, the condition may have been intended for the benefit of the grantor or his family, as long as they continued to own the dwelling house. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, if she insists upon giving to that condition any wider application, and this burden we do not find that she has sustained."

Of a similar restriction the same court said in Skinner v. Shepard, 130 Mass. 181: "Undoubtedly Willis Bucknam might have enforced the first restriction while he lived; but there is nothing in the deed which shows that the parties intended that the restriction as to building within 25 feet of Green street should create a servitude or easement in the granted land, which should attach to and be an appurtenance to any neighboring land. The mere fact which the plaintiffs offered to prove that Willis Bucknam at the time he conveyed to Munroe and others was the owner of land separated from the estate granted by the Woburn Branch Railroad is not sufficient to show that the object of the restriction was to benefit this land. In the absence of any words in the deed to this effect, or any reference to a plan showing a general scheme of improvement, the grantees took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the adjoining estate. For anything that appears, it may have been intended only for the benefit of the grantor and for his personal convenience. Jeffries v. Jeffries, 117 Mass. 184; Jewell v. Lee, 14 Allen (Mass.) 145, 92 Am. Dec. 744; Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray (Mass.) 559. We are therefore of opinion that the restriction as to building must be construed, not as a condition which the heirs of the grantor can enforce, but as a personal covenant merely with the grantor; and that, after his death, it created no incumbrance or servitude upon the estate for which the plaintiffs can maintain this action." See also, Lowell Institution for Savings v. City of Lowell, 153 Mass. 530, 27 N. E. 518, which holds that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show from the terms of the grant or from the situation and circumstances that the grantor intended to create a servitude enuring to the land itself. Beals v. Case, 138 Mass. 138; Clapp v. Wilder, supra; Krekeler v. Aulbach, 51 App. Div. 591, 64 N. Y. Supp. 908.

The case of Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 92 Pac. 724, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, was one in which an owner of property in Colorado Springs sought to enforce a condition against the sale of intoxicating liquors contained in an original deed to defendant's grantor. Plaintiff had secured his title by mesne conveyances from the same original source. The deed provided that no intoxicating liquor should ever be sold or disposed of at a place of public resort on the premises thereby granted, and the Supreme Court held that the condition was valid and enforceable as between the grantor and its grantees (citing Cowell v. Colo. Springs Co., 3 Colo. 82, and Cowell v. Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. Ed. 547), but that it by no means followed that any owner of a lot in Colorado Springs might enforce the clause against any other lot owner. In pointing out the distinction between a personal covenant and one inuring to the benefit of neighboring land, the court said: "De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Clubhouse, 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388, is one of the numerous authorities relied upon by appellants to sustain their right to maintain this action. The covenant in the deed in this action was: 'And the said party of the second part, for himself, his heirs and assigns, doth hereby covenant to and with the said Daniel Dodd and Francis Mackin, their heirs, executors and administrators, that he, the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, will not at any time hereafter erect or permit upon any part of the said lot any hotel, drinking saloon, gaming house, slaughter house, furnace, manufactory, brewery, distillery, or building for the curing of fish, or for any other uses or purposes that shall depreciate the value of the neighboring property for dwelling houses.' The opinion reviews the English and American authorities upon the subject here under discussion and sums up the conclusions of the court as follows at page 340 of 50 N. J. Eq., at page 392 of 24 Atl.: 'The law, deducible from these principles and the authorities applicable to this case, is that where there is a general scheme or plan, adopted and made public by the owner of a tract, for the development and improvement of the property, by which it is divided into streets, avenues and lots, and contemplating a restriction as to the uses to which buildings or lots may be put, to be secured by a covenant embodying the restriction, to be inserted in each deed to a purchaser, and it appears by writings or by the circumstances that such covenants are intended for the benefit of all the lands, and that each purchaser is to be subject to and to have the benefit thereof, and the covenants are actually inserted in all deeds for lots sold in pursuance of the plan, one purchaser and his assigns may enforce the covenant against any other purchaser and his assigns, if he has bought with knowledge of the scheme, and the covenant has been part of the subject-matter of his purchase.' It affirmatively appears from the amended complaint that appellants were not parties to the original covenant contained in the deed under which appellee Robinson derives title to her property. In such cases it is held that an action is not maintainable (1) in which it does not appear that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the land of which plaintiff has become the owner, and

(2) in which it appears that the covenant has not entered into the consideration of plaintiff's purchase. From the very nature of the case, a covenant restricting the use of land will not be enforced against a subsequent purchaser without notice, actual or constructive, of the covenant. * * * By its terms the covenant is limited to the land 'hereby granted.' In this respect it differs widely from covenants which in express terms or by reasonable or necessary implication give notice that they are intended for the development or improvement of premises within a designated area, or for adjacent lots or neighboring property, as was the case in the New Jersey case, above cited, as indicated by that portion of the covenant which we have italicized."

Without further citation we may say that we think the great weight of authority is in favor of the conclusion reached by the trial court that the covenant in question was a personal one, not running with the land, and not capable of enforcement by the owner of adjoining property who was a subsequent grantee deriving title from the grantors in the deed to Ross.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellant, and find that they are all readily distinguishable in their facts from the case at bar. We have already shown how one of these (De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Company) has been analyzed by the Supreme Court of Colorado and found not applicable to a case like this. Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546, and Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, were cases in each of which the covenant was made in favor of the owner of adjoining property occupied as a homestead at the time the covenant was made. In each case the immediately adjacent property was the only land possessed by the grantor, while in the case at bar the original grantors owned many lots in Bay View tract and elsewhere in Santa Monica, any one of which might have been benefited in some degree by the restriction set forth in the deed. In each of the cases last cited the grantor, who was the covenantee, owned but one lot of land in the vicinity of that taken by the grantee, who was the covenantor, and in each case the covenantee's land not only adjoined that of the covenantor, but was occupied by him at the time of the execution of the deed as a homestead. Condert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190, is not in point as the deed itself by its terms provided that the covenant should be for the benefit of the land retained by the grantor. The court said: "The covenant, it will be remembered, expressly declares that it shall be lawful for any person who shall become the owner of any of the land described in the ten deeds recited in the conveyance to the complainant, to maintain an action for a violation of the covenant against such person as may be the owner of complainant's land when the violation is committed. The language of the covenant makes it certain, beyond all doubt, that the parties mutually intended that the restrictions put upon the land conveyed should have the effect to confer an important benefit on the grantor's adjacent land." In Hills v. Miller, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 254, 24 Am. Dec. 218, the covenant was one by the grantor for the direct benefit of the land and the plaintiff bought directly from the covenantee, the covenant itself operating as an inducement for him to make the purchase. Muzzarelli v. Hulshizer et al., 163 Pa. 643, 30 Atl. 291, was a case in which from the language of the grant itself it was evident that the common grantor intended the restrictions to apply to all of the lots granted. In Whitney v. Union Railway Co., 11 Gray (Mass.) 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, and in Parker v. Nightingale et al., 6 Allen (Mass.) 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632, the very language of the instruments creating the covenants showed that they were for the benefit of all of the grantor's lots and that the restrictions might be enforced by subsequent owners. Hemsley v. Marlborough House Co., 68 N. J. Eq. 596, 61 Atl. 455, was like Clark v. Martin and Peck v. Conway, supra, a case in which the owner of a homestead granted certain property with a building restriction obviously for the benefit of her property reserving to herself and heirs the right to consent to a different plan of building.

Owing to the conclusion which we have reached with reference to the covenant which we have been discussing, it will be unnecessary to examine respondent's point that appellant is a trespasser upon its property, having built slightly over its line as found by the court, and that as such trespasser appellant has no standing in a court of equity without first doing equity himself.

There are no other points that require special notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

An action, if one for determination of a right or interest in real property, being required by Code Civ. Proc. § 392, to be tried in the county where the real estate is situated, except that section 396 allows an action commenced in an improper county to be there tried, unless defendant demands a trial in the proper county, change to the proper county is required on demand of a defendant.

2. VENUE (§ 62*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—ACTION NOT BROUGHT IN PROPER COUNTY—PERSONAL ACTION.

An action, if personal, being required by Code Civ. Proc. § 395, to be tried in the county in which defendants or some of them reside, except that section 396 allows an action commenced in an improper county to be there tried, unless defendant demands a trial in the proper county, only one of the defendants being a necessary party on the facts pleaded, his demand alone for change of venue to the county of his residence is enough.

3. PLEADING (§ 49*)—CHARACTER OF ACTION—DETERMINATION.

The character of an action is determined by its substance, and generally this must be ascertained by a reference to the allegations of the complaint, without regard to the nature of the relief demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

4. VENUE (§ 62*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—PARTIES.

The complaint in an action against F. and a bank, alleging a sale by F. to plaintiff of an interest in a mine, the execution by F. to plaintiff of a deed thereof, the deposit of the deed with the bank in escrow to deliver to plaintiff on his making all the payments, plaintiff's discovery, before completing the payments, of fraudulent representations of F., plaintiff's then demand on F., refused by him, for delivery of the deed without further payments, threats of F. to cause the bank to deliver the deed to F. if plaintiff fails to make the payments, and threats of the bank to so deliver it, states no cause of action against the bank, so that it is not a necessary party, as, being agent of both plaintiff and defendant, it can without being made a party be restrained from delivering the deed to F. pending the action; and therefore, the action having been brought in an improper county, F. can have the venue changed as though he were the only defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by W. R. Bartley and another against P. W. Fraser and another. From an order changing the venue, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bourdette & Bacon, for appellants. R. B. Stolder and Bert Schlesinger, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco transferring the above-entitled action to the superior court of Mariposa county for trial.

The plaintiffs' complaint alleges substantially the following facts: In the month of April, 1909, the defendant P. W. Fraser offered to sell to the plaintiffs an undivided one-half interest in certain mining claims and water rights situate in Mariposa county, Cal. In the month of May following, the plaintiffs, relying upon certain representations of defendant Fraser, purchased an undivided one-half interest in the property referred to, and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $5,000 in installments, as evidenced by a written contract entered into by the plaintiffs and defendant Fraser, wherein the latter agreed to execute to the plaintiffs a deed for his interest in the property, and place the same, together with the contract of sale and an assignment thereof to plaintiffs, in the custody of the defendant City and County Bank of San Francisco, to be held in escrow. The terms and conditions of the deposit of the deed in escrow were that upon the payment by the plaintiffs to the bank for the use and benefit of the defendant Fraser of $1,000 cash in hand and $4,000 in three deferred payments of $1,500, $1,000, and $1,500, respectively, the bank was to deliver the deed, the contract, and its assignment to plaintiffs. Upon the making of the contract of sale, the defendant Fraser executed a deed to the plaintiffs of the property in question, and made an assignment of the contract to plaintiffs, and placed the same in escrow with the defendant bank upon the conditions stated. Thereupon the plaintiff paid to the defendant Fraser the sum of $1,000 in cash as per the contract of sale, and thereafter paid into the bank for the use and benefit of defendant Fraser the sum of $1,500, but, before the maturity of the second deferred payment of $1,000, the plaintiffs, as they alleged, discovered that they had been induced to purchase the mine by the deceit and fraud of the defendant Fraser who, prior to the execution of the contract of sale, had "salted" the property, and had grossly misrepresented to plaintiffs its value.

Upon the execution of the deed, the contract of sale, and the agreement of escrow, and in pursuance of the terms of the sale, the defendant Fraser placed the plaintiffs in possession of the property and the water rights appurtenant thereto. The plaintiffs thereafter in the working and development of the mine expended a sum in excess of $4,000, and it was during the progress of this work that they discovered that the defendant Fraser had "salted" the mine by mixing high grade ore with low grade ore, and that none of the ore originally in place in said mine was, as has been previously represented by defendant Fraser, of the value of $300 per ton, or of any value in excess of $20 per ton. Immediately following this discovery the plaintiffs demanded of the defendant Fraser that he deliver to them the escrow deed, the contract of sale and its assignment, and forego all further payments previously provided and agreed upon in the contract of purchase.

It is further alleged in the plaintiffs' complaint that the defendant Fraser threatens to and will, upon the expiration of the time in the escrow agreement fixed for the final payment on the purchase price of the mine, and in the event of plaintiffs' refusal to pay the same, cause the defendant bank to deliver all of the papers held in escrow to the defendant Fraser, and that the said defendant bank threatens to and will, in the event of plaintiffs' failure to comply with the terms and conditions of the escrow agreement, deliver the said papers to the defendant Fraser, to the irreparable damage of plaintiffs in the sum of $6,500.

The prayer of the plaintiffs' complaint is that pendente lite the defendant bank be restrained from delivering the escrow papers to the defendant Fraser, and that he likewise be enjoined from receiving or accepting the said papers from the defendant bank; that, upon the final hearing of the cause, the temporary restraining order prayed for be made a permanent injunction; that plaintiffs have judgment against the defendant Fraser in the sum of $6,500 for the damages which, it is alleged, will accrue to the plaintiffs if the escrow papers be delivered to the defendant Fraser, and, finally, for a decree, requiring and directing the defendant bank to deliver to the plaintiffs the escrow deed, the contract of sale, and its assignment. The defendant City and County Bank defaulted, and the defendant Fraser, after demurring to plaintiffs' complaint, requested a change of venue upon the grounds: (1) That the defendant Fraser was at all times mentioned in the complaint and up to the time of the hearing of the motion to change, a resident of Mariposa county. (2) That the City and County Bank is only a nominal party to the action, and has no interest whatsoever in the final result, and that Fraser is the only real party defendant in the action. (3) That the subject of the action was and is real property, all of which is in Mariposa county. In support of this motion for a change of venue the defendant Fraser filed, and read in evidence upon the hearing of the motion, an affidavit of merits in due form, wherein he deposed that then and for a long time prior to and at the time of the commencement of the action he was and had been a resident of the county of Mariposa. The motion was heard and determined solely upon the moving papers and the defendant's affidavit of merits.

[1] If this be an action for the determination, in any form, of a right or interest in real property, the cause of the controversy is local, and the action should have been commenced, and it must be tried in the county where the land lies. Const. art. 6, § 5; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 392, 396; Sloss v. De Toro, 77 Cal. 129, 19 Pac. 233.

[2] On the other hand, conceding the cause of action to be personal and transitory in its nature, the case was nevertheless properly transferred for trial to the county of defendant Fraser's residence if it be true, as he asserts, that he is the only party necessary and proper, on the facts pleaded, to be made a defendant in the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 395; McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 459, 36 Pac. 8.

[3] The relief demanded in a complaint does not indicate the character of an action. The substance of an action determines its character. And generally this must be ascertained by a reference to the allegations of the complaint, without regard to the nature of the relief prayed for. 1 Sutherland on Pleadings, § 186; Strain v. Babb, 30 S. C. 342, 9 S. E. 271, 14 Am. St. Rep. 905; Southern Pacific Co. v. Hyatt, 132 Cal. 240, 64 Pac. 272, 54 L. R. A. 522; Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 144, 73 Pac. 820; 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 146.

[4] "Every complaint in an action should be founded upon a theory under which the plaintiff is entitled to recover" (Buena Vista, etc., Co. v. Tuohy, 107 Cal. 243, 40 Pac. 386), and ordinarily the plaintiff is entitled to and will be given only such relief as the facts constituting the cause of action will warrant. The theory of the plaintiffs' cause of action in the case at bar is not readily discoverable. It is clear that the facts stated in the complaint would not support a judgment against the defendant bank for the delivery at this time of the escrow papers to the plaintiffs, and we are unable to perceive upon what theory the plaintiffs pray for this specific relief. The bank, as the depository of the escrow papers, was under the escrow agreement the agent of both parties to the sale. 1 Devlin on Deeds, § 237; Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 140, 13 Pac. 315.

The plaintiffs' remedy, upon the performance of the conditions precedent to the delivery of the escrow papers and the failure of the bank to deliver the same to the plaintiffs, would have been an action against the bank to compel such delivery. Devlin on Deeds, § 327; Stanton v. Miller, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 72. In such an action, however, the bank would be compelled to deliver the papers in controversy to the plaintiffs only upon the showing of a full and strict performance by them of the terms and conditions of the escrow agreement. Beem v. McKusick, 10 Cal. 538; Dyson v. Bradshaw, 23 Cal. 528. In this case it appears from the allegations of the complaint that the conditions upon which the deed and its accompanying papers were to be delivered to the plaintiffs have not been complied with; and it is evident, therefore, that the complaint will neither warrant nor support a decree requiring the defendant bank to deliver the papers in question to the plaintiffs. It is but fair to the pleader to infer that the procurement of such a decree was not the primary purpose of the action, and that the bank was joined as a defendant therein merely for the purpose of holding the escrow agreement in statu quo pending the litigation of the plaintiffs' grievance against the defendant Fraser. This result could have been accomplished, however, without making the bank a party defendant, for, assuming that the plaintiffs' complaint stated a cause of action, involving in any wise the validity of the original contract of sale and the subsequent agreement of escrow, the bank, as the agent of both parties, might have been rightfully restrained from delivering the escrow papers to the defendant Fraser pending the hearing and determination of the action.

It is apparent that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the City and County Bank, and, this being so, the bank was at least not a necessary party defendant to the action, and therefore the right of the defendant Fraser to have the cause transferred to the county of his residence was not affected by making the bank a defendant. Remington v. Cole, 62 Cal. 311; Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 120. If the plaintiffs' complaint states a cause of action at all, it must be considered as founded upon the theory that plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment rescinding the original contract of sale coupled with damages, and perhaps a lien upon the property sold for the portion of the purchase price already paid.

In this view of the case, and with the defendant bank eliminated from the controversy, it is clear that the action is for the determination in some form of a right or interest in real property; or else it is in its results purely personal to the defendant; and in either event it was properly transferred to Mariposa county for trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MITCHELL v. MOSES (MITCHELL, Intervener.) (Civ. 858.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 15, 1911.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 131*)—SEPARATE ESTATE—PRESUMPTIONS—REBUTTING PRESUMPTIONS.

The presumption arising under Civ. Code, § 164, that property conveyed to a married woman is her separate estate, may be overcome by parol testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 69*)—PLEADING—EQUITABLE TITLE.

Defendant, relying upon an equitable title in ejectment, must specially plead the facts upon which his equitable defense rests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 249*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—NATURE.

Property acquired by either spouse during marriage, save by gift, devise, or descent, belongs to the community estate, regardless of which spouse took the conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 270*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—TITLE OF HUSBAND.

As a husband may maintain against his wife an action to quiet title to community property, the title to which had been taken in the wife's name, the title of the husband is not a mere equitable one, as an equitable owner cannot maintain such action against the holder of the legal title, and he need not plead the facts on which his title rests.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 254*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—WIFE AS TRUSTEE.

Where a deed expressly conveys property to a wife as her separate property, she may be held to have taken the legal title in trust for the community, where the consideration is paid from community funds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Action by Marguerite Lee Mitchell against Maud B. Moses, in which J. W. Mitchell intervened, filing petition to quiet title against plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for new trial, intervener appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jos. P. Lucey and Jas. P. Sweeney, for appellant. Thos. F. Barry, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent. Thos. P. Boyd, for defendant.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought an action in ejectment against Maud B. Moses to recover the possession of certain premises situate in Marin county. The defendant Moses was in possession of the premises under a lease from J. W. Mitchell, the husband of plaintiff. Plaintiff in her separate complaint alleged the locus in quo to be her separate property. The defendant Moses answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint.

The appellant, J. W. Mitchell, by leave of the court, filed a complaint in intervention to quiet title as against plaintiff. The complaint of the intervener was in the ordinary form of a complaint to quiet title, and alleged that the intervener was seised in fee of the premises in dispute, and that plaintiff claimed some interest in the premises adverse to the right of said intervener. Plaintiff answered the complaint in intervention, and denied the allegations as to the seisin of the intervener, and alleged that she was the owner and seized in fee of said property. Plaintiff recovered judgment both against defendant Moses and the intervener. The intervener moved for a new trial, which, being denied, he in due time appealed from the judgment and order.

The only grounds urged for a reversal concern the action of the trial court in sustaining objections to testimony offered by appellant. It was admitted by the intervener at the outset of the trial that the title to the premises in suit on the 10th day of December, 1903, was vested in H. H. Wainwright and Emily C. Wainwright. Plaintiff thereupon, in support of her title to the premises, introduced in evidence a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, in the usual form, reciting a consideration of $10, executed by the said Wainwrights on said 10th day of December, 1903, and conveying the said premises to said plaintiff, described therein as the wife of appellant. The deed did not recite that the property was granted to the grantee as or for her separate property, but granted to her the premises "in fee simple absolute." Plaintiff introduced no testimony as to the consideration paid for the premises or the like, but relied simply on the deed and the presumptions now arising from a conveyance to a married woman under section 164, Civ. Code.

The intervener was called as a witness on his own behalf, and without objection testified that he paid the consideration for the property, but upon the objection of plaintiff was not allowed to state a conversation which he had with his wife, the plaintiff, about the purchase of the property prior to its purchase. Upon the objection of plaintiff he was not permitted to answer questions which would have elicited an explanation as to why the title to the property was taken in the name of his wife. It is manifest that, if the witness had been allowed to answer the questions objected to, he might have shown that it was not intended, as between him and his wife, that the property should be her separate property, or that by allowing the conveyance to be made to her he intended any gift of the property to her. In other words, the rejected testimony might have overcome the presumption now arising, under section 164, Civ. Code, that by the conveyance to her the title was vested in her as her separate property, and might have clearly shown the property to be community property.

[1] We do not understand respondent to dispute that the presumption arising from a conveyance to a married woman that the property conveyed is her separate property may be overcome by parol testimony in a proper case; for of this there can be no question. Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308. Her contention is, however, as we understand it, that, where title to community property is taken in the name of the wife, the title of the husband is but an equitable title, and that the husband will not be allowed to prove such equitable title without specially pleading the facts upon which his equitable title rests.

[2] It cannot be denied that one relying upon an equitable title as a defense in an action in ejectment must specially plead the facts upon which his equitable defense rests.

[3] But this rule has never been held to apply in actions to quiet title as between husband and wife where title to community property has been taken in the name of the wife. In such case the title of the husband is more than a mere equitable title. Property acquired by either husband or wife during marriage, unless it be acquired by gift, devise, or descent, belongs to the marital community, and of this property the husband has absolute control, except that he may not without the consent of his wife make a gift thereof. The character of the ownership in community property was early discussed by Justice Field in Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 248, 73 Am. Dec. 538. The court was discussing the effect of a conveyance made to the wife, and our statutes concerning separate and community property of married people. It said: "The statute proceeded upon the theory that the marriage, in respect to property acquired during its existence, is a community of which each spouse is a member, equally contributing by his or her industry to its prosperity, and possessing an equal right to succeed to the property after dissolution, in case of surviving the other. To the community all acquisitions by either, whether made jointly or separately, belong. No form of transfer or mere intent of parties can overcome this positive rule of law. All property is common property, except that owned previous to marriage or subsequently acquired in a particular way."

In Gwynn v. Dierssen, 101 Cal. 564, 36 Pac. 103, an action to quiet title, it was said: "The deed from Taylor to Cornelia S. Gwynn [a married woman] vested the title in the marital community." The title to property may be vested in the marital community by a conveyance to either spouse. Nilson v. Sarment, 153 Cal. 524, 96 Pac. 315, 126 Am. St. Rep. 91; Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 323, 30 Pac. 547; Morgan v. Lones, 78 Cal. 58, 20 Pac. 248; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308; Bollinger v. Wright, 143 Cal. 292, 76 Pac. 1108; Hammond v. McCullough, 115 Cal. 216, decided April 7, 1911; Lewis v. Burns, 122 Cal. 358, 55 Pac. 132. The law places the ownership of community property in the husband. Fulkerson v. Stiles, 156 Cal. 704, 105 Pac. 966, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 181.

[4] All of the cases above cited involved the effect of a deed to a married woman, and all were actions to quiet title. In none was it sought to obtain a decree to compel a conveyance of the title acquired by the wife to the husband or his successor in interest, which would have been the more appropriate remedy if the conveyance to a wife vested in the husband an equitable title only. In some of said cases the facts were specially pleaded, while in others the allegations were in the usual form of a complaint to quiet title. This was so in Bollinger v. Wright, supra, and Hammond v. McCullough, supra, in each of which the property involved was acquired in the name of the wife and subsequent to the amendment of 1889 to section

164, Civ. Code, and in each of which the title of the husband—that is, of the marital community—was upheld upon parol evidence overcoming the presumption arising from the conveyance being to the wife.

The cases above cited certainly establish the rule that the husband, or one claiming under him, may maintain an action to quiet title against the wife, or one claiming under her, where title to community property has been taken in her name. This being true, it must follow that in such cases the title taken by the husband is not merely an equitable title, for it is well established that the holder of an equitable title only cannot maintain action to quiet title against the holder of the legal title. His action must be one to compel a reconveyance or to otherwise enforce a trust. Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 296, 19 Pac. 518; Nidever v. Ayres, 83 Cal. 39, 23 Pac. 192; Bryan v. Tormey, 84 Cal. 126, 24 Pac. 319; Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 456, 22 Pac. 658, 24 Pac. 48; Chase v. Cameron, 133 Cal. 231, 65 Pac. 460.

That the husband takes the whole title, both legal and equitable, under a deed to the wife of community property, is also supported by Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 9, 57 Pac. 690. It is there said of property claimed to have been purchased with community funds, "if the property was community property, the legal title remained in the husband, notwithstanding that the deed was taken in the name of the wife, and the wife could not pass title to it."

The court also quotes with approval from Pomeroy on Community Property the following: "If land being community property is conveyed to the wife during marriage, she takes no real title to it. The whole title, both legal and equitable, at once vests in the husband by means of the deed to the wife." See, also, In re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734.

[5] It is only where the deed expressly conveys the property to the wife "as her separate property" that it may be said that she takes the legal title in trust for the community, where the consideration is paid from community funds. Such was the case in Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 9, 28 Pac. 50. See, also, Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 359. In the case at bar the conveyance was not in terms to the wife as her separate property, but was in the usual form of a grant, bargain and sale deed.

The court erred in refusing to allow appellant to prove by parol testimony that the property conveyed by the deed to plaintiff did not become her separate property, but was the property of the marital community.

For this reason, the judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. DRESSER. (Cr. 322.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, July 13, 1911. On the Merits, Aug. 24, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1110*)—APPEAL—RECORD—REMISSION TO LOWER COURT FOR CORRECTION.

An appeal from a judgment of conviction, allowed by Pen. Code, § 1237, is required by section 1239 to be taken by oral announcement in open court when the judgment is rendered, and the clerk is required by section 1241 to immediately enter such announcement on the minutes, but his failure to do so does not invalidate the appeal. Section 1246 requires the clerk to transmit a copy of the minutes of the trial and the proceedings for new trial. Held that, where the papers sent up did not show any announcement of defendant's appeal, although the probability of such appeal was apparent, defendant would be given an opportunity to apply to the trial court for a correction of the minutes; the corrected record to be supplied upon a suggestion of diminution of the record.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 424*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF CODEFENDANT—ABSENCE OF DEFENDANT.

Statements made by an accomplice or codefendant, after the completion of the offense, and which are simply narratives of the events concerning the accomplished crime, are not admissible against the defendant on trial, unless made in his presence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

George W. Dresser was convicted of forgery, and he appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied, judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

Philip C. Boardman and Joseph L. Taaffe, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

HALL, J. This case was upon the calendar for argument on May 8th last, and, the only brief on file at that time being the opening brief of appellant, an order was made allowing respondent 15 days to file its brief and appellant 15 days to reply. The Attorney General subsequently filed, on behalf of respondent, a brief in which he asks that the appeal be dismissed and the judgment affirmed, because the record fails to show that an appeal has ever been taken by defendant to this court.

[1] The statute allows a defendant to appeal from a final judgment of conviction, from an order denying a motion for a new trial, and from an order, made after judgment, affecting the substantial rights of the defendant. Pen. Code, § 1237. The appeal from the judgment and from an order made after judgment must be taken by oral announcement in open court, made at the time of the rendition of the judgment or making of the order respectively. Pen. Code, § 1239. The fact of such announcement "must be by the clerk immediately entered in the minutes of the court. But the failure of the clerk to so enter the same in the minutes shall in no way affect or invalidate the appeal." Pen. Code, § 1241. Section 1246, Pen. Code, provides that, upon the appeal being taken, the clerk must within 20 days transmit to the clerk of the appellate court copies of certain papers, among which are "a copy of the minutes of the trial" and "a copy of other minutes of the action, including the proceedings on motion for arrest of judgment or new trial."

In accordance with this section, the clerk of the trial court did transmit to this court copies of the papers designated; but the minutes of the court nowhere show that the defendant took any appeal. The minutes of the clerk under date of January 30, 1911, show the rendition of judgment, and after reciting the judgment conclude with the statement that "the defendant was then remanded to the custody of the sheriff" etc., but make no mention of any appeal or of any announcement in open court of any appeal. If in fact the defendant did in open court take an appeal, as required by section 1239, Pen. Code, the clerk should immediately have made an entry thereof in the minutes, following the statement of the judgment, to the effect, substantially, that the defendant thereupon in open court personally, or through his attorney, orally announced that he appealed from such judgment.

The failure to immediately make such entry does not invalidate such appeal, if in fact taken (Pen. Code, § 1241); but we think the record before us should show that such appeal was taken. The orderly and proper way to do this is by the copy of the minutes transmitted by the clerk under section 1246, Pen. Code. When it is discovered that the clerk has failed to make the proper entry in his minutes of the taking of the appeal, the party aggrieved may and should apply to the trial court, upon due notice to the other party, for an order to require the clerk to correct and amend his minutes in accordance with the fact.

In this case appellant in his reply brief claims that his appeal was in fact taken, and asks to be allowed to supply the record thereof. There has been transmitted to this court the record provided for in section 1246, and also the reporter's transcript of the proceedings provided for in sections 1247 and 1247a. It is thus apparent that there is a strong probability that the appeal was in fact taken, but that the clerk inadvertently failed to make the proper entry thereof in his minutes. It was never intended that a defendant should lose his right to be heard on his appeal through such neglect of the clerk.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Section 1241, Pen. Code. Under the circumstances of this case we think that justice requires that appellant be allowed an opportunity to apply to the trial court for a correction of the minutes of such court. If such correction be obtained, he may, upon suggestion of diminution of the record, upon motion duly made, supply this court with the proper record of his appeal.

In order that appellant may take the necessary steps to perfect his record, we think the submission in this case should be set aside and vacated, and the cause placed upon the next calendar of this court for oral argument, and it is so ordered.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

On the Merits.

HALL, J. Upon the first calling of this case the Attorney General made the point that the record did not show that any appeal had been taken. Appellant has since filed with this court a certified copy of the minute entry from the clerk's record, showing that the appeal was taken by oral announcement in open court as the law prescribes. Appellant was jointly charged with one Bjerke with forging and uttering, with knowledge of the forgery, a Wells-Fargo money order. He was separately tried and convicted, and upon judgment being pronounced took an appeal from the judgment to this court.

[2] The principal point urged for a reversal is based upon the action of the court in permitting the prosecution to prove, by the officer who arrested the appellant's codefendant, Bjerke, certain statements, made to the officer by said Bjerke, tending to implicate defendant in the commission of the offense with which he was charged. These statements by Bjerke were not made in the presence of the defendant on trial. They were made after the completion of the offense for which appellant was being tried, and were in no wise made in furtherance of any common design or in or about the forgery or uttering of any writing whatever. The statements in question were simply narratives of past and completed events, and, not being made in the presence of the defendant upon trial, were clearly inadmissible as against him. Nothing is better established than that statements made by an accomplice or co-conspirator, after the completion of the offense, and which are simply narratives of the events concerning the accomplished crime, are not admissible against the defendant on trial, unless made in his presence. People v. Moore, 45 Cal. 19; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401; People v. Aleck, 61 Cal. 136; People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 571, 12 Pac. 783.

The testimony thus erroneously admitted tended strongly to prove appellant guilty of the offense of which he was convicted. The ruling of the court in admitting it over the objection of appellant was thus extremely prejudicial to him, and compels the overruling of the judgment. We find no other error in the record.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—VERDICTS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

In reviewing a verdict based on conflicting evidence, that of the prevailing party must be taken as true as well as all reasonable inferences deducible from such evidence.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

The exclusion of a verified complaint, introduced to discredit a witness, was not erroneous; the witness having admitted substantially everything contained in the complaint.

In an action by a carpenter against a lessor for improvements placed in the lessor's building for the use of the lessee, evidence that the lessor did not own the fixtures upon the leased premises, and was not to become the owner thereof at the end of the term being collateral to the issue, which was whether the lessor agreed to pay for them, the exclusion of such evidence was harmless error where both lessee and lessor had testified as to the agreement, as to ownership.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Thomas Walsh against N. E. Bradshaw. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. Manwell and F. H. Dam, for appellant. F. V. Meyers, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, in an action for the reasonable value of work and labor performed and materials furnished.

The assignors of plaintiff, Bailey Bros., a corporation, at the instance of the defendant, erected for her a two-story frame building on Folsom street, in San Francisco. At about the time of the completion of the building one Fred Roy, having made arrangements with the defendant for a lease of the lower floor of said building, requested Bailey Bros., through James Bailey, to do the necessary carpenter work to fit up that floor for a restaurant. This work was done, and the main question in the case is, Who was to pay for it, the defendant or Roy?

Several witnesses introduced by the plaintiff testified that the defendant told the assignors to proceed with the work for Roy, and that she would pay for it. Roy, who subsequently married the defendant, testified that he was to settle for the work with Bailey Bros. Defendant in her testimony said that she told Bailey Bros. that the proposed work was a matter wholly between Bailey Bros. and Roy; that she would have nothing to do with it. Robert Turpin, a witness called by the defendant, corroborated the testimony given by her and by Roy.

[1] Defendant's counsel have filed a painstaking brief, and they have made ingenious points indicating that Roy, and not the defendant, is liable for the reasonable value of the work done and materials furnished, but there is a plain conflict in the evidence, and when this is true, as has been said numberless times, appellate courts must consider all the evidence in favor of the prevailing party as true, as well as all reasonable inferences deducible therefrom. Woody v. Bennett, 88 Cal. 243, 26 Pac. 117; Meyer v. Gt. Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 381, 38 Pac. 82. So considering the testimony here, it abundantly supports the finding of the court that the defendant was to pay for the work. What has just been said applies as well to defendant's contention that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the court as to the reasonable value of the materials furnished and work done. As to these matters, there was a conflict in the evidence, and under the rule the finding cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[2] Prior to the commencement of this suit, E. J. Bailey, in his individual capacity, brought an action against the defendant to recover for the same work and labor and materials furnished forming the subject-matter of this suit. In the present action E. J. Bailey having testified that Bailey Bros. did the work and furnished the materials, the defendant sought on cross-examination of the witness to introduce his verified complaint in the former action for the purpose of discrediting and impeaching his present testimony. No error was committed by the trial court in sustaining the objection to this testimony interposed by the plaintiff, for the simple reason that the witness had already in his cross-examination admitted substantially everything sought to be shown by the offered complaint.

[3] By a ruling of the court defendant was prevented from showing that she never owned the fixtures put in the restaurant by Bailey Bros. She argues that if she did not own the fixtures, or was not to become the owner thereof at the end of the lease to Roy, this is a circumstance tending to show that she did not agree to pay Bailey Bros. for the making and installation of them, and that therefore the rejection of the testimony was error.

The proposed testimony called for an arrangement between the defendant and her husband collateral to any of the issues in the case. The husband claimed to own the fixtures, and he and his wife testified that he and not she was to pay for them, and under all the circumstances of the case we believe that the rejection of this testimony was a matter too inconsequential to merit serious consideration.

A careful examination of the record reveals no error. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the John Bollman Company against S. Bachman & Co., a partnership, and against S. Bachman and another. From a judgment that plaintiff take nothing as against the last-named defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Houghton & Houghton, for appellant. Heller, Powers & Ehrman, for respondents.

HALL, J. Plaintiff on the 4th day of January, 1907, filed a complaint in an action for goods sold and delivered, against "S. Bachman & Company." It was alleged in the complaint that "the defendant S. Bachman and Company was a copartnership," but no attempt was made in the original complaint to allege who comprised the copartnership. The prayer was for judgment against "the defendant." In other words, the action was brought under section 388, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that persons associated in business and transacting such business under a common name may be sued by such common name. Subsequently, and after the statute of limitations had run against the action, the plaintiff amended its complaint so as to make the title read: "The John Bollman Company, a Corporation, Plaintiff, vs. S. Bachman & Company, a Copartnership, Simon Bachman and Arthur Bachman, Copartners Doing Business Under the Firm Name of S. Bachman & Company, Defendants," instead of: "The John Bollman Company, a Corporation, Plaintiff, vs. S. Bachman & Company, a Copartnership, Defendant." The amended complaint also contains appropriate allegations to charge Simon Bachman and Arthur Bachman, and the prayer is for judgment against "the defendants." The defendants "Simon Bachman and Arthur Bachman, Copartners Doing Business Under the Firm Name of S. Bachman & Company," filed a demurrer to the amended complaint, pleading the bar of the statute of limitations. This demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. Thereafter plaintiff amended its complaint by eliminating from the title the words "Simon Bachman and Arthur Bachman, Copartners Doing Business Under the Firm Name of S. Bachman & Company." The defendant S. Bachman & Co. filed its answer thereto, and, after trial and verdict rendered, judgment was entered against S. Bachman & Co., a copartnership, on May 7, 1909. Subsequently, on May 17, 1909, a judgment was also entered upon demurrer sustained to the effect that plaintiff take nothing as against S. Bachman and Arthur Bachman. It is from this latter judgment only that any appeal was taken, the notice of appeal explicitly referring to and describing the latter judgment, both by the date of its entry and reciting the substance thereof.

The appellant contends that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and also in entering two different judgments in one action.

[1] Both questions are to be determined, we think, by the answer to the question, Did the amendment bring in new defendants? Respondents concede that no new cause of action was stated by the amended complaint, but contend that by the addition of Simon

Bachman and Arthur Bachman as parties defendant new parties were brought in, and that for the first time a cause of action was stated against them, to which they were entitled to plead the statute of limitations. The contention of the appellant, on the other hand, is that suit brought against a copartnership by the copartnership name only is a suit against all the members of the copartnership, in which the judgment can only be enforced under the section (388, Code Civ. Proc.) as it existed when this action was commenced, against the partnership property; and that consequently an amendment, adding as parties defendant the members of the firm, only enlarges the remedy by authorizing a judgment under which the individual property of the copartners may be taken in execution. He thus contends that this case comes within the rule of Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53.

In this contention we cannot agree. While it is true that in most respects a partnership is but a relation with no legal being as distinct from the members who comprise it, yet in many respects it is treated as a legal entity both as regards its rights and obligations. 30 Cyc. 423.

For the purposes of bringing suit under section 388, Code Civ. Proc., as it existed when this action was brought, a copartnership, we think, must be considered to be a legal entity distinct from its individual members. The section at that time read as follows: "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprise the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants, and had been sued upon their joint liability." While it is true that the section says the associates may be sued by such common name, the whole section indicates that the action in substance is an action against the associates as such, and not against the individuals. The section recognizes the association, or, as in this case, the copartnership, as a distinct entity, against which the partnership obligation may be enforced. In an action brought, as this was, the partnership is the only defendant.

This is the view taken by the court in Davidson v. Knox, 67 Cal. 143, 7 Pac. 413. Referring to section 388, Code Civ. Proc., the court there said: "In an action brought under this section it is not necessary to name all of the associates as defendants. In fact, the association designated by its common name is the only defendant, and the judgment authorized is one binding only the joint property of the association." While this language is obiter, and the case is not authoritatively binding, it is persuasive as expressing the views of the court as to the effect of the section. Where similar statutes exist, it has been held that a suit against a copartnership by its common name is not a suit against the individuals comprising the copartnership, and that under such statutes the copartnership is regarded as a legal entity distinct from its members. Hallowell v. McLaughlin Bros. (Iowa) 121 N. W. 1039; Brumwell v. Stebbins, 83 Iowa, 425, 49 N. W. 1020; Ruthven v. Beckwith, 84 Iowa, 715, 45 N. W. 1073, 51 N. W. 153; Sketchley v. Smith, 78 Iowa, 542, 43 N. W. 524; Baxter v. Rollins, 110 Iowa, 310, 81 N. W. 586; Good v. Red River Valley Co., 12 N. M. 245, 78 Pac. 46. It is true that the statute referred to in the above cases authorized a suit in terms against the copartnership as such, but it further provided for the enforcement of the judgment against the individual property of any member served with summons. On the contrary, our statute (section 388, Code Civ. Proc.) as it existed when this action was brought provided that the judgment was only binding on the joint property of the associates. Under our statute the action is in substance and effect an action against the association or copartnership as such, and not one against the individual members thereof. This is made manifest by the fact that the judgment can only be enforced against the joint property of all, and that jurisdiction is obtained to render judgment against the copartnership by service of summons on any member thereof. For this reason we think that, when plaintiff amended his complaint by adding as parties defendant the individual members of the copartnership, he brought in new defendants. Certainly he thus, at least, brought in defendants sued in a new and different capacity. As to such defendants the running of the statute was not tolled until the filing of the amended complaint. The court therefore did not err in sustaining the demurrer, nor in entering the judgment appealed from.

[2] Appellant in its brief asks that we modify the judgment entered against the copartnership so as to make it a judgment against the member of the firm served with summons in the action. Whether or not the amendment to section 388, Code Civ. Proc., adopted since this action was commenced, authorizes such a judgment, need not be determined. We are precluded from modifying the judgment by the fact that appellant did not appeal from such judgment. As before indicated, he limited his appeal to the judgment entered on the 17th day of May, 1909, and took no appeal from the judgment against the copartnership, which was entered on May 7, 1909.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 249*)—IRRIGATION—ABANDONMENT OF WATER RIGHTS.

Since grantees of land with appurtenant water rights could not demand that water be furnished from a particular one of several sources of supply from which they were entitled to water, so long as they were conveniently furnished the amount to which they were entitled, their failure to demand a supply from a source included in their deed would not be a waiver of their right to such supply, when the source from which water was formerly furnished them became inadequate.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 187*)—OBJECTIONS—PRESENTATION BELOW—ABSENCE OF PARTIES.

If in a suit to determine water rights, defendant's interest might be injuriously affected by failure to make other owners entitled to water from the same source parties, defendant should have requested that they be brought in, and, not having done so, cannot first raise the question of their absence on appeal.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Carrie F. Smith and others against the Cucamonga Water Company and others. From an order denying a motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry Goodcell and F. A. Leonard, for appellant Cucamonga Water Co. J. W. McKinley, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs brought this action against the Cucamonga Water Company and numerous other defendants, claiming rights to water owned or distributed by the Cucamonga Water Company, to determine plaintiffs' and defendants' respective rights to these waters, and to enjoin the defendants from interference with the plaintiffs' asserted rights. The defendants, severally or in groups, answered, setting up their respective rights and priorities. The court found the quantity of water to which each party plaintiff or defendant was entitled, fixed the relative priorities, and found that all the parties plaintiff and defendant were prior to the Cucamonga Water Company in their rights to the use of the allotted portions of the water. The defendant Cucamonga Water Company moved for a new trial upon the ground that the decision was not justified by the evidence and was against law. The motion was granted as to the defendant Jewett H. Cocke, administrator, and denied in all other respects. The defendant Cucamonga Water Company then appealed from this order, excepting that part of it granting its motion for a new trial against Cocke, administrator.

The water in controversy is that flowing in, found in, or developed in certain springs, streams, and tunnels upon the Cucamonga ranch. The predecessor of all the parties in interest is I. W. Hellman, who formerly owned the ranch and all the waters or sources of waters thereon. Upon the ranch is a short chain of hills known as Red Hills, whose trend is in a northerly and southerly direction. The sources of the water supply are both upon the east and the west side of these hills. The Cucamonga Company and the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company succeeded to the rights of Hellman in some of the lands of the Cucamonga ranch and in the Cucamonga creek and the "springs on the Cucamonga Ranch, subject to one-half of the waters of the east side belonging to the Cucamonga Vineyard Company and the Cucamonga Land & Irrigation Company." The right of the Cucamonga Vineyard Company and the Cucamonga Land & Irrigation Company to this reserved one-half of the waters of the east side are not in controversy. The Cucamonga Company and the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company proceeded to sell to individual owners tracts and parcels of their lands of the Cucamonga ranch, with appurtenant water rights from the water supply of the Cucamonga ranch which they had thus acquired from Hellman. These companies thus in time sold 456.89 miner's inches of water, and, speaking generally but with sufficient accuracy for the purposes of this consideration, there became appurtenant to each ten acres of land which they so sold one miner's inch of water. The Cucamonga Fruit Land Company succeeded to all the rights of the Cucamonga Company. In time the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company conveyed to this defendant, the Cucamonga Water Company, certain of its properties and rights and duties, all in subordination to and in full recognition of the Fruit Land Company's duty to supply water to the private owners, its grantees, and the grantees of its predecessor in interest. This deed recited that it was made in consideration of "the better performance of the supplying and distributing of water hereby directed to be conveyed and the water hereafter by the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company conveyed to the said Cucamonga Water Company, and the better supplying and distributing of the water to the following property: First, 456.89 inches of water to be applied by grantee in satisfaction of the following deeds and contracts heretofore made by grantee to sundry parties, to wit." Then are set forth the deeds to the land of the individual grantees with the quantity of water to which these lands are entitled. This deed contemplated the further development of water by the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company and by the Cucamonga Water Company, and contained an agreement by the former to convey to the latter within 20 years "the right to develop water on all lands on which the said 456.89 inches of water are now being obtained, so far as the same now belong to said Cucamonga Fruit Land Company, * * * and thereupon and thereafter the said Cucamonga Fruit Land Company shall be relieved from the duties and obligations in regard to the development or supply of the said water, other than as stockholders of the Cucamonga Water Company." As an added consideration for this grant, it is provided that the Cucamonga Water Company is to convey certain of its stock to the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company, and it is understood that the rights to water represented by that stock are subordinate to the 456.89 inches referred to. The Cucamonga Water Company accepted this deed, substituted itself for the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company, as the purveyor and distributor of the waters, undertook the performance of and became charged with the duty of supplying the water in accordance with the individual rights of the grantees. It also proceeded to do development work upon the west side to increase the water supply. Similar development work had been done by the predecessor of the Cucamonga Water Company on both the east and west sides. This development work consisted principally in the driving of tunnels to tap the secret and subterranean sources of the supply which showed in springs or ciénegas, and thus to increase the natural flow. The practice of the water company, speaking generally, was to supply the east side lands from waters of the east side springs, and the west side lands from waters of the west side springs. Of the east side waters it is to be remembered that one-half of the supply was reserved to the Cucamonga Vineyard Company and the Cucamonga Land & Irrigation Company, and was not available therefore for the purposes of the Cucamonga Water Company. Furthermore, a controversy had arisen between the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company and certain of the defendants represented by Mr. Waters (who may be designated as Mr. Waters' clients), which controversy was ended by a deed of settlement by which Mr. Waters' clients were given and took one inch of water to each eight acres of their land, this water to be taken from the east side source only. This settlement conveyed to Mr. Waters' clients 38.84 inches of water from the east side supply.

No difficulties arose between any of these parties while water remained abundant. A shortage occurred and the effects of it were first felt by those landowners who had been supplied from the east side sources. The Cucamonga Water Company, being entitled to the use of but one-half of the east side supply, this half being diminished by the quantity specifically conveyed to Waters' clients, the time came when the others who drew from the east side supply were not given their quantum of water. Upon demand for it they were told, in effect, that the Cucamonga Water Company recognized their rights as being limited to the east side supply, as against the contention of the landowners that they were entitled to their supply wherever and however developed from the springs of the Cucamonga ranch, which springs included the west side springs with the water developed from them by the tunnels, as well as the east side springs whose supply was inadequate.

These differences led to this action, and the principal question upon this appeal is that indicated: Whether the individual grantees are entitled by virtue of their deeds to call upon the Cucamonga Water Company, the distributing agent, to supply them with water from the west side springs as well as the east side, or whether their right is limited to the east side water alone.

The court found in favor of the plaintiffs' contention, and the findings are abundantly supported. These findings award to the Cucamonga Vineyard Company and the Cucamonga Land & Irrigation Company certain waters above referred to, and over these findings there is no complaint. Also there is no complaint over the findings which award to the Waters' clients the 38.84 inches of water to be taken from the east side. The attack is on the findings awarding to the remaining consumers of water the water developed from the east or the west side. The testimony supporting these findings as to the individual claimants is substantially the same in each case. It may be illustrated by the case of the plaintiff Carrie F. Smith. The facts in this connection are that the Cucamonga Company conveyed to Lewis Smith, her predecessor in interest, lands "with the same proportion of water from the springs belonging to the company that his land bears to all the land which can reasonably be irrigated for tropical culture with said water." This quantum of water, here somewhat indefinitely expressed, is made certain by the agreement of the parties that it shall be one miner's inch of water for every ten acres of land. The springs belonging to the company are made certain by all of the instruments as being "the springs on the Cucamonga ranch." The springs on the Cucamonga ranch include the west side springs as well as the east side, and the springs on both sides were known as the Cucamonga springs. No word of evidence shows an abandonment by these landowners of any of the rights which their deeds gave them to the west side waters, and in some instances purchasers were told by the agent of the Cucamonga Company that the springs on the west side belonged to the Cucamonga Company, and that the waters could be flumed over to the east side at any time they were needed. Throughout the whole case it is apparent that while, ordinarily, the east side users were supplied with water from the east side springs, there was no abandonment upon their part of a right to demand other water should the east side supply fail. And for this reason the contention of the appellants that the practical construction of the parties to these contracts—the practical construction of use—was such as to show an intent contrary to the findings and to estop the respondents from claiming the right to the use of the west side waters, is without substantial foundation.

[1] Of course, the cases are numerous where an indefiniteness in term or description is made definite and binding upon the parties by the practical construction which they put upon it. Typical of this is the case quoted from by appellants, Jennison v. Walker, 11 Gray (Mass.) 423. In that case an easement in land was granted in general terms without fixing its location. The right to the easement was exercised with the full consent and approval of the parties, and it was properly held that this selection so exercised fixed the location and description of the easement, since it was a practical construction put upon it. But that and the like cases are very different from the practical construction here sought to be upheld as defining the rights of the parties. Here was no exercise of any election by respondents.

[2] So long as they were being conveniently supplied with the water to which they were entitled, they had no right to demand that it should come from one or another source of supply. And, as they could not have insisted upon this, so their failure to insist cannot be construed as any waiver or abandonment of their right to a supply from another source covered by their grant should the source used for them prove inadequate. True it is that the contract and conveyance between the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company and the Cucamonga Water Company did not create new titles in these respondents, but it was a complete recognition upon the part of the water company of the rights and titles which actually existed, and it imposed upon the water company, as a substitute for the fruit land company, the duty of supplying that water in accordance with the rights of respondents and the duty of using reasonable endeavor in the maintenance and development of the supply in the execution of its trust. We are not by this to be understood as saying that any given amount of development work was necessary to be done, but the development work when done must have resulted in one of two things, either in increasing the natural supply of the springs and ciénegas, or, by the tunnels intercepting the supplies of these springs and ciénegas, in artificially increasing the supply at the sacrifice of the natural flow of the springs and ciénegas. Either was legitimate development work, but the water thus obtained was always subject to the rights of the respondents, since it was work done in and about and concerning springs and ciénegas of the ranch, to whose waters respondents were entitled.

Four hundred and fifty-six and eighty-nine hundredths inches is the amount of water which, under the deed of the Cucamonga Fruit Land Company to the Cucamonga Water Company, it is contemplated that the latter shall distribute to the private consumers. Of this water it is said that only 86 inches are represented by the parties litigant before the court, leaving 370 inches unrepresented, and it is contended that the judgment fixing the priorities of the owners of this 86 inches amongst themselves and decreeing to them a priority over the defendant water company is not justified by the evidence, and is injurious to the water company, in this: that it is the duty of the water company to distribute this 370 inches as well as the 86 in accordance with the priorities fixed by the times and the sequences of the deeds, and that this judgment, while binding upon the water company, is not binding upon the owners of the unrepresented 370 inches, who may be justly entitled to priority over the owners of the 86 inches, and that in obeying this judgment in injunction it may, upon the other hand, subject itself to damage suits at the instance of these unrepresented owners.

[3] But to this the answer is that, if the appellants' rights under this judgment could be injuriously affected by reason of the absence of other necessary parties, it was its duty appropriately to have called the court's attention to this fact, with a request that they be brought in. This it did not do.

[4] Moreover, the question which it raises is not one open to it upon an appeal such as this, from the order refusing to grant a new trial. There is no appeal from the judgment, under which alone this question if made properly to appear of record, could be reviewed. Great Western Co. v. Chambers, 153 Cal. 307, 95 Pac. 151; Younger v. Moore, 155 Cal. 767, 103 Pac. 221.

[5] Not only is this question one that cannot properly be raised upon motion for new trial, but the defect, if there be one, was waived by the failure to set up same by demurrer or answer, as held by Ashton v. Zeila M. Co., 134 Cal. 408, 66 Pac. 494, Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 151 Cal. 1, 89 Pac. 1097, and Bell v. Solomon, 142 Cal. 62, 75 Pac. 649; Code of Civil Procedure, § 434.

The defendant corporation and its predecessors in interest are such corporations as are contemplated by section 552 of the Civil Code, and to the controversy here the case of Hewitt v. San Jacinto Irrigation District, 124 Cal. 188, 56 Pac. 893, is apposite.

The findings are sustained as to all of the respondents saving C. H. Babcock. He was not a party to the action. The judgment awarding him water necessarily falls, but this determination does not affect the rights of any of the other parties respondent, as to whom the order appealed from is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA RAISIN GROWERS' ASS'N
v. ABBOTT et al. (S. F. 5,215.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1911.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—PLEADING CORPORATE EXISTENCE—ADMISSION BY ANSWER.

Where defendants in an action by an incorporated association admit by answer that the plaintiff is duly incorporated, they cannot question its capacity to bring the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

2. PARTIES (§ 26*)—DEFENDANTS—JOINDER OF PARTIES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 379, which provides that any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination, and sections 578 and 579, relating to judgments, an incorporated association, which was to pack, advertise, and sell raisins to be delivered by the growers, and which has entered into separate contracts with about 2,800 raisin growers, each of whom consented to a commingling of his raisins with those purchased from other growers, and agreed to accept in payment the average price per pound paid for all of a like grade, may properly join all the growers as defendants in an action for an accounting and recovery from those growers who had received sums in excess of their ratable proportion for the benefit of those who had received less than their share and for a distribution of funds in its hands to those entitled to it and also creditors who had commenced actions against it, since all were equitably interested in the fund which had been derived from the sale of the season's product, and was held by plaintiff for distribution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. ACTION (§ 50*)—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—PARTIES AND INTERESTS INVOLVED.

A raisin growers' association which had entered into separate contracts with about 2,800 raisin growers for the purpose of receiving, packing, and selling their product and accounting for the proceeds joined all the growers as parties defendant in a single action for an accounting by those of the growers who had received sums in excess of their share for the benefit of those who had received less than their share, and for the distribution of a fund in its hands. Held, that there was no misjoinder of causes of action, since the object of the action was the accounting and distribution to the parties who had interests in the fund growing out of their contractual relations with the association.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 227*)—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—WAIVER.

A provision in contracts between a raisin growers' association and a large number of growers that the contracts were delivered to the association in escrow, and were not to become operative until 85 per cent. of the raisin growing acreage of the state was secured by contract, was waived by the growers' acceptance of the terms of the contract, their delivery of raisins, and their acceptance of payments under the contracts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1038-1041; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

5. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 89*)—ACCOUNTING—PERSONS ENTITLED—AGENT.

The general rule is that in equity an agent cannot demand an accounting from his principal, where an accounting is the principal purpose of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 229; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

6. EQUITY (§ 39*)—COMPLETE RELIEF—TAKING AND STATING ACCOUNT.

An association incorporated to act as an agent and factor in the handling and disposing of raisins for individuals and partnerships, and having power to contract, brought an action in equity against all the parties with whom it had contracted for an accounting from certain of them who had received from it more than they were entitled to, so that the excess might be recovered and returned to those who had not received their full share, and also for an equitable distribution of a fund in its hands, and for the adjustment of certain claims of creditors. Held, that, as an accounting was necessary to ascertain how much money each defendant was entitled to receive, equity, having taken jurisdiction, would proceed to administer full relief, and would order an accounting, and settle the whole controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 104-114; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

7. ACCOUNT (§ 1*)—EQUITABLE ACTION—DEMAND NOT NECESSARY.

Where an association in its action for the adjustment of claims against it and for an accounting by certain defendants who had been overpaid by it for the benefit of other defendants who had received less than their share under contracts with it, and for the equitable distribution of a fund in its hands, does not ask any money judgment for itself, no demand is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

8. ACCOUNT (§ 17*)—PLEADINGS—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

In an action in equity by plaintiff, an association incorporated for the purpose of acting as agent in the handling and disposing of raisins for individuals and copartnerships, and which had entered into contracts with a large number of growers to receive and sell their crops, for an accounting and recovery from parties contracting with it who had been overpaid and for the distribution of a fund in its hands, part of the defendants answered specially, but did not aver that the defendants or any of them participated in any unlawful design, although it was averred that the association was determined to secure contracts for 85 per cent. of the entire product of raisins for the year. Held that, under the plea, evidence that the association was organized for the purpose of creating a monopoly of the raisin business of the United States, and that its contracts made in pursuance of its unlawful scheme were unenforceable, was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account, Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

9. SALES (§ 48*)—ILLEGALITY—RELIEF OF PARTIES.

It is no defense to an action for the price of goods sold that the seller knew that the goods were bought for an illegal purpose, if it is not made a part of the contract that they shall be used for that purpose, and if the seller has done nothing in aid or furtherance of the unlawful design; but the principle does not apply to cases where the offense intended is of such enormity that no man having knowledge of the design can escape incrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

10. PLEADING (§ 8*)—FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

The complaint in an action in equity by an association incorporated to receive and sell raisins for accounting of moneys paid by it to certain growers who had contracts with it, and for a distribution among all of such growers of a fund then in its hands, averred that some defendants had received more of the proceeds from the sale of the raisins than the amount to which they were entitled, and that others had received less than their shares. Held that, as the averments must have been based in part upon plaintiff's knowledge of the net amount derived from the sale of raisins, and number of persons entitled to the benefit of such fund, the averments were statements of fact, and not conclusions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-23½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1170*)—HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO RULE ON OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, which provides that no error shall be regarded unless it affects substantial rights, the failure of the trial court to rule upon reserved objections to evidence offered in support of a special defense is harmless, in view of the court's conclusion that the special defense was not so pleaded as to be available.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by the California Raisin Growers' Association, a corporation, against Andrew Abbott and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and Abbott and a part of the other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, L. L. Cory, Cartwright & Cashin, Snow & Freeman, Johnston & Jones, Jas. Gallagher, M. F. McCormick, J. O. Traber, W. A. Conn, Lewis H. Smith, Geo. B. Graham, A. M. Drew, J. A. Allen, Maurice E. Power, Frank Kauke, E. E. Shepard, Stanton L. Carter, H. C. Tupper, W. D. Foote, and Sutherland & Barbour, for appellants. M. K. Harris and M. B. Harris, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Certain defendants appeal from a judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff is an association, incorporated under the laws of California for the purpose, among others, as stated in the complaint, of "acting as an agent and factor in the handling and disposal of raisins for individuals, corporations, associations and copartnerships, and having power to contract," as thereafter alleged. It appears that in the year 1903 plaintiff entered into contracts with some 2,800 persons, owners and growers of raisins, to pack and sell their crops. These contracts were all just alike, and each provided: (1) That the grower thereby assigned to the association an undivided one-fifth part of his raisins produced that year; (2) that the association agreed to undertake the inspection, packing and sale of said entire crops, to establish and maintain uniform grades of raisins, and to procure such packing to be done in conformity therewith, also to make sales under its own trade-mark and guaranty of quality, and to make said sales as speedily as possible and for the highest obtainable prices; (3) that the growers should cultivate the crops and deliver at packing houses designated by the association; (4) that the association would advance money necessary for the packing, storing, and insuring of the raisins; (5) that at any time after the delivery of the crop the association would make advances upon the raisins so delivered to the amount of at least one cent per pound; (6) that all raisins as delivered should be mingled and sold with other raisins of a like grade and accounted for at the average of prices at which raisins of such grade should have been sold by the association; (7) that the association might hypothecate the interests of the growers as security for the repayment of moneys to be borrowed from third persons; (8) and that the association should turn over to the grower on certain conditions three-fourths of the net proceeds of its one-fifth interest in the crop.

Under these contracts vast quantities of raisins were delivered to plaintiff. These were intermingled, packed, and sold, and sums of money were advanced to certain growers, some of them receiving as high as three cents per pound, others less than that, and others nothing at all. Large sums of money were borrowed and repaid as authorized by the contracts. When the entire crop had been sold at the average price of less than three cents per pound, the association had in its possession a large sum of money which by this action it seeks to have distributed to the growers entitled to share in the funds. It also desires to compel those growers who have been paid more than their ratable proportion of the proceeds of the sales for the season to return the excess in order that all of those who contracted with the association to deliver their raisins to it may be treated alike, each receiving the same allowance per pound as that paid to purchasers of the same grade of raisins. The bill also asks for an accounting, and it includes as defendants, not only the growers who were parties to the contracts above mentioned, but also certain persons who had commenced actions against the association and secured attachments against its property. There is also included as a defendant one of the association's alleged debtors, owing it according to the averments of the bill, a large sum of money. But the court found that this had been paid.

The action was tried, after issue joined, an accounting was had, and this appeal is prosecuted by some 600 of the growers, who had received from the association more than the share of money to which the court held that they were entitled, and against whom the judgment runs for the excessive amounts paid to them severally.

[1] There is nothing in the first point made by appellants that the association is without standing to bring this action, because it never filed with the county clerk a copy of its by-laws as required by statute, for they admitted by answer that plaintiff was duly incorporated.

[2] The next contention of appellants is that their demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action and of parties defendant should have been sustained. Appellants maintain that, as plaintiff entered into separate contracts with the growers, there is no basis for a joinder of actions against them; but the answer to this contention is that, although each grower separately contracted with the association, each consented to a commingling of his raisins with those purchased from other producers, and each agreed to accept in payment for his raisins the average price per pound paid for all raisins of a like grade, and each is therefore equitably interested in the fund derived from the sale of the season's product and held by plaintiff for distribution. Section 379, Code Civ. Proc., provides that: "Any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the question involved therein." See, also, sections 578, 579, Code Civ. Proc.; Shakespear v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638-641, 20 Pac. 294, 11 Am. St. Rep. 327; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17-32, 28 Pac. 788.

The rule above announced applies with equal force to all the growers and to the debtor, and the attaching creditors included as defendants, because the latter parties claim interests in funds, parts of which at least are involved in the obligation of the plaintiff to the persons who delivered their raisins to the association, and which, therefore, should be subjected to a proper distribution. It may be said as truly in this case as in People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 361: "The parties are all interested in the principal question raised by the complaint. The issues tendered are simple, and foreshadow no embarrassment to a convenient and orderly trial; and by the joinder objected to a multiplicity of suits has been avoided." See, also, Daly v. Ruddell, 137 Cal. 674, 70 Pac. 784, and cases there cited.

[3] That which has been said with reference to alleged misjoinder of parties applies with equal force to the issue of misjoinder of causes of action raised by the demurrer. The vital matter in this action was the distribution of the fund held by plaintiff. The material consideration is not how the different defendants acquired their respective interests in the trust fund to be distributed, but that they do actually have such interests growing out of the contractual relations between plaintiff and defendants, and between the defendants themselves. The demurrers were properly overruled.

[4] By their answers appellants aver that the contracts were delivered to plaintiff in escrow, and were not to become operative until 85 per cent. of the raisin-bearing acreage of the state was secured by contract; that such percentage was never brought within the control of plaintiff; and that, therefore, the contracts could not be enforced. A complete answer to this contention is that the growers did deliver their raisins under the contracts, and accepted money from the plaintiff. Even if delivery of the contracts in escrow, with the proviso alleged, were tolerated (and it is not—Civ. Code, 1056, 1626, 1627), the acceptance of the terms of the contracts by the producers of raisins waived the escrow agreement.

[5] Appellants contend very forcibly that the complaint fails to disclose a state of facts entitling plaintiff to an accounting; that, occupying as it did the fiduciary relation toward the appellants of a factor, it was bound to keep proper books of account containing correct entries of all of its transactions. They cite numerous authorities to the effect that, while a principal having reposed confidence in his agent may compel the latter to account where the matters for which an accounting is sought are peculiarly within the knowledge of the agent, the reverse of the rule is not enforced in equity, and that, generally speaking, an agent may not demand an accounting from his principal.

[6] There can be no doubt that this is the rule where an accounting is the principal purpose of the action, but here an accounting was only ancillary to the main purpose of the action, which was to have the moneys in the hands of the plaintiff equitably distributed. This was not for a money judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendants. The only judgment for money was that requiring contribution by the defendants who have been overpaid, not to respondent, but to other codefendants. This action obviously was brought to avoid a multiplicity of suits, although there is no formal allegation to that effect. Equity having once taken jurisdiction, it was within the power of the chancellor to grant full relief. The interests of the raisin growers were not mere matters of bookkeeping to be determined from plaintiff's accounts, because there were certain claims against the fund held by the association, which had not been adjusted. An accounting was necessary, therefore, not to establish any claim of money due from the growers to the association, because plaintiff asserted none, but to ascertain correctly how much money each grower was entitled to receive.

[7] For this reason, no demand upon the defendants was necessary as the association was asking nothing for itself, but merely sought such accounting as would fix the proper distribution of the money held by it for its clients. The rule to be applied in cases of this kind is well stated in 1 Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure, 418, as follows: "When a court of equity once acquires jurisdiction upon equitable grounds, it will proceed to do complete justice and administer full relief. To this end it will order an accounting, and will settle the whole controversy even to the extent of adjudicating matters of purely legal cognizance." See, also, Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 255.

[8] We now come to the consideration of the special defense that the plaintiff association was organized for the purpose of creating a monopoly of the raisin business of the United States, and that, therefore, its contracts made in pursuance of this unlawful scheme were not enforceable. Much evidence was offered on this issue and rejected by the court. Without going into the details of these offers to prove matters pertinent to a showing that the plaintiff was engaged in the upbuilding of a monopoly, it is sufficient to say that nearly all of the rejected testimony, according to the theory of appellants, "tended to show that the plan and scheme of plaintiff was to create a monopoly in the handling and selling of raisins during that season, and that the natural consequence of the acts of the plaintiff was to create an unlawful combination in restraint of trade." If appellants were entitled to establish their thesis, doubtless much of this offered evidence was admissible, but an examination of their pleadings shows that they did not attribute to the defendants, or to any of them, guilty complicity in the alleged scheme for the arbitrary fixing of the price of raisins, not in accordance with the law of supply and demand, and for the exclusion of all raisins from the packing houses except those delivered to plaintiff under contract. The direct objects of the contracts between the association and the growers were the packing, advertising, and sale of the raisins to be delivered by the producers. These were not illegal purposes, as disclosed by the contracts themselves, and we do not understand the appellants to contend that the growers were parties to the monopolistic scheme. The answer does not contain any averment that the defendants, or any of them, participated in any unlawful design, but the appellants invoke that rule of equity which leaves the parties to an unlawful agreement in exactly the position in which it finds them, without tendering aid to either or any of them. In support of the assertion that this is an action to enforce contracts in restraint of trade, appellants cite section 1673 of the Civil Code, and, among other authorities, Santa Clara Valley Milling & Lumber Co. v. Hayes et al., 76 Cal. 387, 18 Pac. 391, 9 Am. St. Rep. 211; Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 110, 27 Pac. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 102; Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 Pac. 581, 31 Am. St. Rep. 242; Getz Bros. & Co. v. Federal Salt Co., 147 Cal. 115, 81 Pac. 416, 109 Am. St. Rep. 114. All of these cases arose upon efforts to enforce contracts in restraint of trade by and against parties in pari delicto, and in each it was made a part of the contract that the property to be delivered was to be used for an unlawful purpose. From the answers in this case the most that can be claimed with reference to the guilty knowledge of the raisin growers that plaintiff was trying to form a monopoly was the published statement that the association was determined to secure contracts for 85 per cent. of the entire production of raisins for the year. The answer averred such publication.

[9] But, granting that those who delivered raisins knew of this design, that fact alone would not prevent them from recovering the full value of their merchandise, or from participating in the distribution of money received from the sale of it. Even granting that the producers knew of the unlawful design in restraint of trade, which, it was alleged, plaintiff was endeavoring to accomplish, that fact would not of itself be sufficient to defeat this action. The true rule is clearly stated by Selden, J., in Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y. 176, 67 Am. Dec. 132: "I consider it, therefore, as entirely settled by the authorities to which I have referred, that it is no defense to an action brought to recover the price of goods sold that the vendor knew that they were bought for an illegal purpose, provided it is not made a part of the contract that they shall be used for that purpose, and, provided, also, that the vendor has done nothing in aid or furtherance of the unlawful design." This rule was properly qualified in the opinion of Comstock, J., on a motion for reargument, wherein it was held that the principle did not apply to cases where the offense intended is of such enormity that no man having knowledge of the design can remain neutral without being in a just sense a criminal himself, as in the case of poison or a deadly weapon purchased for the purpose of murder. The special defense failed to allege facts sufficient to bring defendants within the rule denying relief to participants in illegal contracts, and therefore the court did not err in refusing to admit evidence upon this issue.

[10] The complaint contained averments in effect that some defendants had received more of the proceeds from the sale of the raisins than the amount to which they were entitled, and that others had received less than their shares. Appellants take the position that these are statements of conclusions of law, and need not be traversed. Plaintiff's reply to this is that these allegations might have been omitted from the complaint without impairing its statement of a good cause of action, but, assuming that their omission would have been fatal to the pleading, we cannot agree with appellants that they present mere conclusions of law, founded, as they must have been in part, upon plaintiff's knowledge of the net amount derived from the sale of raisins, the number of persons entitled to the benefit of such fund, and the quantity and quality of raisins delivered by each. In the case at bar we may appropriately quote the language of this court in Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 578, 27 Pac. 927 (25 Am. St. Rep. 219): "It is true that pleadings should state the ultimate facts, and not the probative facts or conclusions of law. But what are ultimate facts and what conclusions of law are often mixed and uncertain questions. Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. 161; Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 299, 14 Pac. 794. The same averment may be of a fact or of a conclusion of law, according to the context. We think the averments here complained of should be held sufficient as statements of fact."

[11] The trial court failed to rule upon certain reserved objections to offered evidence. This is assigned by appellants as error, and the case of Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 475, 55 Pac. 398, is cited as authority. The reservations of rulings were all with reference to evidence offered in support of the special defense that the contracts were part of a conspiracy in restraint of trade. Plaintiff's attorneys objected to all of this evidence, but by agreement it was received subject to the court's later ruling. The court plainly intimated that the ruling, if made at that time, would be against the admission of the proffered evidence, saying: "I certainly do not wish to rule hastily. The questions that strike me very strongly at this time are as to whether you, as a party to the contract, have a right to make that objection at all; and, secondly, as to whether the pleadings in the case justify it." There was no later ruling relative to this matter, but, in view of our conclusion that the defense resting upon an alleged conspiracy in restraint of trade was not so pleaded as to be available, this error was immaterial. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.

We find no other matters in the record requiring particular attention. From the above discussion, it follows that the judgment and order from which these appeals are taken must be affirmed.

LAW CREDIT CO. v. TIBBITTS.
(L. A. 2,681.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 334*)—RESCISSION—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

In absence of agreement as to the terms of rescission, upon rescission of a contract to purchase land for the purchaser's default in payments, the purchaser may recover partial payments made, less the damage suffered by his breach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 961; Dec. Dig. § 334.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 417*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING CONTRACT.

Where an agreement between the vendor and purchaser for rescission upon default in payment only required the vendor to release the purchaser from her obligation to purchase, and did not require the vendor to refund payments made on the price or taxes, or require the purchaser to pay for the use of the premises or damages arising from her breach, it will be assumed that such claims were mutually waived, and it cannot be shown by parol that any of such acts were to be done by the parties.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by the Law Credit Company against Arthur G. Tibbitts. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellant. Oscar C. Mueller and Wm. M. Hiatt, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. In May, 1907, by contract in writing, the defendant agreed to sell and convey, and plaintiff's assignor, Julia S. Wildey, agreed to purchase, for the sum of $2,500, a town lot with the dwelling thereon. Five hundred dollars was to be paid at the date of the agreement, $1,000 in January, 1908, and the balance in May, 1908. Time was declared to be of the essence of the contract, and default in either of the deferred payments was to free the defendant of all obligation to convey, and to work a forfeiture of all previous payments. Mrs. Wildey made the cash payment of $500, and in pursuance of the contract entered into possession of the premises early in October, 1907, and so remained until late in November, 1908, a period of nearly 14 months, at the end of which time she was in default as to both of the deferred payments stipulated in the contract, but she had paid, pursuant to the contract, taxes and street assessment amounting in the aggregate to about $33. The value of the use and occupation of the premises was $25 per month, aggregating for the time Mrs. Wildey was in possession $350.

In this situation the parties agreed to rescind the contract of sale and purchase and reduced their agreement to writing, wherein, after reciting the making of the contract, the possession of Mrs. Wildey under it, her default in the stipulated payments and the desire of the defendant to regain possession, it was "mutually agreed that said contract and agreement of sale of May 21st, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and the said Julia S. Wildey agrees upon the execution of this memorandum by Arthur G. Tibbitts and herself that she will within ten (10) days thereafter deliver up possession of the said premises to the said Arthur G. Tibbitts with the furniture received from the said Tibbitts when the possession of the said premises passed to the said Wildey. In case of failure of either party to this agreement to perform same in accordance with the terms thereof, the same shall be void and without prejudice to the rights of either party thereto. The said Julia S. Wildey also agrees to deliver said property to the said Tibbitts without cloud of title or lien thereon by her imposed. Dated this 20th day of November, 1908. Arthur C. Tibbitts. Mrs. Julia S. Wildey."

In compliance with the terms of this agreement, Mrs. Wildey delivered the possession of the premises to the defendant, and executed and delivered a quitclaim deed for the purpose of removing the cloud upon his title resulting from the record of his agreement to convey. She thereupon demanded repayment of the $500 paid by her on account of the purchase price of the property, together with the sums paid by her for taxes and street assessments during her occupancy of the premises with interest, amounting in all to $598.75, offering at the same time to remit $180 of this amount as compensation for the use of the premises during her occupancy. Upon the refusal of this demand the plaintiff, her assignee, commenced this action. By way of defense the defendant pleaded the written agreement to rescind, alleging that by mutual mistake one of the terms of the agreement had been omitted by which he was to be released from all obligations under the original contract, and Mrs. Wildey was to waive any and all claim to that portion of the purchase price which she had paid, in consideration of her release from any claim for compensation for the use of the premises. He also alleged that he had been damaged to the extent of $500 by Mrs. Wildey's breach of her contract on account of the depreciation in value of the property. Both of these defenses were sustained by the superior court, where the defendant recovered a judgment for his costs. From this judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appealed to the District Court of Appeal, where the judgment and order were reversed. An order was subsequently made transferring the cause to this court for hearing and decision.

In their printed argument counsel have discussed two questions: First, whether a case was made for reforming the agreement to rescind; and, second, whether the defendant was damaged to the extent of $500, or at all, by Mrs. Wildey's breach of her contract to purchase.

In the view we take of the case, we shall not have occasion to consider the first question. With regard to the second, it may be stated that both parties rely upon a line of decisions of which Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. 280, 18 Am. St. Rep. 187, and Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. 749, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257, are typical. In the first of these cases the contract of purchase and sale had been brought to an end by the default of both parties; in the second, a mutual rescission of a similar contract was implied from the acts and admissions of the parties.

[1] In each was presented the case of a naked rescission without any agreement between the parties as to terms, in consequence of which it remained for the law to supply, and the courts to enforce, equitable terms of restoration and compensation, and it was held to be equitable that the purchaser, notwithstanding his default, should recover the amount of his partial payments less the damage suffered by the vendor by reason of the vendee's breach of the contract. This has been the rule of decision in a number of similar cases since decided and would govern the disposition of this case except for an important distinction to which counsel have not adverted.

[2] Here was a mutual agreement to rescind—express and reduced to writing—containing express terms of settlement and, it must be presumed, all the terms upon which the parties had agreed for the settlement of their controversy—an agreement not to be varied or added to by parol. The parties have here done for themselves what, in the absence of express agreement, the court must have done for them. They have adjusted their reciprocal rights by defining their respective obligations. What Mrs. Wildey was to do she has done. The defendant was to do nothing except to release her from the obligation she incurred by her agreement to purchase and that he has done. The contract contains no stipulation obliging him to refund payments made by her on account of purchase price or for taxes or assessments, or obliging her to compensate him for the use of the premises or for damages arising from her breach of the original contract. The inference is that there was a mutual waiver of all such claims—that it was not a partial, but a complete, settlement of their controversy—such as would have been decreed by a court under sections 3406, 3407, and 3408 of the Civil Code.

In this view it is—as above stated—unnecessary to consider whether the defendant made a case for the reformation of the contract; for he is as fully protected by the absence of any agreement to repay the $598.75, as he would be by an express release of any claim for repayment. In the same view it also becomes unnecessary to inquire whether he made out his claim for damages.

The judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

MOODEY v. CONNECTICUT FIRE INS.
CO. of HARTFORD, CONN.
(S. F. 5,589.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1911.)

INSURANCE (§ 324*)—FIRE INSURANCE—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—FALLING OF PART OF BUILDING.

Under the provisions of a fire policy that if any part of the building fall, except as a result of fire, all insurance shall immediately cease, the falling of a material part of the building before fire reaches it, though not increasing the fire risk, avoids the policy.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by R. C. Moodey against the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. B. Ware and T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. Thomas J. Geary, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The policy was formally the same as those considered in Fountain v. Connecticut Fire Insurance Company, 158 Cal. 760, 112 Pac. 546, and Davis v. Connecticut Fire Insurance Company, 158 Cal. 766, 112 Pac. 549. As in those cases the defendant depended upon the "fallen building" clause in the policy, the entire defense being based upon the allegation and proof that a material portion of the building in which plaintiff's store was located had fallen as a result of earthquake before the fire attacked plaintiff's goods. There was no attempt made in this case as in Davis v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co., supra, to prove that the fire was in progress before any material portion of the building was shaken down. The uncontradicted testimony was that the fire did not reach the store owned by Moodey until long after the earthquake. This case is entirely analogous to the Fountain Case. The evidence showed without any important contradiction that a material portion of the building had fallen before the fire occurred. That a substantial portion of the structure was destroyed by the earthquake there can be no serious doubt. The testimony of defendant's witnesses clearly established that fact, and there was no contradiction of their statement by plaintiff's witnesses worthy of notice. Irving Brush, called by plaintiff, testified that, as far as he could see, the rear wall of the building in which Moodey's store was located was standing a few minutes after the earthquake. He admitted that he did not look at the front of the building, and that there might have been a small portion missing from the rear wall when he saw it. L. W. Burris testified that the top story of the Moodey Building was "pretty badly shaken up," but that the lower story seemed to be nearly intact. Virgil Hoffer, another witness for the plaintiff, said: "I think that the whole of the front of the building occupied by Mr. Moodey was out. That's true at the time I first went there." It will thus be seen that, as in the Fountain Case, there was really no conflict of testimony, and it was thoroughly proven that a portion of the building sufficient to establish defendant's case had fallen prior to the fire.

The following instruction was given: "It is not sufficient for the defendant, in order to avoid its policy, to establish the fact that the building described in the policy in suit had before it began to burn, if you find that it was burned, suffered some injury, or that any part of the walls of said building had fallen before the contents of the building were destroyed by fire, to avoid its policy herein; but the defendant must establish by a preponderance of evidence that such material portion of the building had fallen before the fire started as would have increased the fire risk which defendant assumed by its policy on such building and its contents. And, if the evidence does not establish the falling of such a material portion of the building, then I instruct you to find for the plaintiff." This same instruction was carefully considered by the court in Fountain v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co., supra, and the giving of it declared to be error. It is not necessary to review any of the other points made, as the case cannot be tried again unless evidence decidedly different from that presented at the former trial may be secured.

The order from which this appeal is taken is reversed.

In re MITCHELL'S ESTATE. (L. A. 2,882.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 675*)—ESTATE IN TRUST—PRECATORY WORDS.

Where a testatrix devised and bequeathed practically all her estate to be absolutely owned by her daughter, and, after bequeathing $5 to a granddaughter, stated that she relied upon her daughter to make further suitable provisions to the granddaughter, stating that it was her daughter's intention to adopt the granddaughter, no trust was created in the estate given to the daughter.

2. COURTS (§ 97*)—RULES OF DECISION—DECISIONS OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

A decision by the United States Supreme Court interpreting the law of precatory trusts is not binding upon the state courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 329–334; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. WILLS (§ 675*)—PRECATORY TRUST.

Where a testatrix whose only descendants were her daughter and a granddaughter made a number of wills, in all of which save the last she made provisions for the granddaughter, in one of them creating a trust for the granddaughter, those circumstances, together with the fact that the granddaughter has had no estate and that her father had no estate, were insufficient to convert testatrix's expression of confidence that her daughter would suitably provide for the granddaughter into a direct demand raising a precatory trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587–1589; Dec. Dig. § 675.*]

4. WILLS (§ 675*)—ESTATES IN TRUST—IMPLICATION OF TRUST.

The only descendants of testatrix were a daughter and a granddaughter. The fourth clause of the will bequeathed the sum of $5 to the granddaughter, and stated that the testatrix relied upon her daughter to make suitable provisions for the granddaughter. The fifth clause devised and bequeathed the rest and residue of the estate to be held absolutely by the daughter.

Testatrix had made previous wills in which she had made other bequests to the granddaughter, and in this will there were specific bequests to the daughter. Held, that neither the use of the term "rest and residue," nor the placing of the clause expressing confidence and reliance before the residuary clause, raise a precatory trust by implication.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Susan G. Mitchell, deceased. Lucille R. Bedford appealed from a decree distributing the entire residue of the estate to Lucie M. Lambourn. Affirmed.

McNutt & Hannon and George P. Adams, for appellant. Horace S. Wilson and Edwin A. Meserve, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution of the estate of Susan G. Mitchell, deceased.

The decree distributes the entire residue of the estate to Lucie M. Lambourn. The appellant claims that the will of the deceased creates a trust in the property in her favor to the extent of a suitable and adequate provision for her maintenance. Whether or not it does is the only question for determination.

The trust is not expressly declared, but is created, if at all, by a certain precatory clause in the will. The subject of precatory trusts was carefully considered by this court in Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071, and Kauffman v. Gries, 141 Cal. 295, 74 Pac. 846, and certain principles governing such cases were thereby established. The primary rule is stated in both cases as follows: "The cardinal rule for the construction of all wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator; and this intention is to be ascertained from the words of his will, taking into view, when necessary or appropriate, the circumstances under which it was made, if there is an uncertainty in its language. Civ. Code, § 1318.

[1] The estate of the testatrix was of the value of about $200,000. She left no descendants, except one daughter, the respondent, Lucie M. Lambourn, and the appellant, Lucille R. Bedford, who is the child of Eileen G. Bedford, a deceased daughter. The first three items in the will give to Lucie M. Lambourn, first, the residence of the testatrix; second, the furniture therein and the clothes and jewelry; and, third, certain shares in a corporation which the appraisement states to be of no value. The alleged trust arises, as it is contended, from the provisions of items 4 and 5, which are as follows:

"Item 4. I bequeath unto my granddaughter, Lucille Richmond Bedford (christened Lucille Toland Bedford), child of my deceased daughter, Eileen G. Bedford (née Mitchell), the sum of $5.00, and I rely upon my daughter, Lucie M. Lambourn, to make further and suitable necessary provision for my said granddaughter. It is the intention of my daughter to adopt my said granddaughter as her own child, in the event that the consent thereto of the father of my said granddaughter (Charles A. Bedford), can be obtained. In which event, as her own child, I am sure my daughter would adequately provide for my granddaughter Lucille. In the event that the consent of said Charles A. Bedford, father of my said granddaughter, cannot be obtained so that my daughter can legally adopt her as her own child my said granddaughter Lucille, I rely upon my daughter to make at all times suitable and adequate provision for my said granddaughter, believing that my daughter Lucie will give to Lucille the love and care of a mother, and that she will, both during Lucille's youth and upon her arriving at majority, amply and carefully make provision for her.

"Item 5. I devise and bequeath to my said daughter, Lucie M. Lambourn, all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate of whatsoever nature and wherever situated, to be held and owned by her in her own absolute right."

Taking up first the question of the effect of these provisions as found from the language alone, without aid from the attending circumstances, we find the general rules of interpretation laid down in the Estate of Marti, supra, after a full consideration. This case was followed in Kauffman v. Gries, supra, and we see no reason for departing therefrom. They are thus stated: "Precatory words may or may not create a trust, according as they are used, and whether, in any particular will, they have been used for this purpose, will depend upon the construction to be given to that will. The question for determination is whether the devisee or legatee is the beneficiary, or merely a trustee for others, of the gift bestowed upon him; whether the wish or desire or recommendation that is expressed by the testator is meant to govern the conduct of the party to whom it is addressed; or whether it is merely an indication of that which he thinks would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion of that party, leaving it, however, to the party to exercise his own discretion. In order to make him a trustee, it must appear that the testator intended to impose an imperative obligation upon him, and for that purpose has used words which exclude the exercise of discretion or option in reference to the act in question. Mr. Bispham says (Principles of Equity, § 71): 'The English rule now is that precatory words are not to be regarded as imperative, unless it is plain from the context that the testator so intended them.' 'When property is given absolutely, and without restriction, a trust is not to be lightly imposed upon mere words of recommendation and confidence." Page 669. And again, on page 671 of 132 Cal., on page 965 of 61 Pac., the opinion in Estate of Marti, proceeds: "While the desire of a testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which he has given to him in absolute terms. * * * 'Prima facie, a mere request, or an expression of hope or confidence or expectation, does not import a command.'"

Appellant's counsel rely upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 8 Sup. Ct. 1164, 32 L. Ed. 138. If that decision was in any particular inconsistent with our own decisions on the subject, it would not be binding authority.

[2] The interpretation of wills is not a question upon which the federal courts control the state courts. But we do not find it inconsistent. The same rules are stated in that decision, as in our own. The court says: "It must appear that the words were intended by the testator to be imperative." And, quoting from Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 277, the court says that the difficulties of interpretation "can always be overcome by bearing in mind and rigidly applying in all such cases the test that to create a trust it must clearly appear that the testator intended to govern and control the conduct of the party to whom the language of the will is addressed and did not design it as an expression or indication of that which the testator thought would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion which he intended to repose in the legatee or devisee."

The language in this will cannot reasonably be understood to indicate an intention to create a trust or to direct or control the residuary devisee as to the manner of her use and enjoyment of the property devised to her. On the contrary, taking the provisions as a whole, there clearly appears an intention to leave everything concerning the welfare of Lucille to the judgment, discretion, and affection of the daughter Lucie. The words chosen indicate confidence and faith in her daughter's kindly disposition, rather than an intent to control and direct her. There is nothing which shows an intent to place a limitation or charge upon the estate given to her. She says, "I rely upon my daughter" to make suitable provision, believing that she will give to Lucille the love and care of a mother and amply and carefully provide for her. There is nothing imperative in any of the language used nor anything indicating more than a wish or desire, accompanied with a reliance, belief, and confidence that the daughter would fulfill such wish in such manner as her own judgment should dictate and without any restrictions. Having thus expressed her confidence and reliance, she follows it with a devise of the entire residue to the daughter "to be held and owned by her in her absolute right." The provisions as a whole are utterly inconsistent with an intent to qualify the estate given to the daughter, or to impose any charge thereon in the nature of a trust.

[3] The surrounding circumstances do not require a different construction or indicate a different intent. The case was submitted and decided upon a demurrer to the contest or claim of the appellant, so that, for the purposes of this decision the facts alleged therein, must be considered as true. The will was made on October 9, 1907. Lucille was then about three years of age. Her mother had died the previous April. In 1901 the testatrix made a will giving to Eileen, appellant's mother, a certain tract of land, and the income of one-half of the residue of her estate. The testatrix at that time believed that she owned said tract of land in fee, and it is alleged, although the allegation appears to be without significance, that she held one-half thereof in trust for the use of Eileen. No facts are alleged which would be sufficient to create such a trust. In May, 1907, after Eileen's death, the testatrix made another will giving to the respondent, Lucie, the same specific legacies as in her final will, and the residue to Lucie and Lucille, in equal parts. On August 9, 1907, she made a third will, the same as that of May, 1907, excepting that the one-half of the residue, given in the former will to Lucille, was given to a trustee in trust for Lucille. After March, 1906, Lucille always remained in the custody of the testatrix, who desired to adopt her, but was prevented from doing so by her own illness and the absence from the state of Lucille's father. Before the death of Eileen, the testatrix had sold the whole of the land above mentioned as having been once devised to Eileen for the sum of $51,000. It is alleged that on October 9, 1907, when she made the will here in controversy, the testatrix believed that she had owned said land in fee, and that she believed that one-half of the proceeds thereof "was a trust fund in her hands for said Lucille as the only child and heir at law of the said Eileen." No explanation whatever is given for the existence of these two inconsistent beliefs, nor is any reason given for the latter belief, which seems to have had no foundation in fact. It is alleged that Lucille has no property, except her alleged interest in the supposed trust fund, or in the land from which it was derived, and that her father had not, when said last will was made, any estate out of which to make suitable provision for her, all of which the testatrix at that time well knew.

The fact that the testatrix made so many wills, and that the one of August, 1907, disposed of one-half of the residue to a trustee in trust for Lucille, showed that she had some knowledge about wills, and understood the nature of trusts and something of the forms of expression used in creating them. So far as these facts have any bearing, they would seem to point to a design not to establish a trust in favor of Lucille, since the testatrix must have been familiar with the proper form of words to create a trust, and could easily have done so if she had so desired. There is no attempt to allege an intention by the testatrix to make the provision which it is claimed constitutes a declaration of trust a substitute for the supposed trust fund aforesaid. So far as appears, the giving to Lucille of the trust which she claims under the will would not prevent or estop her from claiming the trust fund also. It does not appear that she had in fact any right to such trust fund and there is no equity shown in her, in the nature of a property right, which could in any way affect the interpretation of the will. The circumstances alleged are clearly insufficient to convert that which, upon its face, appears to be merely an expression of a preference and of confidence and reliance on the fidelity and affection of her daughter toward Lucille, into an express or implied command or direction to her with respect to the use by her of the property given to her by the will "in her own absolute right," as it declares.

[4] The appellant argues that item 5 gives to Lucie in terms only the "residue and remainder" of the estate, and that, as it does not precede, but follows, item 4 containing the alleged precatory trust, and as the specific legacies, except the $5 to Lucille, are all given to Lucie, there is a necessary inference that the testatrix believed that the precatory clause did create a trust in the property in favor of Lucille, and that she used the words "residue and remainder" in item 5 to designate what would be left after making the adequate provision for Lucille, which she supposed was required by the precatory clause. There are two or three reasons against this view. In the first place, the language of item 4 cannot, by any reasonable stretch of construction, be held to be a gift or devise of any property or right, except of the $5. Leaving that out, there is much of confidence and reliance upon Lucie that she will provide for and adopt Lucille, and love and care for her as a mother, but not a word which can be said to be a disposition of property, or a request, command, or direction as to what she shall do in that behalf. That portion of item 4 would not call for the designation of any part of the estate as "residue." This argument assumes that whatever provision Lucie is to make for Lucille is to be made out of property which somehow is given to Lucie by the terms of the will. The specific legacies to Lucie are admitted to be insufficient, and it is not claimed that they were considered by the testatrix as subject to any provision in favor of Lucille. The only other disposition to Lucie is that in item 5, which gives her the "residue and remainder" in her own absolute right. Therefore the effect of the fifth item is to vest in Lucie the title to the whole of the estate except the property specifically devised, including that out of which Lucille is to be provided for, if her claim is correct. This would make it absolutely necessary that item 4 should be construed to create a charge upon the residue of the property, and not merely to indicate confidence in Lucie. It clearly does not bear that meaning, and, if it did, Lucie would not have the residue in absolute right. Furthermore, the circumstances alleged furnish a satisfactory explanation of the use of these words in item 5, without the suggested inference. She had shortly before made two other wills of the same general form as the last. In each she had given Lucie the same specific devise and legacies as in the last, and presumably in the same language. In each she had made provision for Lucille. In that of May, 1907, she gave her one-half the residue absolutely. That of August, 1907, gave the same one-half to a trustee for the use of Lucille. Evidently something must have occurred about that time to change her intentions concerning Lucille, and in consequence she made the last will. It follows the previous forms, and was apparently modeled thereon. The same specific dispositions to Lucie are repeated. Coming to the part relating to Lucille, she gives her only $5, and makes the declaration that she relies on Lucie to provide for her and adopt her. Then in item 5, still using the former phraseology, she gives the "residue" to Lucie, evidently referring, as she did in the previous wills, to the residue after deducting the specific devise and the specific legacies. And, although the result was that everything was given to Lucie except the $5, it is nevertheless technically accurate to describe that portion as the residue of the estate. From all this it is reasonable to conclude that the testatrix was following the form of the previous wills and using the same language so far as it was applicable, and that it was because of this that the clause expressing confidence and reliance was placed before the residuary clause, and not because the testatrix believed that she was creating a trust for Lucille to be taken from the residue.

The decree of distribution is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by A. W. Brode and another against William G. Gosslin and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant John G. Ritter appeals. Affirmed.

Randall & Gaines, for appellant. George H. Moore, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title to real estate. In addition to the usual allegations in such cases, the complaint alleged that defendants Gosslin and wife theretofore signed and acknowledged an instrument purporting to convey to the United States of America the lands described in the complaint, which instrument was recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of Los Angeles county; that the United States of America did not accept the delivery of the purported conveyance so alleged to have been made to it by said instrument, by reason whereof it was of no force or effect as a conveyance. The prayer of the complaint was for a judgment and decree canceling the purported conveyance and quieting plaintiffs' title. The defendant appealing, by his answer, denied the want of delivery to and acceptance by the government of said purported deed, denied that plaintiffs were the owners of the real estate described in the complaint, and alleged that he was in possession of the same under and by virtue of an agreement made between him and the government of the United States. All the issues were found in favor of plaintiffs, upon which judgment was entered as prayed for. Ritter appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The transcript contains a purported bill of exceptions in support of his motion, but the same is not authenticated in any manner. On the contrary, it contains an order of court sustaining plaintiffs' objections to the settlement thereof upon the ground that the same was not presented within the time required by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No exception was taken to the ruling of the court in refusing to settle the bill of exceptions, and the same, lacking the authentication required by law, cannot be considered for any purpose upon this appeal.

The sole question then remaining is whether or not the findings support the judgment. An examination thereof leaves no room for questioning their sufficiency. Nor does appellant call our attention to any ground upon which he claims the judgment should be reversed; his sole argument being directed to alleged errors illustrated by the purported bill of exceptions, which, as said before, cannot be considered upon this appeal.

At the hearing of the appeal, respondents, pursuant to notice, made a motion to dismiss the same upon the ground that the matters in controversy had been settled out of court, and in support of their motion presented a grant deed from appellant to the property involved. As the judgment and order must, for the reasons given, be affirmed, it is unnecessary to pass upon the motion.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. SALES (§ 52*)—CONSTRUCTION—PARTIES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the price of goods sold, evidence held to sustain a finding that plaintiff acted for himself in making the sale, and not for another.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for the price of goods, in which defendant claimed that plaintiff was acting for another in making the sale, defendant's manager was asked whether he knew before the orders were given that plaintiff personally supplied the goods, which question was excluded as calling for a conclusion. Held, that, since the answer would at most have shown that, though defendant conducted the transaction with plaintiff personally, its manager merely supposed plaintiff was acting as agent, error in excluding the question could not have prejudiced defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON FACTS.

In an action by C. for the price of goods, in which defendant claimed that plaintiff acted as agent for N. in making the sale, the court charged that plaintiff was a separate person from the claimed principal, and if the letters from it as to the contract were signed "N., by C., Manager," they were the letters of N., and not of plaintiff, and, if the letters as to the sale of the goods were merely signed by plaintiff's name without anything indicating that he signed for N., they were not the letters of N., but of plaintiff. Held, that the instruction was erroneous as being upon the facts.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS ON FACTS.

The error in the instruction could not have prejudiced defendant; all of the evidence introduced on the question of agency, if believed, requiring a finding that plaintiff was not the agent of N. in making the sale.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Error in an instruction in charging as a matter of law what the uncontradicted evidence shows as a matter of fact is not prejudicial.

6. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGES ON FACTS.

In an action for the price of goods, in which defendant claimed that plaintiff was acting for N. in making the sale, the court charged that plaintiff was "a separate and distinct person from N.," and if the letters relating to the sale were signed by plaintiff alone, and not for N., they were letters of plaintiff, and not of N. Held, that the jury were not instructed by the quoted phrase that plaintiff was not acting for N. in writing the letters; it merely stating the evident fact that plaintiff as an individual was a separate person from N.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

7. SALES (§ 364*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action for the price of goods sold, defendant claimed that plaintiff sold them as agent for N., and also alleged as a counterclaim that, before the sale, plaintiff and other corporations had formed N., and that it had executed a contract with defendant for the sale of certain cases, which it had refused to perform, to defendant's damage. The court instructed that, unless the jury found that plaintiff acted for N. in selling the goods, they should disregard all testimony as to dealings N. may have had with defendant and of any suit brought by defendant against it. Held, that the instruction was proper, since the evidence referred to therein was immaterial if plaintiff did not act for N. in selling the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

8. INTEREST (§ 19*)—UNLIQUIDATED DEMAND.

In an action on a contract for the price of goods as fixed by the contract, which required the freight charges to be paid by the buyer, and deducted from the gross price, the seller was entitled to interest on the amount awarded for the goods after the freight charges paid were deducted; a contention that the claim was unliquidated because defendant was only entitled to deduct reasonable freight charges irrespective of the amount paid being untenable, especially where the seller himself selected the route of shipment, thereby practically fixing the charges since the jury must necessarily have found that the amount paid was reasonable, and interest would be allowable even if the claim were strictly an unliquidated demand, the exact amount of the charges being known to the buyer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-40; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

9. INTEREST (§ 19*)—UNLIQUIDATED DEMAND.

While as a rule interest is not allowable on unliquidated claims, it may be allowed where the person liable knows the exact amount of his indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-40; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

10. SALES (§ 364*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action for the price of goods sold in which defendant claimed that plaintiff acted for N. in making the sale, and set up a counterclaim against N., defendant requested an instruction that, if it intended the orders to be for N. which plaintiff knew when they were given, N. could not, in order to defeat defendant's counterclaim against it, turn the orders over to plaintiff or any one else without defendant's consent, and, if it did so, defendant could set off the price against any amount due it from N. in an action by plaintiff for the price. Held, that the instruction was properly refused as not supported by any evidence; the only evidence showing defendant's intention that the orders should be filled by N. being the possible inference from the fact that defendant had previously had similar transactions with N. through plaintiff as its manager.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by A. A. Courteney against the Standard Box Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

P. L. Benjamin, for appellant. R. M. Sims, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action by plaintiff to recover the sum of $3,509.82 alleged to be due and owing from defendant to plaintiff for certain goods sold and delivered to the former by the latter. The cause was tried by a jury by whom a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,808.08. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the order denying its motion for a new trial, and complains: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. (2) That the court erred, to its prejudice, in certain rulings upon questions involving the admissibility of certain testimony. (3) That the court in its charge misdirected the jury upon matters of law.

The complaint is in two counts, viz.: The one declaring upon the contract, and the second setting up the indebtedness in the form of a common count.

After averring that the defendant, a corporation, is and was, at the time of the commencement of this action and for some time prior thereto, engaged in business in the city of San Francisco, the complaint alleges that "between the 31st day of August, 1906, and the 20th day of November, 1906, at the city and county of San Francisco, plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant, at defendant's special instance and request, certain goods," etc., and then follows an itemized statement of the goods so sold and delivered.

In order that certain averments of and the issues raised by the answer may be the better understood, it should be here stated that it appears that the plaintiff, on receiving from the defendant the order for the goods mentioned in the complaint, purchased the same from a concern known as the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company, and thereupon ordered the latter to ship said goods to defendant, at San Francisco, as direct from himself. The defendant does not deny or dispute its indebtedness to some one for the goods described in the complaint; but its contention is that plaintiff, in said transaction was acting only and solely for a corporation named and known as the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, and, consequently not for himself in his individual right. In consonance with this theory, the answer, besides specifically denying the averments of both counts of the complaint, sets up a counterclaim, alleging, in this connection, that the plaintiff and the said Multnomah Lumber & Box Company and a number of other corporations engaged in like business, all said corporations being specifically named in the answer, had prior to the time at which the transactions upon which this action is founded took place formed themselves into a corporation under the name of the "Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency," and under that name the plaintiff and all said corporations are and ever since have been associated together in the transaction of business. It is alleged that at the times that the goods mentioned in the complaint were ordered by and sold and delivered to defendant the plaintiff was secretary and business agent of said Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, and that in such capacity sold and delivered, for and in behalf of said corporation, the goods described in the complaint.

With respect to the alleged counterclaim, the answer alleges that on the 1st day of March, 1906, at the city and county of San Francisco, "the said parties so as aforesaid associated in business together under the said name of the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, as said Northern, etc., Agency, entered into a contract in writing with defendant," by the terms of which said agency (for brevity we shall hereafter so refer to said last mentioned corporation) agreed to sell and deliver to defendant 200,000 standard 2½-pound cases at certain prices specified in said contract, that said agency failed and refused to execute the terms of said contract on its part, and that defendant was thereby damaged in the sum of $14,000.

From the foregoing statement of the issues it is to be observed that the punctum saliens of the problem submitted by the pleadings for solution by the jury was whether the plaintiff in the sale and delivery to defendant of the goods referred to in the complaint was acting for himself or only as the agent of said agency.

In order to support its counterclaim, it was obviously necessary for the defendant to establish its theory that plaintiff in the sale of the goods described in the complaint was acting for and as the representative of said agency, and not for himself individually, and in attempting to sustain such theory it seems to have confined its evidence almost solely to the proof of its claim, as alleged in the answer, that the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company, from which, as we have seen, plaintiff purchased the goods sold and delivered by him to defendant, was at the time of such sale and delivery a component part of and therefore associated with said agency in the business of manufacturing and selling the kind of goods described in the complaint. Manifestly the effect of such proof could only be to establish a fact from which a very strong inference might have been drawn that the plaintiff in the transaction of which this litigation is the outgrowth was not operating for himself in his individual capacity but merely representing as manager or agent said agency.

1. In considering whether there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict, it is not deemed requisite to do more than refer to the testimony in this opinion in a general way. The jury found, upon sufficient evidence, as we shall presently perceive, not only by their general verdict, but also by their answers to certain particular questions of fact submitted to them by the court, against the theory upon which the defendant undertook to resist the right of plaintiff to maintain this action in his own right. The particular questions of fact so submitted and the answers thereto are as follows:

"(1) Did defendant order the goods described in the complaint from A. A. Courteney? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did A. A. Courteney order the goods described in the complaint from the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company? Answer: Yes.

"(3) Were the goods ordered from the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company charged by them to A. A. Courteney under the name of Western Veneer & Basket Agency? Answer: Yes.

"(4) Did A. A. Courteney pay the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company for the goods described in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(5) Was the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company associated in business with the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency and a member of said Agency? Answer: No.

"(6) Did A. A. Courteney have any connection with the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency other than as a salaried employé? Answer: No."

Thus it is to be noted that the jury made express findings negating all the issues of fact essential to the support of defendant's counterclaim.

The evidence, consisting partly of the letters which passed between the plaintiff and defendant, shows that the defendant first addressed a letter to plaintiff, ostensibly not as manager of the agency, asking for quotations on the goods itemized in the complaint; that thereafter considerable correspondence, culminating in the giving of the orders to plaintiff by defendant, passed between the parties; that the letters addressed to defendant relative to the goods by plaintiff were signed by the latter in his own name; that at the time these orders were given and accepted by plaintiff the agency had ceased to do business, but that plaintiff, who had been its secretary and manager, remained with the concern until December, 1906, for the sole purpose of winding up its affairs. Plaintiff testified that said agency accepted no new business after July 1, 1906, and in this he was corroborated by the witness Taylor, who had up to July 1, 1906, acted as a clerk and bookkeeper for said agency under the direction of plaintiff. Plaintiff further testified that he had been engaged in the box shoo business for himself since July 1, 1906, and prior to that time had transacted business independently of the agency under the name of the Western Veneer & Basket Company. It was upon the letterheads of this company that he had carried on the correspondence with defendant relative to the sale of the goods described in the complaint.

Upon receiving the request for quotations on said goods from defendant, plaintiff negotiated with the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company for its prices for the class of goods ordered by defendant, and upon receiving a reply from said company, disclosing said prices, communicated the same to defendant. The latter accepted the quotations thus offered by plaintiff, and ordered the shipment of the goods, and the latter thereupon directed the Multnomah Company to ship the goods to defendant. Plaintiff declared that neither he nor the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company was ever a member of the agency. He further testified that he made payments to the Multnomah Company on account of the goods delivered to the defendant.

F. A. Douty, business manager of the Multnomah Company, testified that his company had had dealings with the agency, but only as one person with another; that the Multnomah Company was never at any time a member of the agency; that the account for the goods in question was kept on his company's books against the Western Veneer & Basket Company "because that is A. A. Courteney." He stated that Courteney made the following payments to his company on account of the goods sold and shipped to defendant: on December 20, 1906, $1,000; January 17, 1907, $53.30; January 23, 1907, $1,000; March 13, 1907, $750.

[1] There is other testimony which corroborates the plaintiff in the statement that the transaction in question was conducted for himself individually, but the foregoing brief résumé of the evidence is regarded as sufficient to disclose that the conclusion reached by the jury, as evidenced by their general verdict as well as by their answers to the particular questions of fact which they were required to answer, is abundantly supported and clearly justified. As stated defendant sought to show that the transaction was with the agency principally by proof that the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company was a member of said agency at the time the goods were ordered, sold, and delivered. Some testimony was received on behalf of defendant disclosing defendant's prior dealings with plaintiff as the business manager of said agency and the customary manner in which such transactions were prosecuted. The object of such testimony was, of course, to thus prove circumstances tending to establish defendant's contention that in the transaction involved here plaintiff was still acting for said agency. But this proof, like that offered and received in support of the claim that the Multnomah Company was a part or member of said agency, appears from the record to be exceedingly frail, and evidently was so valued by the jury. At any rate, the situation as presented by the record with regard to the proofs is such as to bring the case clearly within the rule that must be invoked and applied where a substantial conflict arises in the evidence.

[2] 2. The rulings of the court excluding answers to certain questions propounded to the witness, Merillion, manager of defendant, by the latter's attorney, and which rulings are declared to be erroneous, are, in any event, without prejudice. Most of the questions asked were, in effect, whether the witness had any information or knowledge before or at the time the orders were given for the goods and the same were sold and delivered or until a certain letter was received by defendant from plaintiff, dated December 17, 1906, that plaintiff personally and for himself supplied defendant with the goods involved in the controversy. To each of the questions so asked an objection upon the ground that it called for the opinion and conclusion of the witness was sustained by the court. While none of these questions, with a single exception, is, upon its face, amenable to the objection that it called for either the opinion or conclusion of the witness, still, had the court allowed them to be answered, the most that could have been thereby shown was that, although the defendant conducted the transaction personally with plaintiff, its manager did not know that in the transaction the plaintiff was acting for himself in his individual right, but supposed that therein he was only representing, as agent, the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency. It is plainly apparent that testimony disclosing what the manager of defendant did not himself know or had not learned until a certain time with respect to that matter would have very slight, if, indeed, any, tendency to prove that Courteney was not operating in his own behalf, individually, in the sale of the goods to defendant. Therefore, even though it may rightly be said, in strictness, that the trial court should have allowed answers to some of the questions here referred to, it cannot be held that its refusal to do so could have had the effect of seriously affecting defendant's substantial rights.

3. The complaint urged against the action of the court in the giving, the rejection, and the modification of certain instructions is without substantial merit. We shall not attempt to give all the assignments under this head special consideration. It will be sufficient to say as to most of the objections involving the matter of instructions that a critical examination of the entire charge of the court justifies us in declaring that therein all the principles of law pertinent to the issues as tendered by the pleadings and brought out by the evidence and essential to an intelligent and just consideration by the jury of the whole case as made out by the proofs were, generally speaking, expounded correctly and in language of marked perspicuity.

We shall, however, particularly notice a few of the very many objections against the action of the court in this regard. The most serious of these in our opinion is the objection involving the attack upon the following instruction given by the court: "You are instructed that A. A. Courteney is a separate and distinct person from the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, and if you find that the letters from the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency relative to the contract of March 1, 1906, were signed 'Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, by A. A. Courteney, Manager,' they were the letters of the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, and not the letters of Mr. Courteney; and if you find that the letters relative to the sale of the goods described in the complaint were signed 'A. A. Courteney,' and there was nothing in the letters indicating that they were signed by A. A. Courteney for the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency, such letters are the letters of A. A. Courteney, and not the letters of the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency."

[3] The foregoing part of the court's charge is criticised as involving an instruction to the jury upon a question of fact, and, while the criticism is well founded, we think the error, in view of the evidence, is without prejudice.

[4] It cannot be said as a matter of law, because the letters passing from plaintiff to defendant relative to the sale of the goods were signed by him without indicating by express words that in said transaction he was representing said agency as its agent, that he was not so acting for that corporation, but that from such manner of signing his name he was conducting the transaction solely for himself or in his individual capacity. In other words, it does not necessarily follow, either as a matter of fact or as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was in said transaction acting solely for himself merely because he signed his own instead of the name of the agency to the letters addressed by him to defendant relative to the sale of the goods. The letters referred to were as a matter of fact signed by Courteney apparently in his individual capacity—that is, they were signed by him apparently not as manager of the agency, nor in any other manner indicating that they were written by him as an official of that corporation—but the fact that they were so signed constituted only a circumstance supporting the theory upon which plaintiff instituted this action, and clearly it was for the jury, and not for the court, to determine its probative value. Neither, on the other hand, would it have been conclusive proof or true as a matter of law that plaintiff was acting for the agency had he signed his name to the letters as its agent or manager.

But, as stated, we cannot perceive how the instruction could, in view of the evidence, have exercised a substantial or any significant influence on the jury in their deliberations upon their verdict. As before shown, the efforts of the defendant to establish its claim that in the purchase of the goods described in the complaint it was not dealing with plaintiff, as an individual, were almost entirely directed to proof of the connection, as a business associate, of the Multnomah Company with said agency, and in this defendant signally failed to establish its contention. Indeed, the only testimony upon that vital point of the controversy worthy of characterization as testimony came from plaintiff's side, and thereby it seems to have been directly and positively shown that neither the Multnomah Company nor plaintiff himself was a member of the agency, but that the former had never had any connection therewith as a business associate. In short, apart from proof of the fact—in truth, of the admission of the plaintiff himself—that the latter was secretary and business agent of the agency, and the further fact that defendant had had dealings with the agency while plaintiff was its manager, there is not a circumstance or fact developed by defendant from which the jury would have been warranted in inferring that the plaintiff, in the sale of the goods, was acting for the agency.

The testimony of the plaintiff was, as we have seen, that the agency had absolutely nothing to do with the sale of the goods. The testimony of the manager of the Multnomah Company was, as likewise has been seen, that plaintiff bought the goods from his company, that they were charged against plaintiff, that the latter made certain payments thereon, and that said company had no connection at that or any other time with the agency. As stated, this testimony stands in the record without the slightest contradiction affirmatively. Thus it is to be seen that the manner of the signing of the letters by plaintiff is in perfect harmony with the apparently uncontroverted testimony that the transaction, on plaintiff's part, was conducted by him for himself and not for the agency.

Upon the record as thus outlined, the question with the jury was not whether it had been shown that plaintiff did not act for himself, but for the agency, for, as seen there was no affirmative showing which would justify such inquiry, but whether the testimony directly showing that he was acting for himself and not as a representative of the agency was to be believed. If the jury believed plaintiff and the manager of the Multnomah Company, as manifestly they did, then there was no other verdict that they could have justly returned than the one to which exceptions are here interposed. In other words, the only evidence affirmatively brought to their attention upon the vital issue submitted here was that produced by plaintiff in support of his contention, and the verdict must necessarily have been for plaintiff on that evidence or for defendant because said evidence was lacking in the power of persuasion. As suggested, if that evidence disclosed the truth of the transaction, then the letters addressed by plaintiff to defendant were written as his (plaintiff's) individual letters. Under the foregoing analysis of the evidence, the instruction under review, though, strictly speaking, erroneous, could not in our opinion, have operated prejudicially against the defendant.

[5] Where, as here, the evidence supporting the verdict appears to stand without substantial contradiction, the verdict thus reached should not be set aside because of an instruction which, though erroneous for dealing with a question of fact, contrary to the mandates of the Constitution, accords perfectly with such evidence. In other words, where, as in the case in this instance, the instruction states as a matter of law what the evidence, without apparent contradiction, discloses as a matter of fact, it cannot be held by this court that, on such a state of the record, a different verdict would have been returned but for such erroneous instruction.

[6] The instruction is further condemned because it declares that "A. A. Courtenay is a separate and distinct person from the Northern Box Manufacturers' Agency"; the claim being that thus the jury were in effect told that Courtenay, in writing the letters to the defendant concerning the transaction, was not acting for said agency. We do not so understand that language of the instruction. By the instruction the court undoubtedly intended only to declare as a matter of law what is certainly true as a matter of fact that Courtenay, as an individual, is a separate and distinct person from the agency, a corporation, and that, as an individual, had a right to do business for himself, notwithstanding his official connection with said corporation. The antithesis of this proposition would obviously not be true or correct either as a matter of law or of fact. If the court had said that "A. A. Courtenay, as agent or manager of said agency and said agency were separate and distinct persons," the criticism of the instruction would then have been just and well founded; but the instruction does not so declare and could not have been so understood by the jury.

[7] The court very properly instructed the jury that, unless they found that the plaintiff in the sale of the goods acted for the agency, they should "disregard all testimony with respect to any dealings it may have had with defendant and of any suit defendant may have brought and maintained against said agency." Said instruction had particular reference to the counterclaim set up by defendant. The only theory admittedly upon which the counterclaim could have been sustained was, as seen, that the plaintiff conducted the transactions involved here as agent and on behalf of said Box Manufacturers' Agency, and, unless that fact could be shown, evidence addressed to the proof of the counterclaim pleaded by defendant was very clearly entitled to no consideration whatever by the jury in the determination of what their verdict should be. There was and is no claim that plaintiff, as an individual, had any connection with the transactions from which the alleged counterclaim arose. Of course, it was for the jury to first ascertain and determine whether the real party in interest in the action was said agency or plaintiff himself, and if, as obviously they did, they found that the agency had nothing to do with the transactions on which this action is based, why should they give consideration to an irrelevant and immaterial issue? The court did not take from the jury by this or the instruction just previously considered the right and the duty of determining the question of fact whether the agency or the plaintiff was the party with whom defendant had the dealings which constitute the subject of this action.

[8] It is further contended with seeming earnestness that the instruction as to the interest to which the court conceived the plaintiff would be entitled on any verdict or judgment which might properly be awarded to him under the evidence involves a misapplication of the law in that respect; the contention being that, because of the nature of the contract between the parties, the plaintiff was entitled to no interest at all.

The contract stipulated that the freight charges for the transportation of the goods from Portland to San Francisco were to be paid by defendant upon receipt of the same, and were to be deducted from the gross price of said goods. The evidence disclosed—in fact, it was practically admitted, as Beardsley, secretary of defendant, so testified—that the gross sum for the goods at the prices quoted to defendant by plaintiff amounted to $3,590.82, and the amount of the freight charges paid by the defendant was $782.74, leaving as due the plaintiff the sum of $2,808.-

08, the sum awarded by the jury. The court instructed the jury upon the question of interest as follows: "The situation is that the amount of the goods furnished figured up to $3,590.82, the amount of freight was $782.74, which, being deducted from the price of the goods, leaves $2,808.08. If you should find that A. A. Courteney in the light of other instructions which I shall give you is entitled to recover as plaintiff in this case, he will be entitled to recover that sum, $2,808.08, and also interest from the date of the commencement of this action, November 27, 1906." The argument urged against said instruction or the allowance of interest upon the amount awarded by the jury is that the claim of plaintiff constituted an uncertain and unliquidated demand, made so by the fact that the sum to be deducted on account of freight charges, to be paid by defendant, from the gross sum or price for which the goods were sold, could not be ascertained from the contract itself; that the defendant was entitled to a reduction for reasonable freight charges only, or such charges as the jury might determine from all the evidence were reasonable, although such finding might be for an amount below that actually paid by defendant. Hence it is pointed out the court erred in allowing interest, and in support of the proposition so advanced the following cases are cited: Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 245; Coburn v. Goodall, 72 Cal. 509, 14 Pac. 190, 1 Am. St. Rep. 75; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Ferrea v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 237, 53 Pac. 689, 1092; Erickson v. Stockton & T. C. R. Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 Pac. 961; MacComber v. Bigelow, 123 Cal. 535, 56 Pac. 449; Swinerton v. Argonaut L. & B., 112 Cal. 379, 44 Pac. 719.

But it will be found upon an examination of these cases that in each instance the action was upon a quantum meruit or for the recovery of the reasonable value of goods sold and delivered or services rendered, and they are therefore not in point.

In the case at bar the prices for the goods sold and delivered to defendant and accepted by it were definitely fixed and agreed upon in the contract and the time for payments definitely fixed and specified. The amount, if any, to which the plaintiff was entitled as compensation for these goods was capable of being readily made certain (if, indeed, it was not already certain or liquidated within legal contemplation), by the ascertainment, by the simple process of subtraction, of the difference between the gross sum for which, under their agreement, the plaintiff furnished and the defendant accepted the goods and the total amount paid by defendant for freight charges. It is, of course, idle to argue, under the circumstances disclosed by this record, that the freight charges, so far as the amount thereof was concerned, were subject to determination by the jury upon evidence disclosing whether such charges were reasonable or unreasonable. Whatever sum was actually paid by defendant for such charges was precisely known to the latter, and therefore easily and readily ascertainable, and the sum so paid would represent the sum to be deducted from the gross sum for which the goods were sold. The jury could not, without exercising the most arbitrary and unwarranted power, find a sum less than that actually paid. Indeed, the question whether the sum so paid was reasonable could not arise, since the plaintiff himself shipped the goods and selected the route and manner of such shipments and thus himself virtually regulated the charges therefor.

But conceding for the purposes of the case that the claim or demand upon which the complaint declares is, in a sense, unliquidated in that the amount precisely due must be ascertained by arithmetical calculation, yet the proposition that interest is allowable thereon is still unimpeachable.

[9] It is thoroughly settled by the authorities in this as well as in other jurisdictions that while, as a general rule, interest may not be allowed on unliquidated claims, there are, nevertheless, exceptions thereto. The reason of the denial of interest on such demands "is said to be that the person liable does not know what sum he owes, and, therefore, can be in no default for not paying." Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 67, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164. When, therefore, as is the case here, the exact sum of defendant's indebtedness is known to him, the reason suggested for the denial of interest does not exist. In the case last cited it is said: "We are not prepared to say, in general terms, that no interest in any case can be recovered in an action upon contract for an unliquidated demand. Mix v. Miller, 57 Cal. 356, decided since the adoption of the Code, and McFadden v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 662, decided previously, attest the doctrine that in this state interest is allowable on such demands under some circumstances. These were cases in which the contract had been fully performed by the creditors, the fruits thereof accepted by the debtors, without objection, and they were clearly in default, and in the latter case the only question was as to value." The foregoing language is quoted approvingly in the case of Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 317, 42 Pac. 811. See full and interesting discussion of this subject in all its phases in the leading case of Selleck v. French, 1 Conn. 32, 6 Am. Dec. 185, and the footnotes in the last mentioned volume. Therefore, if it may be held that the claim which is the basis of this action constitutes, strictly speaking, an unliquidated demand, still we think that there is no possible ground for doubting that this case comes clearly within the exceptions pointed out by the cases above referred to. It follows from the foregoing views that whether interest has been allowed upon the theory that compensation is thus awarded plaintiff for the use of his money, past due (section 1917, Civ. Code), or as damages for defendant's wrongful withholding of said money from plaintiff (section 3287, Civ. Code), in either case the allowance was perfectly proper, and the instruction of the court upon that subject, therefore, so far as defendant is concerned, without prejudice. Indeed, although the question is not presented here for decision, it may be suggested that it might well be claimed, under the circumstances of this case, that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the date that the money became due, in which case he, and not the defendant, would be the sufferer from the instruction and the verdict on the score of interest.

[10] It is further objected that the court committed prejudicial error by its disallowance of an instruction, requested by the defendant, that would have told the jury, in effect, that, if the defendant intended the orders in question to be for the agency and that plaintiff at the time said orders were given knew such to be the fact, the agency, in order to defeat defendant's right to offset its counterclaim against the agency, could not, without the consent of defendant, turn said orders over to the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company or any other party to be filled; that if, under the circumstances as thus indicated, the agency did turn the orders over to the said Multnomah Company and they were filled by "Courtenay or the Multnomah Lumber & Box Company, the defendant has the right to set off against the price for the goods supplied under those orders whatever amount may be due it from the * * * agency for any loss suffered by defendant through the failure of the * * * agency to carry out any contract it might have had with the * * * agency for the furnishing of boxes."

Several other instructions involving the enunciation in a different form of the same proposition were also requested by the defendant and rejected by the court. These instructions were properly refused for the reason that there was adduced no evidence to which they were applicable. We have found no testimony in the record which discloses that the intention of the defendant was that the orders should be filled by the agency, with the exception that a possible inference might be deduced that the defendant so intended from the fact that it had previously had transactions of a similar character with the agency through plaintiff as the agency's manager; but such inference, at best, would manifestly amount to nothing more than a mere conjecture. Nor does there appear to have been any serious effort made by defendant to show its intention in that regard. It is true that its counsel asked its business manager what his "understanding" was with respect to the person with whom it was transacting the business concerned here; but had the court permitted an answer to that question and such answer had been favorable to defendant, as undoubtedly it would have been, the intention of the defendant would not thus have necessarily been shown. And, assuming that defendant would thus have shown its intention to have been to deal with the agency, and even going further, supposing that it had been shown, as it was not, that the agency received the orders and then turned them over to plaintiff to be filled, there is nothing to disclose its purpose or motive in doing so, except the bare inference that might possibly be drawn from the fact that the defendant held against the agency an alleged claim for damages which defendant might have maintained as a set-off to the price of the goods in question. But the only tangible evidence from which the intention of the defendant on the subject referred to may be presumed consists of the letters addressed by it to plaintiff relative to the sale of the goods, and, as we have seen, those letters were so addressed to plaintiff ostensibly as an individual and not as a representative of the agency.

Moreover, we do not conceive nor concede it to be true as a legal proposition that if the agency, in order to defeat defendant's counterclaim turned the orders over to Courtenay or to any other party, to be filled, without the consent of the defendant, the latter would nevertheless be entitled to interpose and maintain its counterclaim against the agency in a suit by Courtenay (or such other party) for the price of the goods, unless it could be shown that Courtenay (or other party) did not act in good faith in the matter, or that the agency itself was interested in the goods so shipped or the money which might become due thereon. If, in other words, A. should order goods from B., and the latter, for whatsoever reason, should turn the order over to C. without the express consent of A., and C. in good faith fills the order by shipping to A. goods in which B. has no interest, and A. accepts the goods, we know of no reason or principle which would preclude a recovery by C. of the price of the goods free from any set-off or counterclaim A. might have against B., even though it might transpire that C. knew at the time the contract was so transferred to him that the motive of B. in transferring the contract was to escape the consequences of a plea and proof of a counterclaim against him in the event that it became necessary to institute an action to recover the price of the goods from A., C. might not, under such circumstances, be able to sustain a declaration for the price of the goods so supplied on an express contract, his mind and that of A. not having by express terms come together on or concurred in the proposition, still, since A. had accepted the goods and so enjoyed the fruits of the transaction, C. could certainly recover the reasonable market value of the goods upon an implied assumpsit or a quantum meruit, and in such case the plea of the counterclaim against B. could not be sustained.

We have now considered such criticisms of the action of the court in the matter of instructions as we deem worthy of special notice. As before stated, every legal principle pertinent to the issues tendered by the pleadings and presented by the evidence was declared to the jury in clear language and correctly.

After a thorough examination of the record as well as the briefs of appellant, the latter embracing, in the aggregate, 192 printed pages, we have been unable to discover any error in the trial of the cause or in the result thereof for which a reversal of the order would be justified.

The order is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Presiding Judge.

Action by Earl R. Osborn against Louise M. Hamilton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, one defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Richardson and Dian R. Gardner, for appellant. Clair S. Tappan, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover upon a promissory note. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant Fette appeals.

The note, dated June 14, 1907, payable to plaintiff 90 days after date, signed by each of the defendants as principal, was set out in hac verba in the complaint. The appellant Fette filed a separate answer admitting the making and execution of the note as alleged in the complaint, but denied that it was delivered to plaintiff, or that he was the legal holder thereof, or that any sum remained due and unpaid thereon. As a separate defense appellant alleged that the note was given without consideration, and that her signature thereto was obtained by means of a fraudulent conspiracy entered into between her co-defendants and the plaintiff for the purpose of defrauding her and sharing the proceeds derived from such fraudulent conspiracy. As to all the issues joined by the complaint and answer of appellant, the court, upon ample evidence in support thereof, made findings in favor of plaintiff.

While the fact was not pleaded by way of defense and not made an issue in the case by consent of parties, the court nevertheless found that a deed to certain real estate was delivered to a third party in escrow for the purpose of securing payment of the note, which deed, prior to the commencement of the suit, was returned to and accepted by defendants. The terms of the escrow are not disclosed by the record, and hence from all that appears to the contrary such security may have been exhausted by a return of the deed pursuant to the terms of the agreement under which it was placed in escrow.

[1] Moreover, the finding is immaterial, and has no place in the record, for the reason that no issue to which it is responsive appears therein. Appellant did not base her defense upon the fact that the alleged indebtedness was secured by a mortgage or otherwise. "As the appellant neither asked for the judgment which it is now claimed should have been entered in the court below, nor alleged facts upon which such a judgment could properly have been entered, he cannot here demand a reversal of the judgment which responded to the issues actually made and submitted to the trial court." Noonan v. Nunan, 76 Cal. 49, 18 Pac. 100.

Counsel contends that, notwithstanding the apparent character of appellant as principal and maker of the note, she was in fact a surety for her comakers. Conceding the fact, it is not alleged nor claimed that appellant acted upon other than her apparent character as one of the makers of the note. Section 2832, Civ. Code.

[2] A joint maker of a note, in order to defend on the ground that he is merely a surety for his comaker, must not only plead such fact, but further allege that the payee knew of the fact and consented to deal with him in that capacity. Bank v. Stover, 60 Cal. 387; Bostwick v. McEvoy, 62 Cal. 496. No issue was tendered involving the question. Neither is there evidence in the record supporting appellant's contention.

[3] It is next claimed the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that defendants made and delivered the note to plaintiff, and that he was the owner and holder thereof. The production of the note at the trial in the hands of plaintiff was prima facie evidence of the facts found, in addition to which plaintiff testified in direct terms that the note was delivered to him two or three weeks after its date.

The appeal is wholly without merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

EDWARDS v. BROCKWAY et al. (Civ. 970.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 744*)—DUTY OF OFFICERS—SUPERINTENDENT OF STREETS—REPAIR OF STREETS.

San Diego City Charter (St. 1889, p. 670) art. 5, c. 1, § 8, gives the board of public works, subject to ordinances adopted by the council, control of the streets and all improvements and repairs thereon, and section 11 (St. 1889, p. 672) authorizes such board to appoint a superintendent of streets "whose duty it shall be to see that the laws, ordinances, orders and regulations relating to public streets" are executed, and who shall keep himself informed of the condition of the streets and report the same to the board. Held, that failure to repair a street which he was not directed to repair by ordinance or order would not make the sureties on the bond of the superintendent of streets liable for resulting injuries, though he knew of its dangerous condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by Anna M. Edwards against J. C. Brockway and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company appeals. Reversed.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, for appellant. Pat-terson Sprigg, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of official negligence of defendant Brockway, who at the time was superintendent of streets of the city of San Diego; the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company being impleaded as a party defendant under an allegation that it was surety upon his official bond. Judgment went against both defendants, from which the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company alone prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that at the time of the injury to plaintiff defendant Brockway was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting superintendent of streets of the city of San Diego; that he made and delivered a bond signed by himself as principal and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety, conditioned "that if the said J. C. Brockway shall well and faithfully execute and perform all duties of such office of street superintendent now required of him by law, and shall well and faithfully execute and perform all the duties of such office of street superintendent required by any law to be enacted subsequently to the execution of this bond, then this obligation is to be void, and of no effect; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue;" that one Engebretsen, a contractor, had, pursuant to the terms of a contract signed by Brockway's predecessor in office, completed the grading of a street in said city known as Julian avenue; that at the crossing of this avenue with Twenty-Second street a cut was made, leaving the surface of Julian avenue as graded some four or five feet below the surface of Twenty-Second street, thus leaving Twenty-Second street in a dangerous condition for public travel; that Brockway accepted the work on Julian avenue as completed; that, after said acceptance, no lights or guards were placed at the point in Twenty-Second street where it intersected Julian avenue; that at the time of the injury complained of Brockway, as such superintendent, had knowledge of the condition of Twenty-Second street at the intersection thereof with Julian avenue; that on June 28, 1907, at about 7:30 p. m., while plaintiff was walking along Twenty-Second street, she walked or fell from said street into Julian avenue, by reason whereof she received the injuries for which she asks damages. It does not appear that Twenty-Second street had ever been graded or otherwise improved, or that any sidewalks had been constructed thereon.

At the times in question the government of the city of San Diego was conducted under a freeholders' charter which provided for the establishment of a board of public works consisting of three commissioners. By section 8, c. 1, art. 5, of the charter (Stats. 1889, p. 670), this board, subject to such ordinances as the common council might from time to time adopt, was given charge, superintendence, and control of the streets and sidewalks belonging to the city, or dedicated to public use, and of all improvements and repairs thereof, and of all public works and improvements to be done by the city, as well as control of the manner of using the streets and sidewalks, and the power to prevent and remove obstructions therefrom, and the right to cause the prompt repair of streets and sidewalks. Section 11 of said chapter 1 (Stats. 1889, p. 672) authorized the board of public works, when deemed necessary, to appoint a superintendent of streets, "whose duty," as prescribed by said section, "it shall be to see that the laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations relating to public streets and highways be fully carried into execution, and that the penalties thereof are rigidly enforced; he shall superintend and direct the cleaning of streets, and shall keep himself informed of the condition of all public streets and highways, and also of all public buildings, lots, and grounds of the city, and report the same to the board, and shall perform such other duties as are hereinafter specified, or as may be required of him by this board." It does not appear that either the common council or the board of public works at any time required of Brockway, as superintendent of streets, the performance of any other duties than those specified in this section. The only finding of the court touching the subject is as follows: "It is true that among the duties of the said J. C. Brockway, as such superintendent of streets, during all the times herein mentioned, were to see that the laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations relating to public streets and thoroughfares in the city of San Diego should be fully carried into execution, and that he keep himself informed of the condition of all the public streets, thoroughfares and highways of the said city of San Diego."

The alleged official negligence on the part of Brockway as superintendent of streets, as found by the court, consisted in this: That on June 24, 1907, "said J. C. Brockway had official and personal notice of the said condition of said Julian avenue at the corner of Twenty-Second street; and it is true that said defendant J. C. Brockway failed and neglected to repair or place any protection whatsoever at the said corner of Julian avenue and said Twenty-Second street, and it is true that he had official and personal notice of the said condition of said streets at least 24 hours prior to the injuries in said complaint complained of."

[1] Under the provisions of the charter fixing his duties, the superintendent was not required even though he had personal notice of the dangerous condition of the street, to repair or protect the same, unless the duty so to do was imposed upon him by ordinance adopted by the common council, or order made by the board of public works. It was his duty to see that the ordinances and orders relating to public streets be carried into execution. Neglect and failure to execute the same rendered him and the sureties upon his official bond liable in damages to those sustaining injuries by reason of such neglect. Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171; Merritt v. McFarland, 4 Cal. App. 390, 88 Pac. 369. But, in the absence of such order or direction, the superintendent had no authority to make the repairs or pay the cost thereof. A careful examination of the record discloses nothing whatever showing, or tending to show, that any ordinance, order, or regulation relating to streets in general, or to Twenty-Second street, or its intersection with Julian avenue, had ever been adopted by the city council or the board of public works, directing Brockway, as superintendent, to make any repairs at the intersection of Twenty-Second street and Julian avenue, or place any protection whatsoever at the said corner of Julian avenue and Twenty-Second street. In the case of Merritt v. McFarland, 4 Cal. App. 390, 88 Pac. 369, this court held the superintendent of streets of the city of Riverside liable for damages resulting from the dangerous condition of a street, but that decision was based upon the fact that it was conceded the superintendent was authorized by the city council to do the work; his negligence consisting in the fact that he failed to execute the order. So, too, in the case of Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171, a like decision was had, based upon the fact that an ordinance had been adopted imposing upon the street commissioner the duty of keeping the particular street open and in good repair. The facts presented in the case at bar, however, wholly fail to bring it within the principle enunciated in these cases.

[2] Respondent directs our attention to section 136 of the general law pertaining to municipal corporations of the first class (Gen. Laws Cal. p. 787), which fixes the duties of superintendent of streets. This section is almost identical with the provisions of the charter of the city of San Diego prescribing the duties of superintendent, and tested by the provisions of this section, conceding its application, it does not appear that Brockway failed to perform the duties imposed upon him by the same. However, said section was intended to apply only to cities of the first class organized under general laws, and the provisions thereof are not applicable to cities governed by freeholders' charters, which, as here, fix the duties of such officer.

Our attention is also called to section 23 of the Vrooman act (Gen. Laws Cal. p. 1326), which provides that "if, in consequence of any graded street or public highway improved under the provisions of this act, being out of repair and in condition to endanger persons or property passing thereon," no recourse for damages suffered shall be had against the city, "but if such defect in the street or public highway shall have existed for the period of twenty-four hours or more after notice thereof to said superintendent of streets, then the person or persons on whom the law may have imposed the obligations to repair such defect in the street or public highway, and also the officer or officers through whose official negligence such defect remains unrepaired, shall be jointly and severally liable to the party injured for the damage sustained; provided, that said superintendent has the authority to make said repairs, under the direction of the city council, at the expense of the city." No facts are presented bringing the case within the provisions of this section. Twenty-Second street does not appear to have ever been improved or sidewalked at all; nor can it be said upon this record that Julian avenue was graded or improved under the provisions of this act (Vrooman act). Moreover, it is not made to appear that the superintendent had authority to make repairs under the direction of the city council, the board of public works, or otherwise, at the expense of the city.

We are clearly of the opinion that the record discloses no facts showing that Brockway was guilty of official negligence as superintendent of streets, or that he failed and neglected to perform any official duty imposed upon him either by law, ordinance, order, or regulation of his superiors. Hence there was no breach of the condition of the official bond given by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, appellant herein.

Appellant urges several grounds upon which it is claimed the bond is void. Inasmuch, however, as the judgment must be reversed for the reasons given, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the points.

[3] The motion of respondent to dismiss the appeal was heard by the Supreme Court prior to the transfer of the case to this court, and an order made denying the motion. Such ruling must be deemed a final disposal of the motion.

Judgment reversed.

2. BURGLARY (§ 38*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for burglary, charged to have been jointly committed by accused and M., a police officer testified that he met accused and M. shortly after the burglary, and, upon approaching them, accused fled, and that he immediately searched M.'s person and found cigars, subsequently identified as having been taken from the burglarized premises, and that, immediately after accused had been taken to the city prison in a patrol wagon, other articles were found secreted in the wagon which came from the burglarized premises. Held, that the evidence was competent as tending to show that the premises described in the information had been burglarized.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Chester Ayhens was convicted of first-degree burglary, and from the judgment of conviction and an order denying a motion for a new trial he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. J. Van Hovenberg, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant, jointly with one Charles Miller, was charged with the crime of burglary. He was convicted, upon a separate trial, of burglary in the first degree, and sentenced to 15 years in the state's prison at San Quentin.

[1] The testimony of the arresting officer with reference to a conversation which he had with the codefendant Miller at the time of the arrest and not in the presence of the defendant was not objected to at the trial, and the error in the admission of this testimony cannot now be considered.

[2] Shortly after the commission of the burglary Police Officer Frank Anderson, while patrolling his beat, encountered the defendant and Miller. Their conduct was such as to attract the attention and arouse the suspicion of the officer. Upon the approach of the officer the defendant fled, and an immediate search of Miller's person revealed a box of cigars, which was subsequently identified as having been stolen from the premises charged to have been burglarized. Miller was placed under arrest and taken to the city prison in a patrol wagon. The arresting officer was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant, that immediately after Miller had been booked a brush and a razor, also identified as a portion of the property stolen from the premises in question, were found secreted in the patrol wagon. This testimony was admissible as a part of the people's case in proof of the fact that the burglary charged had been committed. It may not have been competent evidence to show that the defendant committed the crime charged, but it did tend to show that the premises described in the information had been burglarized, and for this purpose it was competent, relevant, and material. The defendant's objection, which went only to the competency of the evidence, was properly overruled.

Several days after the arrest of Miller the defendant was apprehended and charged with the crime. Miller was not called at the trial as a witness for the people, but Police Officer Kyle was permitted to testify, in effect, that, in his presence, and in the presence of the defendant, Miller declared that the defendant committed the burglary. Kyle testified, further, that the defendant promptly and unequivocally asserted that Miller was not telling the truth, and then, in response to questions put to him by Kyle, narrated the circumstances of his meeting with and being in the company of Miller on the night of and shortly after the commission of the crime.

Counsel for defendant objected to the testimony of the witness Kyle, upon the ground that the proffered statements of Miller were hearsay, and made after the commission of the burglary. The court overruled the objection upon the theory that Miller's accusation of the defendant was admissible merely because it was made in the presence of the defendant. Subsequently the defendant moved to strike out the testimony referred to. The district attorney resisted this motion upon the theory that he had shown the existence of a conspiracy by Miller and the defendant to commit the crime charged, and that, inasmuch as the testimony of Officer Kyle purported to disclose the declarations of a co-conspirator made in the presence of the defendant, it was admissible. The motion to strike out was denied, and in this, and in its ruling upon the previous objection, the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant.

[3] The testimony objected to was clearly hearsay, and its admission cannot be justified upon the theory that it was evidence of the declarations of a co-conspirator, or merely because the declarations of Miller were made in the presence and hearing of the defendant. The record is barren of any evidence which would tend to show the existence of a conspiracy to commit the crime charged. But, even if the record disclosed evidence sufficient to warrant the theory of the existence of a conspiracy, it is apparent that the declarations of Miller were made subsequent to the perpetration of the crime, and several days after the completion of the conspiracy claimed to have been shown by the people.

[4] The declarations of a co-conspirator, to be admissible in evidence, must be made during the life of and in furtherance of the conspiracy, and not upon or after its consummation. People v. English, 52 Cal. 212; People v. Aleck, 61 Cal. 138; People v. Dilwood, 94 Cal. 90, 29 Pac. 420. We are aware that there are several decisions in this state wherein it has been said generally that conversations had in the presence and hearing of a defendant are not hearsay, and may be admitted in evidence against him. People v. Moore, 45 Cal. 20; People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 504, 20 Pac. 56; People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 627, 45 Pac. 860. But we do not understand those cases to decide as an unqualified rule of law that the declarations of a person not called as a witness at the trial, even though he is shown to be a co-conspirator, are competent evidence merely because such declarations were made in the presence and hearing of the defendant. The sum and substance of the rule in this behalf, as well as its purpose and the circumstances under which it may be invoked and applied, are concisely stated by Mr. Justice Cooper in People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 532, 71 Pac. 651, wherein it is said: "It is undoubtedly the rule in this state that statements of persons not called as witnesses are not admissible in evidence simply because made in the presence and hearing of the accused person. It is only when there is something in the conduct of the accused person, in response to the statement, that is material to the issue, that the statements are admissible at all, and they are admissible then solely for the purpose of explaining the conduct of the accused."

The fact that Miller was either a co-conspirator or an admitted accomplice does not take his declarations, made when the crime or alleged conspiracy was a thing of the past, out of the category of hearsay evidence, nor entitle them to any greater consideration than that accorded to the statements of an innocent and disinterested third person. People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 653, 44 Pac. 312. The declarations of Miller could have been admissible against the defendant only in the presence of those circumstances which create an apparent exception to the rule excluding hearsay testimony, and permit in evidence statements made in the presence and hearing of a defendant, by a person not called as a witness, for the single purpose of showing that the defendant's conduct and statements in reply were not those of an innocent man. People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 338, 86 Pac. 671. Under this rule, repeatedly declared and defined in this state, the statements themselves cannot be received or considered as evidence. It is only the guilty conduct or incriminating reply of a defendant in response to an accusation of crime or statements implicating him in its commission that constitute relevant and competent evidence against him. People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 542, 66 Pac. 798.

[5] Ordinarily when a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstance of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt. Jones on Ev. § 291; People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Ah Yute, 53 Cal. 614; People v. Louie Foo, 112 Cal. 24, 44 Pac. 453; People v. Mallon, 103 Cal. 513, 37 Pac. 512; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 536, 66 Pac. 794. But, if he promptly and fully deny the charge, the accusatory statements standing alone are not in any sense competent evidence of the defendant's guilt (People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171; People v. Ah Yute, 54 Cal. 90), and should in such a contingency be excluded from the consideration of the jury (People v. Teshara, supra; People v. Philbon, supra). As was said in the case of People v. Teshara, supra: "The court and the district attorney seem to have lost sight of the fact that it is not the accusation, but the conduct of the accused, that is evidence in such cases, and that the only reason for admitting the accusation is to explain the conduct." This rule applies with peculiar force to the facts of the case at bar, for it appears from the record that when Miller had concluded his statement, wherein he declared the defendant to be the perpetrator of the crime, Officer Kyle turned to the defendant and asked him if Miller was telling the truth. Under such circumstances the silence of the defendant would have been competent evidence against him; but, in view of the defendant's prompt denial, the propriety and necessity of excluding Miller's statements from the evidence in the case at bar are readily apparent. The question which elicited the evidence complained of was: "Tell us what Miller said in the presence of the defendant?" This question upon its face was objectionable. It sought to adduce only the conversation of Miller, and not the conduct and statements of the defendant in reply, and in view of the defendant's objection it was incumbent upon the district attorney to amplify the question by adding the particulars which he expected to prove, or, at least, announce to the court that the question and the testimony sought to be adduced thereby were the preliminaries of a purpose and an effort to show the defendant's conduct and statements in the presence of an accusation of crime. The district attorney knew, or should have known, what the witness Kyle would testify to; and if it had been stated to the court by the district attorney that it was his purpose to show that the defendant had been charged by Miller with the commission of the crime, and that the defendant had promptly denied the accusation, it is but fair to the trial court to assume that the objection would have been sustained.

We are not unmindful of the suggestion made by the Attorney General that, as indicated in People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547, the rule of evidence under discussion is subject to the qualification that such testimony is admissible notwithstanding a defendant's prompt and full denial of guilt, if, in addition and in an attempt to avoid the effect of the accusation, he makes a statement which is calculated to deceive or is subsequently shown to be false. In such a case, however, the scope and effect of the evidence is not materially modified. The fact would still remain that the accusation could not be considered as evidence, for, in such a case, it is the falsehood, and not the accusation, which indicates a consciousness of guilt, and weighs against the defendant. People v. Turner, 1 Cal. App. 422, 82 Pac. 397.

Even in this modified form the rule of evidence referred to cannot, on the facts of this case, be invoked to support the rulings of the trial court. Apart from the alleged declarations of Miller, no attempt was made to contradict or impeach the statement of the defendant made in explanation of his conduct, his recent possession of stolen property, and his association with Miller on the night of the burglary. Neither is it apparent from the record before us that the defendant's reply to the accusation of Miller was a false and deceptive statement made in an attempt to avoid the effect and consequences of the accusation. Moreover, the defendant's subsequent explanation of his whereabouts on the night in question, and the reason which he gave for his flight on the approach of the arresting officer, were in response to questions by the witness Kyle, and do not appear to have been made in reply to anything that was said by Miller. This being so, the declaration of Miller that the defendant committed the crime charged became an independent piece of evidence which, although manifestly incompetent, was through the medium of the witness Kyle, submitted to the jury for its consideration.

[6] In any view of the case, we are forced to the conclusion that the evidence complained of was improperly admitted; and, as we are not permitted to say that the verdict would have been the same if the testimony of the witness Kyle had been rejected, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

John D. Knapp was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank McGowan and Elmer Westlake, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and the jury fixed his punishment at imprisonment in the state prison for the term of his natural life.

The Attorney General makes a preliminary objection to the consideration of the appeal, claiming (1) that the record discloses no appeal from the judgment; and (2) that, as neither the law nor a rule of court provides a method of appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, an appeal from such an order cannot be reviewed.

Notwithstanding these objections, we have examined the record, and the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the case renders a decision of those points unnecessary. It is defendant's contention that the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. We will therefore briefly review it.

On the morning of November 14, 1910, at about 8 o'clock, the body of Julia Carey was found in a vacant lot behind some billboards near the corner of McAllister and Leavenworth streets, in San Francisco. She was a woman who drank heavily, took poor care of herself, and for a long time had been in poor health. She was about 70 years of age, and when her dead body was discovered both eyes were contused, there was a compound fracture in the nasal bone, several contusions of the lower jaw, and a fracture of the parietal bone on the left side. This last injury, with the subsequent hemorrhage and shock, caused her death. The deceased had an abnormally thick skull, and her death, according to the testimony of a physician, must have been the result of a very heavy blow with some blunt instrument. Police Officer John D. Collins discovered the body. Quite a crowd had gathered at the spot, and among them was the defendant. The sides of his face and the backs of his hands were scarred with fresh scratches, and he attracted the attention of Officer Collins. The officer asked him if he knew anything about the death of the deceased, and he replied that he did not. We quote from the testimony of Officer Collins: "I talked to him quite a little while about the case and of the dead woman. A crowd commenced to collect around us, and finally he said for me to come into the barn. I said, 'What barn?' He said, 'This stable here—Clausen.' He said, 'I worked in there.' So we went in the barn. * * * Other officers joined me, and we commenced questioning him about the case. He denied that he knew this woman or anything about her death. We took him into custody and examined his room, which was in the stable. The walls of his room were bespattered with blood. The bedclothes and the mattresses were soaked with blood. There was blood also on a coat, vest, a pair of pants, a pair of drawers, a pair of blankets, a pillow, some towels, a sofa cushion, and on a handkerchief, all of which was the property of the defendant. An iron instrument which could have produced the wounds was found in the room, containing blood stains. Later, and while the defendant was in custody, a man by the name of Stevens, who had worked around the barn with the defendant, was arrested; and the defendant, referring to the arrest of Stevens, said: 'What in hell do you want to hold Stevens for? He doesn't know anything about this case, for he was not there when the thing happened.'" The day after the homicide Frank M. Esola, a police officer, found, hidden in the barn, an undershirt belonging to the defendant on which there was some fresh blood. The defendant, when questioned about the scratches on his face, responded that he did not "know how he got them," that he must have "fallen out of bed."

It is evident that the body of the deceased was dragged from the barn to the place where it was found, for there was a trail between those two points made by the dragging of a heavy body over the ground, and on this trail there were spots of blood. Defendant told Officer Esola that there was a "racket" near the stable during the night of November 13th-14th; that "at about 3 o'clock in the morning he was waked up by a noise in the street right outside of his bedroom; that the noise sounded like a man and woman in fighting; and that some one apparently fell against the outside of the barn." There were grey hairs, like those of the deceased, on the lapel of defendant's coat. A police officer accused the defendant of having murdered the woman, and he stood silent.

The defendant's explanation of his connection with the matter, given as a witness in his own behalf, is substantially as follows: That on the evening of November 13th he was engaged at work in the stable, when the deceased came in; that he had never seen her before, and she said she had a pain in her head, and she wanted him to get her some whisky; that he said something to her and went into a stall, and on his return found that she had fallen against the wheel of a spring wagon; that he rendered her some assistance, and she subsequently fell again; that he washed her face with some water and a handkerchief, sat her on a box, and told her to rest herself; that she got up from the box, walked into his room, and sat on a trunk, holding a towel in her hands; that she continually pleaded with him for whisky, and that he went out to get her some; that he went to a restaurant, got his supper, read a newspaper, played cards, walked back to the stable, tried to arouse the woman, and found that she was dead, whereupon he became horrified, and fainted. When he came to he was bewildered, and, remembering that he had before been convicted of murder, concluded that he would be charged with the murder of this woman, and that, in order to screen himself, he dragged the body to the place where found by the officer. He accounted for the scars on his face by saying that, when he assisted the deceased to her feet after her first fall, she grabbed the side of his face with her hands and scratched him.

The defendant called two character witnesses and some others, who gave inconsequential testimony.

[1] The inference sought to be given by a part of the defendant's testimony is that the deceased fractured her skull when she fell, as he says, against the wheel of the wagon; but, according to his testimony, she walked after that fall, whereas the contradicted testimony of the physicians is that she could not have walked after her skull was fractured. The defendant made inconsistent statements about the circumstances of the crime. As a whole, his narrative is very improbable, and we think the evidence in the case points convincingly to him as the perpetrator of the crime. It may be that the blood on the underclothing of defendant does not suggest very strongly that passion was the motive actuating him to kill the deceased, but some one killed her; and, as she was poor, old, penniless, and harmless, there could be but little motive on the part of any person to take her life. Whoever killed her had but a slight motive.

[2] But it may be said in passing that proof of motive is never indispensable to a conviction. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75.

[3] We think the jury reached a correct conclusion in the case. But, be that as it may, there is certainly an abundance of evidence tending to show that the defendant committed the homicide. A question of law therefore is not presented to this court. People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 Pac. 984; People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 Pac. 779; People v. Oppemeheimer, 156 Cal. 746, 106 Pac. 74.

[4] Dr. C. A. Glover, the autopsy surgeon, was permitted to testify over the objection of defendant that it would "require a pretty heavy blow with some instrument to cause that fracture." This testimony, says the defendant, "was a mere speculation, and did not call for expert testimony." The witness had already testified that the skull of deceased was abnormally thick, and later, without objection, that the wound was necessarily caused by some blunt instrument. The testimony disclosed that the skull of the deceased was abnormally thick, and we think the jury, therefore, without this testimony, would naturally draw the conclusion that it would take a harder blow to fracture her skull than to fracture a skull of normal thickness. Even if the testimony were improperly admitted, the error would be harmless, but we think the ruling of the court was sound. "Any witness familiar by experience with the appearance or treatment of wounds, particularly a physician or surgeon, may give an opinion as to the manner in which a mortal wound was probably inflicted; as to the kind of weapon used; as to the distance from which a shot was fired; as to the degree of force employed and as to the direction of a blow. * * *" Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 321. "Whether a particular wound could have been produced by a particular instrument is a question on which the opinion of experts can be asked." Wharton on Homicide, p. 943. See, also, State v. Wilcox, 132 N. C. 1120, 44 S. E. 630; State v. Breaux, 104 La. 540, 29 South. 222; Tune v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. R. 445, 94 S. W. 231; and particularly Fairall on Crim. Law and Procedure, p. 228.

[5] The same witness on cross-examination testified to a certain condition of the defendant's brain; and after denying that he had testified differently at the preliminary examination, he in effect said that, if the stenographic transcript of such examination showed that such was the case, then the reporter was "evidently mistaken." A motion to strike out this testimony on the ground that it was not responsive, and that it was argumentative, was denied. This ruling is now assigned as error. The point has little merit, but it is sufficient to say that part of the answer certainly was responsive; hence the motion to strike out the whole answer was too general. People v. Pembroke, 6 Cal. App. 591, 92 Pac. 668.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

5. DRAINS (§ 76*)—PLANS OF WORK—ASSESSMENT.

That reclamation commissioners, through mistake or under the belief that the district would not be required to pay the cost of acquiring certain levees owned privately, did not include the cost of acquiring them in their estimate of the cost of the work was a mere defect in the plans, not jurisdictional, and not preventing the supervisors from ordering an assessment based on the cost, including such levees; Pol. Code, § 3455, providing for new or supplemental plans.

Department 2. Appeal from the Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Proceedings by Reclamation District No. 730 against Ella L. Hershey and others. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hudson Grant and E. A. Bridgford, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to enforce the collection of an assessment upon the lands of the defendants and appellants. Judgment passed for plaintiff. From that judgment these defendants did not appeal; their sole appeal being from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] Upon this appeal, however, they urge certain propositions cognizable, if at all, only on appeal from the judgment, and others which in the condition of the record cannot here be considered. Thus appellants filed an amendment to their answer tendering certain new matters as a defense. This amendment was stricken out by the court. Its ruling in this regard can be reviewed only on appeal from the judgment. Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 583, 36 Pac. 936; Holmes v. Warren, 145 Cal. 460, 78 Pac. 954; Petaluma, etc., Co. v. Singley, 136 Cal. 618, 69 Pac. 426; Swift v. Occidental Mining Co., 141 Cal. 165, 74 Pac. 700. Again, appellants undertake to attack the legality of the formation of the district. But if the organization of such a district be subject to collateral attack, in an action to collect an assessment, no issue upon the matter is joined by the pleading. Amongst other propositions advanced are that the report of the board of trustees to the board of supervisors of the plans of reclamation do not conform to the requirements of section 3455 of the Political Code, that the lands of these appellants are not described, as required by the provisions of section 3461 of the Political Code, and that the amount of the charge assessed against each tract, as provided by subdivision 4 of section 3461 of the Political Code, is not stated. The complete answer to these propositions is that the complaint charged the due performance of these matters, and that the defendants did not join issue upon any of them. The effort of the defendants to raise any of these issues by the amendment to their answer was rendered futile by the court striking out those amendments, and their redress for any injury which they may deem they suffered by this ruling can only be given them upon an appeal from the judgment—an appeal, as has been said, which they have not taken.

[2, 3] Conceding the force of this, appellants undertake to meet it by such cases as Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 645, 95 Am. Dec. 152; Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 676, 41 Pac. 806; and Kimball v. Richardson Co., 111 Cal. 397, 43 Pac. 1111. Those cases, one and all, however, are simply to the effect that where an allegation is pleaded, though defectively, or where denial is made, though defectively, the introduction by the parties of evidence upon the question, without objection, will be construed as waiving such defect. The reason upon which this ruling is founded is plain and just. The parties by their conduct have accepted the pleadings as sufficient, and neither will be allowed, after the time for amendment has passed, to urge the insufficiency to defeat his adversary's rights. In the case at bar, the answer by its silence admitted as true all these allegations of the complaint. No issue was tendered or sought to be tendered upon any of these matters. The effort to meet any of them by the amendments to the answer was promptly opposed by plaintiff by demurrer and by motion to strike out, and, when the court finally ruled in accordance with plaintiff's demurrer and motion to strike out, the only redress of defendants was plainly before them—an appeal from the judgment, which they did not take.

[4] The remaining contentions of appellants which are reviewable upon appeal are, first, that the assessment is levied upon lands which it is found would not be benefited by the work of reclamation, and which, therefore, should have been exempted in the assessment levy. Even where such a state of things exists, the assessment is properly levied upon the whole tract (Reclamation District v. McCullah, 124 Cal. 175, 56 Pac. 887), and the finding of the commissioners that certain fragmentary pieces or parcels of a tract will not be benefited does not relieve from the necessity of assessing the whole as a tract; the proper method of treating the matter being as was done in this case, and as approved in Reclamation District No. 70 v. Birks, 113 Pac. 170.

[5] The second and remaining proposition is that the assessment levied upon the lands of the defendants is not in proportion to the whole expense and to the benefits which will result from the proposed works of reclamation. Herein appellants' contention is that, by section 3455 of the Political Code, it is the duty of the board of trustees, after the adoption of plans and specifications for the reclamation of the lands, to report to the board such plans and specifications, "together with estimates of the cost of the works necessary for the reclamation of the lands of the district in pursuance of any such plan or plans," and the assessment under section 3456 is to be made upon the lands by "a charge proportionate to the whole expense and to the benefits which will result from such works." It is insisted that by the imperfections in these plans the whole of the cost was not estimated, and therefore that the assessment was not in proportion to the "whole expense." It appears that the commissioners, either through inadvertence or in the belief that the district would not be called upon to pay for them, did not include in their estimate of the cost of work the acquisition of certain levees held in private ownership. At the most, this amounts to a mere defect in the plans, which would not result in destroying them so completely as to deprive the supervisors of the power to order the assessment based on the cost as disclosed by them. The law itself contemplates such mistakes or imperfections when it provides, in section 3455 of the Political Code, for "new, supplemental or additional plans." It is well settled that defects in the plans do not affect the jurisdiction. Haughwout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 676, 63 Pac. 1078; Reclamation District v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 635, 4 Pac. 676.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 730 v. SNOWBALL, et al. (Sac. 1,831.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 7, 1911.)

1. AFFIDAVITS (§ 12*)—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER—ABSENCE OF SEAL.

The absence of a seal from the jurat of the clerk of the circuit court, attached to an affidavit, does not affect the validity of the oath.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Affidavits, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—CONFORMITY TO LAW.

If an affidavit was necessary to give jurisdiction to establish a reclamation district, and the jurat of the officer administering the oath was defective for not showing that it was administered as clerk of the circuit court, it would be presumed that evidence was taken to supplement the jurat and show that the oath was duly administered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. DRAINS (§ 90*)—ACTIONS FOR ASSESSMENTS—DEFENSES—CONSTRUCTION OF LEVEES BY OWNER.

An action to collect the assessments for a reclamation district cannot be defeated by showing an agreement between certain property owners, to which the district was not a party, by which some of them should construct levees and have their land set off as an independent district, or by the showing of an owner assessed that he had constructed a levee, which was used by the district, for which he had not received compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 730 against Leutie E. Snowball and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

Hudson & Grant, R. H. Countryman, and A. G. Bailey, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to enforce the collection of an assessment upon the lands of defendants and appellants. The plaintiff is the same plaintiff and the assessment the same assessment considered in Reclamation District No. 730 v. Ella L. Hershey et al., 117 Pac. 904 (Sac. 1,832). Most of the propositions here advanced are disposed of by what has been said in the opinion in that case. In this instance, however, the appeal is from the judgment, as well as from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The answer in this case denied, for lack of "knowledge, information, or belief," the allegations touching the due organization of the district. Those denials were stricken out by the trial court as being sham and frivolous, since the organization was a matter of record, and it was not proper for the defendant to deny record matter for lack of information. But waiving the question of the soundness of this ruling, waiving also the question as to whether the due organization of such a district can be attacked in a proceeding such as this, and coming to the consideration of the sole ground of attack which is here presented, the ground itself is untenable, and the contention without merit. The affidavit of the publication of the petition (Pol. Code, §§ 3446, 3447) was admittedly in due form. The jurat declared that it was sworn to before "G. L. Duncan, Clerk." Attached thereto was the seal of the superior court of Yolo county. It is contended that this jurat was insufficient, and therefore the board of supervisors did not acquire jurisdiction. G. L. Duncan was county clerk of the county of Yolo. As such clerk he was ex officio clerk of the superior court and ex officio clerk of the board of supervisors. In any one of these three capacities, he was empowered to administer an oath. In which capacity he did in fact administer it is immaterial, but it would seem from the seal attached to have been administered by him as clerk of the superior court. Even the absence of any seal would have amounted to a mere irregularity not affecting the validity of the oath (Dennis v. Bith, 122 Cal. 42, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17), and, in so far as this affidavit was necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the supervisors to act, it would be presumed, if necessary, where the jurat was defective, that they took evidence to supplement the jurat and to show that in fact, the oath was duly administered.

J. W. Snowball appeared in the proceedings for the organization of the district, and filed a remonstrance. His remonstrance was admitted in evidence in this case. Its introduction was unnecessary, but its admission could work no injury. It certainly tended to show the knowledge of Snowball of the proceeding, and the jurisdiction acquired by the supervisors, at least as to him, by his appearance and application for affirmative relief. But, as a matter of fact, as has been said, no question is raised as to the propriety and legality of the proceedings, saving in the one matter above mentioned.

The court refused admission in evidence of an agreement between certain residents and property owners of the district. The purport of the agreement was that certain property owners within the district would construct levees. Upon complying with the terms of the agreement, some of these property owners were to initiate proceedings to have their lands set off into an independent reclamation district. This contract was not entered into with the district. Whatever the property owners did or did not do under the agreement could not bind the district, nor operate to impair or curtail the rights and powers of the district as an agent and mandatory of the state.

[3] For the same reason the court's ruling in striking out the amendment to the answer was sound and proper. This amendment was in the nature of a defense based upon the contract above adverted to and the performance of the contract by J. W. Snowball, and further advanced as a defense the contention that he constructed a levee which was being used by the district, and for which he had never been compensated. An action to enforce the collection of an assessment is not one to which a defense such as this will lie. Reclamation District v. Burgur, 122 Cal. 442, 55 Pac. 156.

For the above reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GURNEY v. NORTHERN CALIFORNIA
POWER CO. (Sac. 1745.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 7, 1911.)

1. HIGHWAYS (§ 95*)—HIGHWAY EASEMENT—
SUPERVISOR'S CONTROL.

Where the public acquires only an easement in a highway, its right is limited to the right to travel, and the only control over it which the board of supervisors can exercise is such as is necessary to maintain the highway in a proper condition for the exercise of such use by the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

2. DEDICATION (§ 57*)—EASEMENT—DEDICA-TION—RIGHTS OF OWNER.

Where land is dedicated to the public for a highway, the owner retains his right to the soil for all purposes not inconsistent with the public's easement, and to all profit or advantage that may be derived therefrom; and hence a municipality, embracing the highway, may not confer on a third person the right to enter on the highway and occupy any portion thereof, without the consent of the landowner, when such entry is not for a purpose incidental to the effective use of the highway by the public for travel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 100; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*)—FRANCHISES—
"LAWFUL PURPOSE."

County Government Act 1897 (St. 1897, p. 466), § 25, subd. 35, authorizes county supervisors to grant franchises over the public roads and highways for all "lawful purposes" on such terms and conditions as, in their judgment, may be necessary and proper, and in such manner as to present the least possible obstruction and inconvenience to the traveling public. Held, that the words "lawful purposes," as so used, should be construed as limited to purposes in aid of the public's easement of travel, something which would promote the public comfort and convenience in the use of the highway; and hence such act did not authorize a county board of supervisors to grant a franchise to an electric power company to erect its power line along a highway, the title to the soil of which is not in the abutting property owners, for the primary purpose of furnishing light and power to private individuals, without rendering compensation to such abutting owners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 304-314; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4032.]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*)—FRANCHISES—PUBLIC PURPOSE.

Where a franchise improperly granted by a board of supervisors authorized defendant power company to place its poles and wires over all the roads and highways of the county, to conduct and transmit electric current for power, light, and other necessary and useful purposes, without the consent of or payment of compensation to abutting owners, it could not be supported, as against such owners, on the theory that it was in effect a contract with the county that the company's system should be erected for the purpose of lighting the highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 304-314; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*)—POWER—LIGHT—USE OF HIGHWAY—PUBLIC PURPOSE.

Where a franchise, authorizing a power company to construct its line over a highway, was originally granted primarily to enable the corporation to furnish electricity to private individuals, without requiring the consent of or payment of damages to abutting owners, the franchise could not be supported, as having been granted for a purpose consistent with the maintenance of the highway, by the fact that years after its construction the county contracted for the use of electricity to furnish power to a pumping station used in connection with other appliances for sprinkling a section of the highway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 304-314; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

6. HIGHWAYS (§ 88*)—USE OF HIGHWAY—EFFECT.

Under County Government Act 1897 (St. 1897, p. 466), § 25, subd. 35, giving the county board of supervisors power to grant franchises over the public roads and highways for all "lawful purposes," a franchise granted to a public service corporation engaged in discharging a public duty to use the highway is only effective to permit an entry on the public's easement in subordination to the rights of the owners of the fees, and does not warrant any invasion of the property rights of such owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*)—USE OF HIGHWAY—POWER CURRENT—ADDITIONAL SERVICE.

Where an electric power company's franchise did not authorize it to erect poles and wires along the highway, without the consent of or without paying compensation to abutting property owners, the erection of poles and wires, without such consent or the payment of compensation, constituted an additional servitude, for which the owner of the land was entitled to redress.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 304-314; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

8. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 280*)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—INVASION OF HIGHWAY.

Where defendant electric power company erected poles and wires along a highway, without the consent of or the payment of compensation to plaintiff, an abutting property owner, under a franchise which conferred no right so to do, but plaintiff acquiesced in the occupation of his land for a long period as to a part of the line so constructed, and failed to sue with reference to any part of the land until the line had been constructed and a public interest had intervened, plaintiff was not entitled to compel the removal of the line in ejectment, but was only entitled to recover such damages as he had sustained thereby.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; James F. Ellison, Judge. Action by W. H. Gurnsey against the Northern California Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reid & Dozier, for appellant. P. H. Coffman, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff is the owner in fee of a large tract of land near Red Bluff, in Tehama county, across which for over 40 years a public wagon road or highway, commencing at Red Bluff and running to the easterly boundary of the county, has existed. Defendant is a public service corporation, organized for the purpose of furnishing the public along its lines with electricity for power, heat, and lighting, and also furnishing municipalities, cities, and towns with electricity for like purposes, including the lighting of highways, and when this action was brought was engaged in furnishing it for these purposes in the counties of Shasta, Glenn, and Tehama.

In October, 1902, defendant applied to and obtained from the board of supervisors of Tehama county a franchise, the material provision of which involved here is as follows: "The right, privilege and franchise is hereby granted the Northern California Power Company, its successors or assigns, to erect poles of not less than six inches in diameter at the top, and stretch wire and other appliance thereon for the purpose of conducting and transmitting electric current for power, light and other necessary and useful purposes, over and along the county roads, bridges and highways of said Tehama county, and along the streets, alleys and avenues of the various unincorporated towns and villages in said county." This franchise was granted for 50 years. In 1903 defendant built a power pole line from its electrical station in Red Bluff easterly along the public highway referred to and over the land of plaintiff to a point where an avenue intersected said public road. In 1906 this line was further extended about a mile along said public road, across the land of plaintiff, to the premises of the Cone Ranch Company. In June, 1906, plaintiff brought this action in ejectment, alleging: "That the defendant, without title and without the consent of the plaintiff, entered upon and into the possession of the said land and premises, and has dug holes and erected poles thereon, and has strung, built, and erected wires and an electric power line for a distance of about two miles on and over the said lands."

In its answer defendant set up that it was a public service corporation, organized for the purpose of and actually engaged in the business of furnishing electricity for the purposes heretofore stated, and the fact that it had obtained a franchise from the board of supervisors of Tehama county granting it the privilege of erecting poles and stringing wires thereon along the county roads and highways of said county; that it had erected a power pole line along the highway in question, where it crosses the land of plaintiff, for the purpose of furnishing power, heat, and lighting, and for the purpose of connecting up with other portions of its system, so as to furnish power and light to towns, cities, and municipal governments, and for the purpose of lighting public highways leading to and from cities, both incorporated and unincorporated; that the portion of its line which crossed the public highway over the land of plaintiff was intended to be used for lighting public highways over which it might cross, including the public highway across the land of the plaintiff herein, and for furnishing electric power for pumping water along said public highway, to be used in sprinkling the same; that it was and for a long time past had been actually engaged, under contract with the board of supervisors of Tehama county, in lighting said highway and in furnishing electric power along the line of said public highway for pumping water to be used in sprinkling the same, and that if compelled to move its power pole line from the highway it could not fulfill its contract to light said public highway or provide electric power on said highway for pumping water for said sprinkling purposes. It was further alleged that defendant did not claim to hold said highway, or any part thereof, exclusively from the plaintiff or the public, or any one else, but only claimed the right to use that portion of the highway actually occupied by its power poles in common with the public, under and by virtue of the franchise granted it by the board of supervisors of Tehama county, and not otherwise.

The court found that plaintiff was the owner of the fee in the land over which the public highway crossed, and on which defendant had erected its power pole system, and that it had been granted a franchise, as alleged, permitting it to erect its poles over the roads and highways of the county; that while defendant was organized to engage in the business of furnishing electric power for all purposes claimed by it, including the lighting of highways, the line in question, starting from the station of defendant in Red Bluff and running on said highway over and across the land of plaintiff to its eastern terminus near the Cone ranch, was not constructed for the purpose of lighting that or any public highway, or for the purpose of furnishing power to pump water on said highway, to be used for sprinkling purposes, and that it never at any time had been actually engaged under a contract with the board of supervisors of Tehama county in lighting any portion of said highway along or across the land of plaintiff. Upon the findings so made, the court entered a judgment for possession and restoration of the premises described in the complaint, and that defendant and its poles and power lines be ejected and removed from said premises.

The main points for consideration on this appeal are whether the board of supervisors had power to grant a franchise to the defendant, authorizing it to enter upon the highway, the fee to which was in the plaintiff, and erect its power pole system thereon, without permission of or compensation being first paid to plaintiff as the owner of the land, and, if it did not, and the entry of the defendant thereon was unauthorized and unwarranted, and an invasion of the property rights of plaintiff in the fee of the land, was plaintiff entitled to maintain an action in ejectment to cause its removal therefrom?

The first proposition is presented for consideration under what the appellant claims was the effect of the franchise granted it by the board of supervisors, and also under an attack which is made upon the findings of the court that it had not been granted a franchise for the lighting of the highway, or for the purpose of furnishing power to the pumping station of the county for road-sprinkling purposes, and was not built for either of these purposes.

There is no question in this case but that plaintiff is the owner of the fee in the land in question, and entitled to the full beneficial use of it, subject to the easement or limited fee which the public has in the highway over it.

[1, 2] It is well settled that the easement or right which the public acquires by the establishment of a highway is the right to travel thereover, and that the only control over it which the board of supervisors, as trustees for the public, can exercise is such as is necessary to maintain the highway in a proper and convenient manner for the exercise of the use by the public. Aside from this, the owner of the land retains his right to the soil for all purposes not inconsistent with the easement, and to all profit or advantage which may be derived therefrom; and a municipality may not confer upon any one the right to enter upon such highway and occupy any portion thereof, without the consent of the owner of the soil, when such entry is not for purposes incidental to the effective use by the public of the highway. All that the public acquires under the easement is declared by section 2631 of the Political Code, as follows: "By taking or accepting land for a highway, the public acquires only the right of way, and the incidents necessary to enjoying and maintaining the same, subject to the regulations in this and the Civil Code provided." This is but the declaration of the general rule on the subject stated in the case quoted from in Wright v. Austin, 143 Cal. 236, 240, 76 Pac. 1023, 1025 (65 L. R. A. 949, 101 Am. St. Rep. 97), where it is said to be well established, "In conformity with the principles of the common law, that a highway is simply an easement or servitude conferring upon the public only the right of passage over the land on which it is laid out, and, as an incident of such right, that of using the soil or material upon it in a reasonable manner, for the purpose of making and repairing it. * * * Subject to this right of the public, he may take trees growing upon the land, occupy mines, sink water courses under it, and generally has a right to every use and profit which can be derived from it consistent with the easement, and when disseised (as he may be) can maintain ejectment, and recover possession, subject to the easement, and can also maintain trespass for any act done to the land not necessary for the enjoyment of the easement, which would be an actionable injury if the land was not covered by a highway."

[3] Authority, it is true, is given to the board of supervisors of any county "to grant franchises over and along the public roads and highways for all lawful purposes, upon such terms and conditions as in their judgment may be necessary and proper, and in such manner as to present the least possible obstruction and inconvenience to the traveling public." County Gov. Act 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 466, subd. 35 of section 25). This right given to the board to grant such franchises "for all lawful purposes" has in view primarily a purpose in aid of the easement; something which will promote the public comfort and convenience in the use of the highway. It may be that a public highway, by reason of its proximity to a large city, is so heavily traveled that in the judgment of the county authorities it would be necessary, to promote the convenience and safety of the traveling public, that a highway be lighted. It seems to be well settled by the weight of authority that, under a general power over public highways to promote the safety and convenience of the public travel thereover, the authorities have a right to provide for the lighting of such highway at night. And for that purpose a public service corporation may be granted a franchise to erect its poles thereon; that such a use of the highway, for the purpose of lighting it, is incidental to the full enjoyment of the public easement, imposing no additional servitude of which the abutting owner can complain. This matter is treated fully in Gurnsey v. Northern California, etc., Co., 7 Cal. App. 534, 94 Pac. 858, to which reference is made on the subject. It may be conceded, too (though we do not so decide), that a franchise to an electric light company to erect its system over a highway, for the purpose of furnishing power at a pumping plant erected thereon, for water to be used in sprinkling a highway, may be justified for the same reason that authorizes the franchise for lighting the highway. But conceding all this, it is clear that the franchise attempted to be granted by the board of supervisors to this corporation was not for either of these purposes, and this brings us to a consideration of the franchise actually granted by the board of supervisors to the appellant, as also to a consideration of its attack upon certain of the findings.

[4] It is claimed, as to the franchise granted by the board of supervisors, that it was in effect a contract between the county and the appellant that its electric system should be erected for the purpose of lighting the highway. There is no merit whatever in this claim. The franchise was in general terms, and granted permission to the appellant corporation to place its poles and string its wires over all the roads and highways of Tehama county, for the purpose of conducting and transmitting electric current for power, light, and other necessary and useful purposes. It was granted, obviously, under the provision of the county government act of 1897, heretofore referred to, and followed its language. If it be conceded that the board could grant such a franchise, all that it undertook to do was to give the company permission to enter upon the public easement, which was under the control of the board as trustees for the public, an entry upon which by the company, without such permission, would have made it a trespasser upon the easement. The board could not confer permission on the company, for purposes not incidental to the proper use of the highway, to invade the property rights of plaintiff in the soil by digging holes therein and erecting poles. Not a word is said in the franchise about lighting any highway. The board of supervisors did not at any time authorize the construction of this electric system along the highway in question for lighting it. No action was ever taken by the board declaring that it was necessary to do so; no contract was ever entered into by the board with the company for any such lighting; and the highway was in fact never lighted by the appellant. A board of supervisors has no authority to grant a general franchise to any one to light all the highways in the county, and it would be an entirely unwarranted construction of the ordinance authorizing the appellant generally to occupy any and all of the roads and highways in a county to say that it amounted to a contract with the board to light any and all the roads and highways generally referred to in the ordinance. Nothing of the kind was contemplated by the board, nor was the system constructed across the highway by the appellant for that purpose. The evidence clearly shows that the first extension of the line from the electric station in Red Bluff to an avenue leading to the land of General N. P. Chipman was built in 1903, solely for the purpose of supplying power for pumping purposes on the premises of General Chipman, and furnishing light to those premises, under a contract made with him for that purpose before the building of the extension was commenced, and that the extension thereafter, in 1906 (the same year this action was brought), from the avenue last mentioned to the Cone ranch was for the purpose of furnishing power and light at the Cone Ranch Company premises. No doubt the appellant would, after its line was built, have furnished electricity to any one who desired it, but it was built for the purposes indicated. Under this evidence it is clear that this line was not built for the purpose of furnishing light to the highway, but for purely commercial purposes—the sale of power and light to the Chipman and Cone ranch premises, and to such others as might desire it.

[5] As to the attempt to justify its occupation of the highway over the premises of plaintiff, on the ground that it is under contract with the board of supervisors to furnish power to the county for pumping water for sprinkling the roads. Its original construction was for no such purpose. It appears that years after the appellant had constructed its system over this highway the board of supervisors installed a pumping plant on the line of the highway, for the purpose of sprinkling the road from near Red Bluff to a gate on the Cone ranch—some three miles—and entered into a contract with the appellant to furnish electric power to the pumping station. It is insisted that, as authority is given to the county to provide means for making the roadway more convenient for travel by sprinkling, through the erection of waterworks (subdivision 10, § 2643, Pol. Code; subdivision 7, § 25, County Gov. Act 1897), that the occupation of the highway by the system of appellant, for the purpose, among other things, of furnishing such power, justify its occupation of the highway. We are not cited to any authority sustaining this claim of appellant, nor do we deem it necessary to consider it. As we have seen, the original occupation of the highway was not for lighting nor for furnishing power to the pumping plant, which are the only grounds upon which it can justify its occupation of the highway as against the plaintiff; hence a subsequent contract with the county, under which it purchased power from the company, cannot justify the original entry. If its entry was invalid in the first instance, this contract to purchase power from it did not validate its occupancy.

[6] It may be, as claimed by appellant, that under the county government act, heretofore referred to, empowering the board of supervisors to grant franchises along the public highway "for all lawful purposes," the board of supervisors of Tehama county was authorized to grant to defendant, as a public service corporation engaged in discharging a public duty, the right to enter upon the highway. But, if this be conceded, it does not affect the situation here. Such a franchise could only permit an entry upon the easement itself. Such a franchise must be taken in subordination to the paramount rights of plaintiff as owner of the fee, and would afford no warrant for the invasion of the property rights of plaintiff therein.

[7] Our conclusion, therefore, is that the planting of its power pole line in the highway over the land of plaintiff, for a purpose not incidental to the use of such highway, is inconsistent with the dedication of the highway to the use of the public. It constituted an additional servitude or burden upon the land of plaintiff beyond the purpose of the dedication, and was an invasion of his property rights therein, for which he was entitled to redress.

[8] Now as to the remedy. It is insisted by appellant that the only remedy available to plaintiff under the circumstances of this case is an action for damages, and not ejectment. In this view we are satisfied that the appellant is correct. While the general rule is that one may maintain ejectment against either an individual or corporation who has, without right, entered upon his land, this rule is subject to some exceptions. One of these exceptions is applied in the case of public service corporations, when it appears that, although the entry was originally without right, the owner permitted the corporation to make the entry on his land, and complete and construct the works to do which his land was appropriated, and failed to bring any action until after public interests, by reason of the construction, had intervened. Under such circumstances, the right to maintain ejectment is denied, and the owner of the land is remitted to an action for damages alone. Jones, in his work respecting Telegraph and Telephone Companies, § 53, says: "In many cases telegraph and telephone companies enter upon the land of another without the latter's knowledge or consent, but the fact that they do, or that he permitted them to do so, does not give the company a title or right of way, or estop him from maintaining an action for damages; and yet it may preclude him from maintaining any action of ejectment; * * * and should he stand by until the line is completed and in operation, and public interests have become involved, he will be denied the right to maintain an action of ejectment, or the right to enjoin them. His only remedy under such circumstances is a proceeding brought to recover damages." This is the rule, too, of the adjudicated cases. Ind. Bloomington & Western Ry. Co. v. Allen, 113 Ind. 581, 15 N. E. 446; Reichert v. Railway, 51 Ark. 491, 11 S. W. 696, 5 L. R. A. 183; Hanlin v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 61 Wis. 515, 21 N. W.

623; Kittell v. Railroad Co., 56 Vt. 96; Goodwin v. Cinn. W. Con. Co., 18 Ohio St. 169, 98 Am. Dec. 95; Roberts v. Northern Pac. R. R. Co., 158 U. S. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. 756, 39 L. Ed. 373. Numerous other authorities might be cited from other jurisdictions. But, in effect, this principle is sustained by the authorities in this state. Fresno, etc., Co. v. Southern Pac. Co., 135 Cal. 202, 67 Pac. 773; Southern Cal. Ry. Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 344, 71 Pac. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 58; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 252, 76 Pac. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940. In these latter cases, it is true, there were oral agreements under which the railroad companies went into possession of the land, and in the last case the construction of the canal was with the tacit consent of those who sought to have it abated and removed from their land as a nuisance. The principle, however, upon which the right to maintain ejectment or to quiet title or to abate the canal was denied in those cases was that, as public interests had intervened through the construction and operation of these public agencies before the actions in those cases were commenced, any right of the parties to disturb them in their possession of the property was thereby lost, and only an action to recover compensation for the land taken could be available. In principle there can be no difference, as far as the application of the rule of public policy is concerned, whether the entry is by original consent of the owner, or he permits it to be made and attempts to assert no right until after the public interests have intervened.

In the case at bar a large portion of the original line was erected over the land of plaintiff in 1903, and the latter part was built before this action was brought. These facts show acquiescence on the part of plaintiff in the occupation of his land for a long period as to one part of the line constructed, and a failure to bring an action respecting the entry on any part of his land by the defendant corporation until the construction of its power pole line had been accomplished over it, and public interests had intervened; and hence, under the rule, he is precluded from maintaining any action, save one for compensation.

The principle which underlies this rule is not based on any consideration of rights pertaining to the public service corporation itself, but solely upon considerations of public policy. The rights which a public service corporation may exercise under the power of eminent domain are conferred upon it on account of its public character and to advance the interests of the public. The defendant, as such corporation, was authorized to proceed and acquire a right of way over the land of plaintiff. It is true the Constitution provides that private property may not be taken for public use, unless compensation is first paid to the owner. But this condition of compensation to be first paid is solely for the benefit of the owner of the land, and, like any other personal right, may be insisted on by him, or waived, at his pleasure. He might, when the defendant corporation commenced the construction of its electric power system over his land, have stood upon his constitutional rights and enjoined its entry until he had been first paid for it, or he could have permitted the defendant to enter thereon and perfect the construction of its system for the public benefit. But when he has thus permitted, by inaction, expenditures to be made and public interests to intervene, he will be deemed to have waived all other remedies which he might have invoked, save that of an action for compensation. This rule is not based so much upon the application of the doctrine of estoppel, under which an owner of land, who remains inactive and permits a public service corporation, such as a railroad, telegraph, telephone, electric power, gas, or water company, to enter upon his land without right and expend large sums of money in constructing and completing the work, will be deemed to have acquiesced in the entrance, so that all remedies save one for compensation will be denied him. It is based mainly on the great principle of public policy, under which the rights of the citizen are sometimes abridged in the interest of the public welfare. It is applied in a case such as this, when the plaintiff has stood by, without asserting a right which he might have invoked, until the corporation charged with a service, public in its nature, has completed its electric line over his land, and is actually engaged in discharging a public duty, advantageous and important alike to the social and business interests of the community in proximity to its power lines. Public policy requires that, under such circumstances, the remedy of ejectment should be denied to plaintiff, when the effect of a judgment in such an action would be to destroy the efficiency of the electric line system by taking possession from defendants of that part of it constructed over the land of plaintiff, and thus destroying the public rights which have intervened.

Nor does the application of this rule of public policy, limiting his right, so that public interest shall not suffer, work any particular hardship upon the owner of the land. The effect of his inaction until public interests have become involved only deprives him of his right to maintain ejectment. He may not recover possession, but he may maintain an action under which full compensation may be recovered. This compensation is all he could have required the defendant first to have paid him, before it took his land for public use. This compensation he may still have under his present pleading. While the complaint contains the usual averments in ejectment, it sets forth, also, the particular method of entry and occupancy of his land by defendant, namely, by placing poles therein and stringing wires, and avers damages sustained thereby. The trial court should, on the remission of this case for a new trial, permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint in such respects as will permit him to invoke this remedy, which is alone available to him, to recover just compensation for his land, which the defendant has appropriated for a public use, and any damages sustained thereby. When this case was before the District Court of Appeal (Gurnsey v. Northern Cal., etc., Co., supra), on an independent appeal from the one now under consideration, it was held that ejectment was the proper remedy available to plaintiff, but with such view, for the reasons above stated, we cannot agree.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Suit by the Asiatic Club against W. J. Biggy and others. From an order denying an application for an injunction pendente lite, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, for appellant. Chas. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., W. H. Langdon, R. W. Harrison, and A. R. Cotton, Jr., for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order of the superior court, refusing to grant an injunction pendente lite, in an action brought to obtain a judgment perpetually enjoining the defendants, members of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, from entering upon or in any way interfering with plaintiff's possession and enjoyment of its premises at No. 118 Waverly place, in said city and county, which premises, it is alleged, are used by the members of said club solely for "educational and social purposes."

The complaint was filed November 6, 1908, and an order to show cause why a temporary injunction should not issue was made. The motion was heard upon the complaint and affidavits, and on June 22, 1909, the order to show cause was discharged, and a temporary injunction denied. An appeal was improperly taken to the District Court of Appeal for the First district; appellate jurisdiction in such a case as this being in this court. The matter has been transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

[1, 2] We see no merit whatever in this appeal. Counsel are necessarily compelled to concede that the decision of the trial judge in a matter of this kind cannot be disturbed by an appellate court, in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion, and that the decision of such judge upon a substantial conflict of testimony is conclusive in an appellate court. Every allegation contained in the complaint and in the affidavits presented in support of the application for a temporary injunction, tending to show any unlawful or unauthorized interference with the rights of plaintiff or any of its members by the defendants, or any one acting in collusion with them or under their direction, prior to the commencement of the action, was specifically and in detail denied by the affidavits presented for defendants. Some affidavits were presented on behalf of plaintiff, tending to show that subsequent to the commencement of the action, and while the order to show cause why an injunction should not issue was pending, certain police officers on several occasions entered plaintiff's premises, using such force as was necessary to effect an entry, and on one of these occasions arrested all the persons found thereon. These entries were admitted, and were attempted to be justified, in some cases by the fact that the officers had a search warrant authorizing them to enter and search for implements intended to be used in the commission of crime, and in another case by the fact that they had information warranting the conclusion that crime was actually being committed thereon. There is no pretense that anything done by the officers in relation to these premises was not done in good faith, under the belief that gambling games prohibited by section 330 of the Penal Code were being conducted thereon, and for the purpose of stopping such games and arresting the violators of the law. We are not called upon here to consider the question of the sufficiency of the facts alleged in justification of those entries. The evidence before the trial court was amply sufficient to support a conclusion that the plaintiff's so-called club was maintained solely for the purpose of conducting certain gambling games prohibited by section 330, Penal Code; that such games were being constantly carried on therein, in violation of such statute; and that the only object of the injunction sought was to prevent interference with such illegal practices by the proper authorities. Doubtless this was the conclusion of the learned trial judge, and the reason for his denial of a temporary injunction. In any event, in support of the action of the trial court we must so assume.

[3] This brings the case within the doctrine stated in a concurring opinion, in Pon v. Wiltman, 147 Cal. 280, 298, 81 Pac. 984, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683, expressly agreed to by six members of this court. Assuming the facts to be as stated above, the plaintiff, to use the language of such opinion, "is in reality simply asking a court of equity to prevent the suppression of places maintained in violation of law." As stated in such opinion, "it needs no citation of authorities to substantiate the elementary proposition that equity will not stretch forth a helping hand for the purpose of aiding one in committing a crime." If the learned judge of the trial court was satisfied by the evidence that the facts were as above stated, as we must here assume to have been the case, it was his duty to deny the application for a temporary injunction.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Colby against the Title Insurance & Trust Company, David C. Lercari, Louis Lercari, and John J. Pera, copartners under the firm name of Lercari, Pera & Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Mott & Dillon and Lent & Humphrey, for appellant. Otto Irving Wise, Louis Hirsch, and Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant corporation from proceeding to sell a certain lot of land in the city of Los Angeles, to quiet the title of plaintiff thereto, and to have canceled certain written instruments executed by plaintiff to the defendant corporation, and between her and the copartnership of Lercari, Pera & Co. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants, from which and an order denying her motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

Various grounds are urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment and order, but the main point insisted on is that the decision is against law in this: That the court failed to find on material issues raised by the pleadings.

Before proceeding to set forth particularly the facts alleged in the pleadings, and the findings made, it may be stated, towards a clearer understanding of the issues, that for several years prior to November 19, 1904, Fannie M. Colby, a daughter of plaintiff, was the bookkeeper of the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co., doing business in the city and county of San Francisco; that shortly prior to the above date the firm, claiming that Miss Colby had embezzled a large, but not then definitely ascertained, amount of money from it, consulted the Morse Detective Agency of San Francisco in the matter. On the evening of November 18, 1904, accompanied by a detective connected with the Morse agency, and a member of the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co., Miss Colby left San Francisco for Los Angeles, where the plaintiff, her mother, resided, and where the written instruments, the validity of which are questioned in this action, were executed on November 19, 1904. These consisted of an agreement, a deed, and a trust declaration. The agreement, which was signed by Fannie M. Colby, and by the plaintiff, her mother, and the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co., contained an admission and an acknowledgment by Fannie M. Colby of an indebtedness to the firm in an unascertained and undetermined amount, and an agreement on the part of plaintiff to pay the same to the firm as soon as the indebtedness was fixed and determined. The agreement also provided that the most practicable means should forthwith be adopted to ascertain as nearly as practicable the amount of the indebtedness, and that the conclusion of an expert, or experts, employed for that purpose, should be conclusive evidence of the correctness of the amount, and that within 30 days after the indebtedness was so determined the plaintiff agreed to pay the amount thereof to Lercari, Pera & Co., together with the expense of ascertaining it. The agreement further provided that, as security for performance of its terms and the provisions of a declaration of trust accompanying the same, the plaintiff should convey to the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, lot 2, block B. of the Morris Vineyard tract, in the city of Los Angeles, the property which is involved in this action. Pursuant to the terms of the agreement, the deed called for was immediately executed by plaintiff to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and following the execution thereof a declaration of trust was executed by plaintiff to the same company for the benefit of the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co. This trust declaration recited the execution of the agreement above referred to and the conveyance to the Title Insurance & Trust Company of the lot above described to secure the payment to Lercari, Pera & Co. of the indebtedness, when ascertained, together with the expenses of ascertaining it, and contained provisions for the sale of the premises by the trust company on demand of the firm if default was made in such payment, and the application of the proceeds to extinguish the indebtedness. These are the instruments, under the terms of which the defendant Title Insurance & Trust company was proceeding to sell the premises described in the deed from plaintiff to defendant when this action was brought by her to have the sale enjoined and these instruments all declared null and void, on the ground that each of them was obtained from plaintiff upon an illegal consideration, and also by means of duress, menace, and undue influence.

In this latter regard, it is particularly alleged in the complaint, after setting forth in extenso all the said written instruments and admitting their execution by her on November 19, 1904, that on said date and long prior thereto and since plaintiff and her family, consisting of three children, other than Fannie M. Colby, resided on said premises described in said written instruments; that plaintiff is a widow, over the age of 52 years, and in very poor health, and said premises were used and maintained as a home for the family, her only income being derived from the rental of rooms in the house on said premises; that long prior to November 19, 1904, said Fannie M. Colby was employed as a bookkeeper by defendant Lercari, Pera & Co.; that on said last-stated date plaintiff read in the daily papers published in the city of Los Angeles that said Lercari, Pera & Co. charged said Fannie M. Colby with the commission of a felony, to wit, the embezzlement of funds of said partnership, and had said Fannie M. Colby in custody and intended sending her to jail; that plaintiff was greatly prostrated and unnerved by said news, and during said day and ever since has suffered extreme mental anguish, and on said day and still is unable to concentrate her thoughts on business matters, and on said day was possessed by a fear that her said daughter would be committed to prison, and of a desire to save her daughter therefrom and herself and family from the disgrace and shame of such imprisonment; that while in this condition a representative of said Lercari, Pera & Co. called on plaintiff and informed her that he was a detective, and had said Fannie M. Colby in charge in the city of Los Angeles, but that she would not be permitted to go to the home of plaintiff, except when accompanied by a detective; that shortly thereafter the defendant David Lercari, representing the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co. and its members, together with an attorney at law, called on plaintiff and informed her that her daughter was in the custody of a detective, and guilty of embezzling the funds of her former employer, and would be sent to jail, unless plaintiff agreed to pay all money alleged to be embezzled by the said daughter, and, to secure such agreement, execute the deed heretofore referred to; that plaintiff protested against executing said instruments, and requested that her daughter be released from custody and arrest, but was told that if she consented to make such agreement and deed, when she signed and delivered such papers, her daughter would be released from custody, and she would be permitted to take her said daughter home; otherwise her said daughter would be arrested and prosecuted for a felony (embezzlement); that plaintiff asked that the execution of said papers be delayed until the following morning, and that her daughter be permitted in the meantime to return home, but this was denied; that during all of said time and thereafter, until the signing and delivering of said agreements and deed, her daughter was deprived of her liberty and incarcerated in a room in a building in said city of Los Angeles, and guarded by a detective in the employ of said defendants.

It is then further alleged that the fears entertained by her for the safety of her daughter and the charges made humiliated and prostrated plaintiff, and under the belief that her daughter would be prosecuted and sent to jail, if plaintiff refused to consent, she assented to the terms and conditions imposed upon her by said defendants; that thereupon said defendant allowed plaintiff to go to the place where her daughter was incarcerated, and permitted her and her daughter to converse for a brief time, but refused to allow said daughter to return home until said papers were signed; that thereupon, about 11 o'clock in the night, said defendants and their attorney returned to the home of plaintiff and induced her to sign said papers, which she did only under the terms, condition, and promises and for the purposes hereinabove set forth; that the said agreements and deed were thereupon taken from plaintiff, and her daughter released from the custody of said detective and permitted to remain at the home of plaintiff; that at no point of said transactions and at no time during said day or night did plaintiff have any counsel or advice. Then follow allegations of service of written notice on plaintiff, March 14, 1905, by the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company, of the ascertainment by an expert that the indebtedness of Fannie M. Colby to the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co. was the sum of $9,886.69 and the expenses of ascertaining it $769, accompanied by a further notice that said Title Insurance & Trust Company would proceed to sell the premises described in the deed from plaintiff to defendant, unless payment of these amounts was made within 30 days. These allegations are accompanied by an averment on the part of plaintiff that no conclusion was in fact reached by such expert, but that the said indebtedness was wholly undetermined, and that said Fannie M. Colby is not indebted to said firm of Lercari, Pera & Co. in the sum claimed to have been ascertained, or in any sum at all. Under these facts alleged, and the further allegation that the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company had given public notice that it would sell the premises described in the deed to it, and unless restrained would proceed to do so, plaintiff prayed that said agreements and deed be decreed null and void, for a temporary injunction restraining the sale of the property described in the deed to be made permanent by the final judgment, and that the title of plaintiff to said property be quieted.

The answer of defendants denied that said instruments were executed for the considerations set forth in the complaint, or that they were executed otherwise than voluntarily, and in consideration of the indebtedness of said Fannie M. Colby to the firm of Lercari, Pera & Co. In addition, defendants affirmatively plead facts under which they asserted estoppel and laches against plaintiff. Briefly stated, estoppel was predicated on the following alleged facts: That plaintiff voluntarily proposed and offered to pay to Lercari, Pera & Co. the indebtedness of Fannie M. Colby, when ascertained as provided in the instruments executed by her; that Fannie M. Colby admitted prior to, and when said instruments were executed, that she was indebted to Lercari, Pera & Co. in a sum stated by her to be between $2,500 and $5,000, but claimed by Lercari, Pera & Co. to be from $7,000 to $10,000; that plaintiff also admitted said indebtedness; that at said time, as defendants and believe, Fannie M. Colby was the owner of and possessed of certain property of the value of about $2,000; that by reason of the execution by plaintiff of said agreement defendant Lercari, Pera & Co. refrained at said time and has since refrained from searching for or attempting in any way to attach said property or to collect the amount of said indebtedness from said Fannie M. Colby, except pursuant to the terms of the agreement executed by plaintiff; that at no time has plaintiff in any way repudiated the admission of indebtedness contained in the written instruments or the oral admissions thereof made by Fannie M. Colby at the time of their execution, except until and by the filing of this action, and that said Lercari, Pera & Co. are without any other security for the recovery of said indebtedness. Laches is predicated on the same allegation. This action was commenced about July 6, 1905.

It is to be observed that under the facts alleged in her complaint plaintiff based her right to have all these instruments declared void upon several independent grounds. There were allegations that the execution of said instruments were based upon an illegal consideration, namely, the compounding of a felony charge against her daughter, which, if sustained by evidence, made the agreement absolutely void under the general rule applying to such contracts, and under section 1668 of the Civil Code. Aside from this, and independent of the allegations of illegal consideration for the execution of said instruments, there were allegations that their execution was obtained through duress and menace exercised on plaintiff through the unlawful confinement of her daughter by defendants, and threats to so unlawfully confine her until said instruments were executed (Civ. Code, §§ 1569, 1570), and by undue influence in taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of her distress (Civ. Code, § 1568) in procuring their execution. Issue was joined by defendants on all these allegations, and evidence addressed to all of them on the trial. The court, however, made no findings whatever upon the issue of illegality of consideration for the agreements and the deed, or on the other issues of their procurement through duress, menace, or undue influence, but made findings in favor of defendants on their plea of estoppel and laches and in the terms pleaded by them, and upon these findings based its judgment in favor of defendants and denying plaintiff any relief.

[1] On the appeal from the judgment, appellant insists that the findings do not support the judgment on account of the failure of the court to find on these issues, and, as the omission to find thereon was also urged as one of the grounds for a new trial in her motion therefor, it is likewise up for consideration here on the appeal from the order denying said motion. Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 Pac. 828; Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 100 Pac. 236.

[2] Respondents while conceding that, as a general rule, no judgment can be properly rendered, unless there are findings upon all material issues presented, take the position that the court having found in their favor on their plea of estoppel and laches it was not necessary to find on the other issues; that the findings so made necessarily defeated the right of plaintiff to recover, even if all the issues upon which the court omitted to find had been found in her favor. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 328, 27 Pac. 186; Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 622, 28 Pac. 557; Smith v. Dubost, 148 Cal. 624, 84 Pac. 38. The theory of respondents, as we understand it, is that, whether the execution by plaintiff of the agreements and deed was procured through an illegal consideration, and therefore void, or whether procured through duress, menace, or undue influence and voidable on that account at her election, it was unnecessary to find on any of these issues, because, even if they were all found in her favor, she would be precluded from obtaining any relief thereunder by reason of the findings of estoppel and laches.

In the same connection it is claimed that, as far as the issue as to the illegality of the consideration for the execution of the agreements and deed is concerned, it was immaterial to find on it, because respondents assert that it appears from the complaint that, as the consideration for the execution of the instruments was the compounding of a felony, and therefore an illegal consideration, all the parties, including plaintiff, were in pari delicto, and under such circumstances equity will not permit its aid to be invoked by any of the parties to such an illegal transaction, either to enforce it, if it remains executory, or to set it aside or to restore the title which has been parted with under it. We do not deem it necessary to discuss what would be the effect of the findings of the court as to estoppel and laches in favor of defendants, if the issues in the case were simply as to the procurement of the agreements and deed by duress, menace, or undue influence, and the court omitted to make findings on these issues, for certainly as to the issue of illegality of consideration such findings of estoppel and laches could not obviate the necessity of the court finding on that issue.

[3,4] It is true that, as a general rule, equity will not aid one party or another to an illegal transaction where they stand in pari delicto, but will leave them just where it finds them, to settle these questions without the aid of the court. This rule is universally recognized, and a few of the many authorities announcing it are Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) pp. 659, 667, 1703; Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 363, 100 Am. Dec. 124; Ager v. Duncan, 50 Cal. 325; Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 62 Pac. 395; Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91, 45 Pac. 1015, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63, cited by respondent. But this rule only applies where the parties are in pari delicto; where the illegal transaction is entered into voluntarily, and the turpitude of the parties is mutual. Where, in the cases cited, the rule has been applied, it will be found that both parties entered into the illegal contract or transaction there under consideration voluntarily, were equally culpable, and relief was refused on that account. Where, however, the party seeking the relief is not a free moral agent, and his consent to the illegal transaction is obtained through duress, menace, or undue influence, he is not regarded as in pari delicto with the person obtaining his consent by the employment of such means, and will not be precluded from invoking affirmative relief in equity to set aside contracts or instruments so executed, or to defeat an attempted enforcement of them against him. This qualification to the general rule is as universally recognized as the general rule itself.

In Woodham v. Allen, 130 Cal. 194, 62 Pac. 398, plaintiff sued defendant to recover an amount paid him on secured notes and the value of merchandise; the complaint alleging that the money and merchandise had been extorted from her by defendant through fear of threats of a criminal prosecution against her husband. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint. In reversing the judgment, it was said: "It is true, as a general rule, that, 'where an illegal contract has been fully executed on both sides, the law will aid neither party to recover anything parted with thereunder,' but this rule is subject to the qualification, among others, that the parties to the illegal contract are in pari delicto; and it will be seen, upon examination of the cases cited to support this rule, that they all proceed upon the theory that the parties to the contracts were equally in fault and each had freely joined in the transaction without being induced thereto by the oppression or fraud of the other. We think, therefore, that neither the general rule referred to nor the authorities cited in support thereof govern the case made by the complaint herein."

In 6 American and English Encyclopedia of Law, page 416, after laying down the general rule, it is said: "But when the parties do not stand in pari delicto, and it appears that the contract or deed was obtained by duress, equity will not refuse its aid. Thus, when the inequality in the situation of the parties is such that it is apparent the act was not voluntary, as where one of the parties exacts a security which the other is driven to give in order to save one dear to him from exposure, disgrace, and ruin, equity will set aside the contract or deed so obtained."

In 6 Cyc. page 317, it is said: "Although both parties are chargeable with knowledge that their agreement is contrary to some rule of law, yet, if one of them acts under duress, or what the law regards as undue influence on the part of the other, they do not stand on an equal footing, and the weaker one may be granted affirmative relief."

In Bryant v. Peck, etc., Co., 154 Mass. 461, 28 N. E. 678, the plaintiff sued the defendant company to cancel a note and compel a retransfer of stock. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appealed. In reversing the judgment and directing the overruling of the demurrer, the opinion proceeds: "According to the allegations of the bill, the plaintiff became a party to the note from which he prays to be relieved and transferred his stock in consideration that the defendant would not prosecute his son for perjury, and under a threat from it that otherwise his son would be prosecuted. The transaction was illegal (Pub. St. c. 205, § 27; Gorham v. Keyes, 137 Mass. 583), and if the parties stood on an equal footing neither of them would have a remedy against the other. Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 363 [100 Am. Dec. 124]. But it is well recognized that, although both parties are chargeable with knowledge that their agreement is contrary to some rule of law, yet, if one of them acts under duress, or what the law regards as undue influence on the part of the others, they do not stand on an equal footing, and the weaker one may be granted affirmative relief. Worcester v. Eaton, 11 Mass. 368, 376; Belding v. Smythe, 133 Mass. 530, 533. It is settled that such threats as are alleged to have been addressed to the plaintiff constitute duress. Harris v. Carmody, 131 Mass. 51 [41 Am. Rep. 188]. See Rau v. Von Zedlitz, 132 Mass. 164. And accordingly it has been decided in other jurisdictions, in cases like the present, that the plaintiff was entitled to relief in equity. Foley v. Greene, 14 R. I. 618 [51 Am. Rep. 419]; Schoener v. Lissauer, 107 N. Y. 111, 13 N. E. 741; Williams v. Bayley, L. R. 1 H. L. 200; Davies v. Insurance Co., 8 Ch. Div. 469, 477. See Sharon v. Gager, 46 Conn. 189; Rau v. Von Zedlitz, 132 Mass. 164, 167-169."

In Bell v. Campbell, 123 Mo. 1,¹ the son-in-law of plaintiff, Mrs. Bell, was threatened with prosecution for defalcation of public funds. Upon importunities by the sureties on his bond and to save him from prosecution, plaintiff executed notes and a deed of trust of a farm to the sureties. On failure of plaintiff to pay the notes, the farm was advertised and sold under the deed of trust. Pending the proceedings for the sale of the farm and before sale thereof, plaintiff brought an action to cancel the notes and deed of trust. The trial court dismissed her petition and entered judgment against her. On appeal the Supreme Court reversed the decree and remanded the case, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree in favor of the plaintiff, canceling the notes and deed of trust. In its opinion the court said: "The circumstances of this case clearly bring it within the operation of the principle that condemns and avoids a contract entered into where the obligor is not a free agent; where he stands in vinculis; where he is not equal to the task of protecting himself; where the circumstances which surround him at the time are of such extreme necessity or of distress that his will is overcome, his free agency destroyed by some oppression or fraudulent advantage or imposition incident to the transaction. In such case a court of equity will protect him by setting aside the contract thus made. * * *

It is urged that if the deed of trust and notes executed by plaintiff had been given through fear of Carter's criminal prosecution, and in order to prevent the same, that then she stands in pari delicto with the other parties to the transaction, and therefore could have no relief against the enforcement of these writings obligatory. There are two answers to this contention: (1) Granting that plaintiff did enter into the contract with that purpose in view, she will not be debarred from pursuing her remedy, because she cannot in any event be regarded as equally culpable with the adversary parties. When this is the case, a court of equity will interfere and go to the relief of the less guilty party, whose transgression has been brought about by the imposition, undue influence, etc., of the party on whom the burden of the original blameworthiness principally rests. 2 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 942; 1 Story's Ex. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 300; Pinckston v. Brown [56 N. C. 494]; Kitchen v. Greenbaum, 61 Mo. 115."

Authorities might be multiplied, but we cite only the following as similar in their facts to the allegations in the complaint of plaintiff, and which hold that a party from whom the execution of an illegal contract has been obtained through oppression or undue influence, exercised on him in its procurement, does not stand in pari delicto with the other party to the illegal transaction, and may be granted affirmative relief, or may defeat any attempt to enforce the contract, as the case may be: Foley v. Green, 14 R. I. 618, 51 Am. Rep. 419; Meech v. Lee, 82 Mich. 274, 46 N. W. 383; Gray v. Freeman, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 556, 84 S. W. 1105. Numerous other cases supporting the exception to the general rule will be found cited in 6 American and English Encyclopedia of Law, and 6 Cyc., in support of the text from those works which we have above quoted.

[5, 6] In the complaint at bar, although it is alleged that the consideration for the execution of these instruments in question was an illegal one—the compounding of a felony—still it is further alleged that such execution for that purpose was procured through the duress, menace, and undue influence of the defendants Lercari, Pera & Co. The allegations set forth a good cause of action to have the instrument set aside for illegality of consideration under the qualification to the general rule above referred to, and entitled plaintiff to relief, if established by evidence. Issue was joined on this cause of action, and it was the duty of the court to have made a finding upon it, and a failure to do so necessitates a reversal of both the judgment and order denying a new trial, unless, as claimed by respondents, the findings which the court did make on their plea of estoppel and laches rendered it unnecessary to find on the issue of illegality of consideration.

[7] But the doctrine of estoppel by conduct or by laches, or even ratification, has no application to a contract or instrument which is void because it violates an express mandate of the law or the dictates of public policy. Such a contract has no existence whatever. It has no legal entity for any purpose, and neither action nor inaction of a party to it can validate it; and no conduct of a party to it can be invoked as an estoppel against asserting its invalidity. The authorities are uniformly agreed on this principle, and the following cases, out of a number, are selected on this point, because they involve contracts which, like the instruments alleged by plaintiff to have been executed for an illegal consideration, were declared void as against public policy, and where it was held that the plea of estoppel as against such contracts could not be asserted. Brown v. First Nat. Bank, 137 Ind. 655, 37 N. E. 158, 24 L. R. A. 206; Langan v. Sankey, 55 Iowa, 52, 7 N. W. 393; Wheeler v. Wheeler, 5 Lans. (N. Y.) 355; Robinson v. Patterson, 71 Mich. 141, 39 N. W. 21; Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328; Stanard v. Sampson, 23 Okl. 13, 99 Pac. 796; McCormick Harvester Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 54 Neb. 644, 74 N. W. 1061; Henry v. State Bank of Laurens, etc., 131 Iowa, 97, 107 N. W. 1034. To quote from a few of these cases: In Brown v. First National Bank, supra, it is said: "The contention of counsel that the appellee, having received the benefit of the contract, is estopped to defend against it on the principle that a corporation which has such benefit is estopped to assert that it had no power to contract is unsound, as applied to the case at bar. The rule suggested applies to cases where private rights alone are concerned; while in contracts void as against public policy the public is interested. The public concern cannot be made a matter of private bargain. A number of maxims apply to interdict the enforcement of such a contract, and many decisions hold that the receipt of benefits and retention of property under such a contract give no right of recovery. * * * It cannot be rendered valid by invoking the doctrine of estoppel." In Langan v. Sankey, supra: "But it is insisted such a contract may be relied on as an estoppel, and a recovery, therefore, had. We do not believe that this is correct, and are unwilling to hold that a contract void as being against public policy has any vitality whatever. It matters not how it may be pleaded, a substantial right cannot be enforced thereunder. That which cannot be recovered in an action on the contract cannot be done by indirection." In Wheeler v. Wheeler, supra: "The defendant's counsel contends that, even if the agreement was void as against public policy, still it was competent for the parties to ratify it after the sale and purchase; and that the plaintiff, having received from the defendant his share of the purchase price, or a portion thereof, is estopped from alleging the illegality of the agreement until he refunds or offers to refund the money received. But the principle of estoppel does not apply to an agreement which the law holds to be void as against public policy. The ratification of such a contract is as nugatory as the contract itself." In Stanard v. Sampson, supra: "It is settled by the overwhelming weight of authority that where a contract is illegal, on account of involving the commission of a crime, such contract cannot thereafter be ratified."

It is clear, therefore, under the authorities that the necessity for a finding upon the issue of illegality of consideration was not rendered unnecessary or immaterial by the finding of estoppel and laches which the court did make, as the principle of estoppel has no application to agreements which are void as contravening public policy. The dominant issue under the pleadings in this case was whether the instruments were executed for an illegal consideration. If it was found that they were, plaintiff would have been entitled absolutely to a decree awarding her the full relief prayed for. Other independent issues as to duress, menace, or undue influence, and the affirmative plea of estoppel, and laches interposed by defendants, could only become important if this issue was found against her. As there was no finding at all on it, no judgment in the case could be properly rendered.

In addition to the points we have been considering, appellant attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings made and their sufficiency as findings to support the judgment. But, as the judgment and order denying a new trial must both be reversed, we do not deem it necessary to discuss these points, as such questions will only become of real moment when the trial court has made findings upon all the material issues in the case.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J; MELVIN, J.

PEARSON v. MCKINNEY. (L. A. 2,704.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 6, 1911.)

1. SALES (§ 172*)—PERFORMANCE BY SELLER—IMPOSSIBILITY.

Where one agrees unconditionally to sell goods deliverable at a fixed time or on demand, that the seller expected to manufacture or procure them from a certain source, and has been unable to do so, does not excuse his failure to deliver; but he must buy them in the market for delivery, if necessary. Where the agreement is to sell a specified article when it attains a certain size or age, or it is to be prepared in the manner prescribed by the buyer, the sale and delivery is dependent upon the happening of the precedent conditions, such as the articles becoming of the size or age specified, etc.; and upon their failure to do so the seller is excused from performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 425-430; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

2. SALES (§ 273*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—IMPLIED WARRANTIES.

A contract made by plaintiff for the purchase of orange trees provided that if ail or a part of the seed-bed stock sold by plaintiff to defendant was killed by frost defendant should be relieved from his obligation to furnish trees to plaintiff in the proportion which the total number of trees sold to defendant bore to the trees killed by frost; and further provided that defendant should sell to plaintiff 25,000 budded trees of standard size, and plaintiff should have the option of purchasing them at one year or two years old from the bud, at certain fixed prices; and further provided as to the size of standard trees of the ages named, the trees to be delivered between 1909 and 1911, plaintiff to notify defendant before the trees were budded as to the variety required. Held, that the contract was conditioned upon the trees reaching the age, size, etc., stipulated, so that there was no implied warranty by defendant that they should be one year old from the bud and of standard size at any particular time during the year 1909; the provision of the Civil Code relating to warranties implied from a sale of merchandise or manufactured articles not applying.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 772-776; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

3. SALES (§ 81*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE—TIME.

The contract of sale did not fix a time for the completion of the budding of the trees sold, so that the seller would have a reasonable time for budding them, pursuant to Civ. Code, § 1657, providing that a reasonable time shall be allowed, where no time is specified for performing an act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-223; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

4. SALES (§ 81*)—TIME OF DELIVERY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

The provision giving plaintiff the option to take the trees at one year old or two years old from the bud, of a standard size, did not entitle him to demand them at that exact age, but defendant could make delivery within a reasonable time after demand, so that if the number of trees demanded had not grown to the standard size when demand was made, without defendant's fault, plaintiff would have to wait until they attained that size, though the trees were more than one or two years old from the bud when delivered; and, subject to such rule, the buyer could make successive demands for reasonable quantities less than the whole 25,000.

5. SALES (§ 411*)—ALLEGATIONS OF BREACHES.

In an action for the seller's breach of a contract of sale, the complaint must allege all of the breaches relied upon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1161-1164; Dec. Dig. § 411.*]

6. SALES (§ 71*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—"VARIETY."

Though a contract for the sale of orange trees provided that the buyer should give the seller notice one month before the trees were budded as to the "variety" which he would select in purchasing, the buyer could choose a reasonable number of the varieties of those trees which could be obtained by the seller with a reasonable effort; the singular including the plural.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

7. SALES (§ 81*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Where defendant agreed to deliver to plaintiff a certain number of orange trees at one or two years old from the bud, of standard size, as all of the trees could not reasonably be expected to become one year old from the bud, of standard size, on a particular day, but would ordinarily become so in smaller lots in uncertain intervals, plaintiff had the right to make successive demands for performance, or require delivery by piecemeal, and defendant to make successive offers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 217–223; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

8. SALES (§ 152*)—PERFORMANCE—DEMAND—PAYMENT.

While, if the contract of sale does not provide to the contrary, and the sale is for an agreed price, payment and delivery are concurrent, if the goods are not present for immediate delivery to the buyer when he demands delivery, he may accompany the demand with an offer to pay when actual delivery is made, without making payment when demand is made.

9. SALES (§ 152*)—PAYMENT—OFFER—NECESSITY.

Civ. Code, § 1440, provides that if a party to an obligation gives notice that he will not perform, such other may enforce the obligation without previously performing or offering to perform any conditions upon his part. Section 1511, subd. 1, provides that the want of an offer to perform is excused, where such offer is prevented by the act of the creditor or operation of law; and section 1515 provides that refusal by a creditor to accept performance, made before offer thereof, is equivalent to an offer and refusal. The buyer of orange trees demanded delivery at the seller's office, stating that he was ready to pay for the trees upon delivery, but the seller refused delivery. The buyer then went to the nursery to get the trees, being prepared to pay for them on delivery, but was again refused delivery. Held, that the buyer was not required to actually produce the money, either at the office or at the nursery, in order to make his demand for delivery effectual.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 357; Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

10. SALES (§ 81*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—DELIVERY—NOTICE AND DEMAND.

Where a contract for the sale of nursery trees required the buyer's notice of the selection of the varieties to be budded for delivery to be given to the seller one month before the trees were budded, the budding, pursuant to notice, need not be commenced during the month following the service of such notice, so that, where there were at least 150,000 trees to be budded, and the seller had the right to begin budding as soon as they were large enough, he could not be required to deliver trees of the April budding where notice as to the varieties the buyer desired was only given on March 31st; an earlier notice of selection being necessary, if he desired trees budded in April.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by George M. Pearson against J. G. McKinney, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of E. E. Hendrick deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sidney J. Parsons and Purrington & Adair, for appellant. Miguel Estudillo and Geo. A. French, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeals by defendant from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The plaintiff sued to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the refusal of the decedent, E. E. Hendrick, to deliver to plaintiff certain orange and lemon trees bought by plaintiff of decedent. The action was begun in Hendrick's lifetime. He died before the trial, and the present defendant as administrator, etc., was substituted as the party defendant in his stead. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for $28,453.40.

The agreement of sale was in writing, and is made a part of the complaint. It was executed on November 12, 1906, and embraced two contracts of sale. The first was a sale by Pearson to Hendrick of a number of "seed-bed orange plants" on the Charlton Ranch, estimated at 150,000, at $20 per thousand, to be delivered by the 15th of May, 1907. This contract was fulfilled and is of no importance, except as it may explain the meaning of the other contract of sale. The second was a contract of sale from Hendrick to Pearson of "25,000 budded trees of standard size" at prices fixed according to age. Delivery was to be made during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911.

The court below found that Pearson demanded delivery of orange and lemon trees under the contract, and as alleged in the complaint, as follows: Of orange trees, 5,000 on April 30, 1909; 5,406 on May 25, 1909; 5,000 on May 31, 1909; and 6,326 on June 30, 1909; of lemon trees, 2,000 on May 31, 1909, and 500 on June 30, 1909; and that none was ever delivered. The action was begun on July 1, 1909, the day following the last demand. The market price at the time of the demands was $1.50 each for orange trees and $1.25 each for lemon trees. The agreed price being 30 cents each, the court estimated the damage as $1.20 for each orange tree and 95 cents for each lemon tree, making a total of $28,453.40 for the 21,732 orange trees and 2,500 lemon trees demanded. For this sum the judgment was given. The main question for determination is whether or not, under the terms of the contract and the facts of the case, Hendrick was justified in refusing to deliver the trees when demanded.

The contract for the sale of the 25,000 budded trees is peculiar in some respects, and we think the court below did not correctly construe it. It is necessary to state its terms at some length. In quoting it we will, for the sake of brevity and for an easier grasp of its meaning, substitute the name "Pearson" for the words "party of the first part," and "Hendrick" for the words "party of the second part." The seed-bed orange plants sold by Pearson to Hendrick were to be delivered by Pearson in boxes by the 15th of May, 1907, and this was done. The material parts of the second contract are as follows: "It is also agreed that in case of all or a portion of the seed-bed stock sold by [Pearson] to [Hendrick] being killed by frost, [Hendrick] will be relieved from the obligation contained in this contract to furnish trees to [Pearson] in the proportion which the total amount of trees sold to [Hendrick] by [Pearson] bears to the amount of trees killed by frost. * * * It is further agreed, in consideration of the premises and of the covenants hereinafter contained, that [Hendrick] will sell to [Pearson] and [Pearson] will buy 25,000 budded trees of standard size, and [Pearson] shall have the option of purchasing said trees at one-year old or two-year old from the bud. If taken at the age of one year from the bud [Pearson] agrees to pay thirty cents per tree; if taken at the age of two years old from the bud, thirty-five cents per tree, and if taken at the age of three years old from the bud forty cents per tree. It is stipulated that a standard tree one year old from the bud shall be five-eighths of an inch in diameter two inches above the bud, and that a standard tree two years old from the bud shall be three-fourths of an inch in diameter two inches above the bud. The delivery of said trees shall be between 1909 and 1911 inclusive. It is hereby agreed that [Pearson] shall give notice to [Hendrick] one month before the trees are budded as to the variety which [Pearson] will select in purchasing the trees as per this contract and the option hereinafter set forth." A paragraph followed, stating the option last mentioned, which gave Pearson the privilege of purchasing 25,000 additional standard trees upon the same terms. No trees covered by this option are in controversy here, and it has no bearing on the case.

The complaint sets forth the contract in full, alleges the several demands for trees one year old from the bud, and the several refusals to deliver the same, states the amount of damages caused thereby, and demands judgment. It does not aver that at the time of each or any demand Hendrick had on hand trees of standard size, or trees one year old from the bud, in numbers sufficient to comply with such demands. The evidence shows that at the time of these demands and up to the time the action was begun only about 5,000 trees had reached standard size. The complaint alleges, in general terms, that Pearson duly performed all the conditions of the agreement on his part, but it does not otherwise aver that he gave Hendrick any notice one month before the trees were budded, or at all, as to the variety of trees he would buy. There is no allegation that any such notice was given, or that any trees were budded in pursuance thereof, or at all. The findings, in response to the allegations in the answer, state that on March 31, 1908, Pearson notified Hendrick as to the varieties he would select in purchasing under the agreement, to wit, "20 per cent. Thompson Improved Navels, 25 per cent. Valencias, 45 per cent. Washington Navels and 10 per cent. Eureka Lemons."

[1] Where one makes an unqualified agreement to sell goods to be delivered at a fixed time, or on demand of the buyer within a stated period, and it is inherently possible to obtain the goods, the fact that the seller may have expected to manufacture the goods himself, or to procure them from a certain source, and has not been able to complete or obtain them when delivery is due, does not excuse performance. In that event, his contract being unconditional and unqualified, he must go into the market, if necessary, and obtain the goods, and he will be liable in damages for nondelivery. 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1103. The complaint herein was evidently drawn upon the theory that the agreement in question was of this character. It sets forth the contract in full; but aside from that it alleges in general terms that plaintiff fully performed his part of the contract, and avers the several demands above mentioned for trees one year old from the bud, and of standard size, except that of April 30th, which did not specify standard size, the refusals, the damages, and nothing more. These facts alone would make the defendant liable in damages only upon the theory that the agreement was a general undertaking by Hendrick to sell and deliver 25,000 trees one year old from the bud and of standard size, to be obtained by him at his peril. Where the contract is not a general undertaking to sell the goods, which the seller is to have ready at all events when delivery is due, but is a contract to sell a specified article when it grows to a specified size or age, or a certain number to be selected out of a particular larger lot or to be produced from a specified source, or to be prepared in a manner to be afterwards prescribed by the buyer, a different rule prevails. The sale and delivery are then made to depend upon the happening of the precedent conditions. Until they have occurred, there is no obligation upon the seller to deliver, unless their nonoccurrence was occasioned by his fault. And if they do not occur, or their occurrence becomes impossible without his fault, he is excused from performance. Likewise, if the occurrence is delayed without his fault, the time of performance is postponed accordingly. A case in point is Howell v. Coupland, L. R. 9 Q. B. 462 (s. c. on appeal, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 258), where one party agreed to sell a crop of potatoes to be grown on a certain tract of land. The crop was so poor, from blight, that he did not raise enough to fill the contract, and he was excused thereby from full performance. Other illustrations of the general rule are found in Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 657; Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 Best & S. 833, 32 L. J. Q. B. 164; Stewart v. Stone, 127 N. Y. 500, 28 N. E. 595, 14 L. R. A. 215; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 415; McMillan v. Fox, 90 Wis. 173, 62 N. W. 1052. See, also, 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1100, 1101.

[2] This contract is of the latter kind. It is an agreement by Hendrick to sell 25,000 trees of standard size to be grown by him from small plants, either those furnished to him by Pearson or others of like kind and size, in a place of his selection. They were to be budded by him to certain varieties, to be afterwards selected by Pearson, of which selection Pearson was to give him notice one month before budding was to begin, and they were not to be delivered until the year 1909, nor until they were one year old from the bud, and had grown to standard size. It may be added that by the letter of the contract to sell the 25,000 trees it does not appear what kind of trees were to be budded by Hendrick and sold by him to Pearson, whether orange, lemon, apple, peach, pear, or indeed any kind of fruit trees. It is only by reference to the clause reducing proportionally the number of trees to be sold by Hendrick, if the orange plants sold to him by Pearson should be partly killed by frost, and practically annulling the sale by Hendrick, if all of the Pearson stock were killed, thus implying that the 25,000 trees were to be grown from the Pearson seed-bed orange plants, and by reference to the provision for a notice of selection of varieties by Pearson, and the written notice of selection, subsequently made by him, coupled with an assumption of judicial knowledge of the significance of the names of the varieties stated in the notice, which we are not sure we can claim, that we can infer, as both parties seem to have understood, that the 25,000 trees were to be citrus trees budded upon orange stock, and presumably upon the seed-bed stock furnished by Pearson, since no other seems to have been contemplated. Under these conditions there was no implied warranty by Hendrick that the trees should be one year old from the bud and of standard size at all times, or at any particular time, during the year 1909. There is clearly no express warranty to that effect. He was under no obligation to bud for Pearson until one month after Pearson gave him notice, and after such budding one year must have elapsed and the trees must have grown to standard size before there could be any obligation resting upon Hendrick to deliver them. There is no express warranty that the trees so budded should grow to standard size in one year thereafter, or at any specific date thereafter. And the law does not imply such warranty from the conditions of the contract or the facts alleged. The time required for the natural growth of a tree to a given size depends very much on natural conditions beyond human control. Temperature, soil, rainfall, force and constancy of winds, cultivation and fertilization, all affect it. A warranty of such uncertain events should not be implied, unless settled principles of law require it. It is not like the manufacture of an article, the completion of which one is presumed to warrant, if he agrees to sell and deliver it at a given time. The rules of the Civil Code relating to warranties to be implied from a sale of merchandise or manufactured articles do not apply. The only language that could be suggested as constituting such warranty is the provision that "a standard tree one year old from the bud shall be five-eighths of an inch in diameter, two inches above the bud." This is a mere description of the thing meant by the term "standard size," and it was obviously inserted solely to prevent dispute or the necessity of proof on the subject. It does not declare that when the trees are one year old from the bud they shall be of that size, or anything to that effect, as would be necessary to constitute such warranty, but, in effect, that upon or after reaching that age they must be of the size stated, before they can be considered of "standard" size.

[3, 4] The contract fixes no time for the completion of the process of budding the 25,000 trees in question. It required it to be begun at the expiration of 30 days from service of notice of selection; but no time of completion is stated. "Where no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed." Civ. Code, § 1657. It cannot reasonably be contended that it required the task of budding to be done in one day. Referring for the moment to the evidence in the particular case, it appears that only a little over one-fourth of these 150,000 trees were large enough to bud until after July 1, 1908. The suit was begun July 1, 1909. The evidence further shows by the uncontradicted testimony of experienced nursery men that but a small percentage of budded citrus trees will grow to standard size in one year after budding, even with proper care and treatment. No definite time of delivery is fixed, except as it is fixed by the option to Pearson to take them "at one year old or two year old from the bud," and the provision that delivery should be during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911. The option clause obviously does not mean at the precise age stated, but at some reasonable time during the second or third year after budding. As the time allowed for budding is a reasonable time, and it could not well be done all at once, and as the arrival at standard size must necessarily be irregular and uncertain, it follows that Hendrick was entitled to a reasonable time after demand in which to make delivery. If sufficient trees had then grown to standard size, delivery would be due immediately upon a proper demand. If not, and his fault had not caused the failure, both parties would have to await their growth to the size required to bring them within the contract.

From all these considerations, it follows that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. It should have alleged generally that Hendrick had trees of the size and age specified, subject to the contract, which he could have delivered. In the absence of this, and perhaps this would have been a better form of pleading, it should have stated the particular facts showing a legal obligation upon Hendrick to comply with the demands at the times they were made. In the latter form it should have shown the date of the giving of notice by Pearson of the selection of varieties, and that the varieties selected were the same as were demanded. In view of the fact that a reasonable time was allowed to complete the budding and the uncertainty that the trees budded in May and June, 1908, would attain standard size, in May or June, 1909, when the demands were made, in sufficient numbers to meet those demands, such growth would scarcely be presumed, and it should have been alleged. This defect in the complaint requires a reversal of the judgment.

[5] We have considered the rights of the parties under the contract, as we conceive them to be, upon the hypothesis that Hendrick had performed all the duties thereby imposed upon him, except the failure to deliver the trees. No other breach is alleged, and none other can be presumed. Upon the trial an attempt was made by the plaintiff to show that Hendrick had carelessly selected an unsuitable place in which to transplant, bud, and grow the trees to standard size, and that he had not properly watered or cultivated them, and that this neglect was the cause of their failure to grow to and be of standard size at the times of the demands. The contract implies an undertaking by Hendrick to use reasonable and ordinary care in these respects. It is only necessary to say upon this point that if the plaintiff relied upon a breach of this obligation the particular neglect and its effect should have been alleged. The findings are defective upon the point, and do not cure the defect in the complaint.

[7] It is contended by the defendant that the contract was an entire one for the sale of 25,000 trees in one lot, and that Pearson had no lawful right to make successive demands for performance or require delivery by piecemeal. The contract must receive a reasonable construction, and its subject-matter must be considered in its interpretation. We have seen that all of the trees could not be reasonably expected to become one year old from the bud, or of standard size, on a particular day, but that ordinarily they would become so in smaller lots at irregular and uncertain intervals. No objection seems to have been made at the time by Hendrick to successive demands of parts only of the entire lot. We think a reasonable construction of the agreement, and one most favorable to both parties, would allow demands by the buyer, or offers by the seller, of reasonable quantities, less than the whole, at reasonable intervals, subject to the rule before stated that, in the absence of negligence, reasonable time for delivery must be given, as the circumstances required.

[6] In view of the possibility of another trial upon amended pleadings, it is necessary to notice some other points presented by the record. Pearson, in the notice as to the variety he would select in buying, included four different varieties. It is claimed that the contract limited him to one. We think in this case the singular should be held to include the plural, and that it gave Pearson the right to choose a reasonable number of varieties that could be obtained by Hendrick with reasonable effort.

[8, 9] It is contended that Pearson's demands were insufficient and ineffectual, because no money was tendered in payment concurrently with the demand for delivery. It is true that upon a sale of goods for an agreed price, if the contract contains nothing to the contrary, payment and delivery are concurrent acts. Cole v. Swanston, 1 Cal. 51, 52 Am. Dec. 288. But actual payment need not accompany the demand for delivery, unless such delivery is to be made then and there. If the goods are not present to be then delivered to the buyer, the buyer may accompany his demand with an offer to pay when actual delivery is made to him. This the plaintiff did. His demand was made at the office of defendant in Riverside, and it was accompanied by the statement that he was ready to pay for the trees upon delivery. He was met with a refusal, and a statement that there were no trees on hand of standard size that were subject to the contract. The trees were then at the nursery 17 miles distant. Pearson thereupon went to the nursery to get the trees, prepared to pay for them on delivery, but he was again refused delivery, for the same reason as before. Under these circumstances he was not required to actually produce the money, either at the office or at the nursery, in order to make his demand effectual. Civ. Code, §§ 1440, 1511, subd. 1, 1515; Scribner v. Schenkel, 128 Cal. 253, 60 Pac. 860; Pierce v. Lukens, 144 Cal. 401, 77 Pac. 996.

[10] The notice by Pearson as to the varieties he would select in buying was given on March 31, 1908. About 23,000 trees were budded by Hendrick in the month of April, 1908, to some of the varieties selected by Pearson, and about 22,000 more were budded in May and June, 1908. These comprised all of the trees of the Pearson stock that were large enough for budding at that time. The plaintiff insists that 5,000 of the trees budded in April had reached standard size in May, 1909, and that they constituted a part of the trees which Hendrick agreed to sell by the contract, and that plaintiff was therefore entitled to delivery thereof upon the demand of May 31, 1909, or upon one of the previous demands. Hendrick refused to deliver them, claiming that they were not subject to the agreement of sale. The contract declares that Pearson's notice of the selection of varieties to be budded for delivery to him should be given to Hendrick "one month before the trees are budded." Consequently budding in pursuance of the notice and for delivery to Pearson need not have been commenced during the month following the service of the notice. This time was evidently allowed for the benefit of Hendrick, to enable him to procure buds of the varieties chosen and prepare for the work of budding. It would seem reasonable to conclude that Hendrick was not required to deliver trees of the April budding to Pearson. There were at least 150,000 trees to be budded. Hendrick had the right to begin budding them as soon as they were large enough. Pearson must be assumed to have knowledge of their age and size. If he wished to obtain trees upon his contract that were budded in April, 1908, he should have given an earlier notice of his selection. In the absence of neglect by Hendrick retarding the growth to budding size, and bad faith in immediately budding the trees in April, in order to avoid having trees to fill Pearson's orders in 1909, he would not be bound to deliver trees of the April budding to Pearson. No such neglect or bad faith is alleged.

The judgment and order are reversed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 867*)—INCURRING INDEBTEDNESS—NOTICE OF ELECTION—"FOR TWO SUCCEEDING WEEKS."

St. 1901, p. 28, authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by municipalities, provides by section 3 that the ordinance calling an election shall be published once a day for at least seven days in some newspaper published at least six days a week in such municipality, or once a week for two weeks in some newspaper published less than six days a week in such municipality, and that one insertion each week "for two succeeding weeks" shall be sufficient, and that in municipalities where no daily or weekly is published the ordinance shall be posted in three public places therein for two succeeding weeks; and in a municipality where there was no daily newspaper the ordinance was published for two succeeding weeks in a weekly newspaper, the first publication being only twelve days from the election. Held that, while the publication by posting "for two succeeding weeks" required a posting for two full weeks, where publication was by weekly newspaper and the second publication was completed several days before the election, it was sufficient.

In Bank. Application by the City of Lindsay and others for a writ of mandate against W. H. Mack, City Clerk. Writ issued.

H. T. Miller, for petitioners. Joseph C. Meyerstein, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this proceeding a peremptory writ of mandate, as requested by petitioner, was ordered issued from the bench. This opinion is filed to show the grounds of such action by this court. The proceeding was in mandate to compel the respondent, city clerk of the city of Lindsay, to sign and attest certain municipal bonds proposed to be issued under the act authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by cities, etc., found in Statutes of 1901 at page 27. The only question was whether notice of the election at which the bonds were voted was given for the time required by the provisions of said act.

The provisions of such act as to notice are as follows: "Such ordinance [the ordinance calling an election] shall be published once a day for at least seven days in some newspaper published at least six days a week in such municipality, or once a week for two weeks in some newspaper published less than six days a week in such municipality, and one insertion each week for two succeeding weeks shall be a sufficient publication in such newspaper published less than six days per week. In municipalities where no such newspaper is published, such ordinance shall be posted in three public places therein for two succeeding weeks. No other notice of such election need be given." Section 3. There being no paper in the municipality published more than once a week, the ordinance was published once a week for two successive weeks in a weekly newspaper published therein, viz., on June 14, 1911, and on June 21, 1911. The ordinance fixed June 26, 1911, as the day for the election, and the election was in fact had on the last-named day. This was less than two weeks from the first publication day, June 14, 1911, and the claim of respondent was that the statute required two full weeks' notice of the election.

The notice given was in full accord with the statute. It is nowhere required thereby that two weeks' notice of the election shall be given, except in the single case where, by reason of the fact that there is no newspaper published in the municipality, the notice is given by posting. As to such a case, the requirement that the ordinance shall be posted "for two succeeding weeks" necessarily means that the notice must be posted for two full weeks, and that the publication by posting is not complete until such two weeks have expired. As to cases where the notice is given by publication in a newspaper, the only requirement is, in one case, publication for "at least seven days" in a daily newspaper, and, in the other, publication "once a week for two weeks * * * and one insertion each week for two succeeding weeks shall be a sufficient publication," etc. In all three of the cases provided for by the statute, the election may be set for any day subsequent to the completion of the publication, and the only reason why two weeks must intervene between the time of posting and the day of election, where the publication is by posting, is that the notice in such case is not fully published until the expiration of such two weeks. In the case at bar the publication was completed by the second publication on June 21, 1911, several days before the day of election.

For the reasons stated, it was ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REFRESHING MEMORY.

Allowing a witness to refresh his recollection from a memorandum made several years after the event, without a sufficient showing under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, is harmless, his testimony merely that he was at a certain place on a day when plaintiff claimed to have there rendered medical services to defendant, and that he did not see plaintiff there, having at most only slight tendency to contradict plaintiff, who testified to leaving such place that day on the morning train.

Directing a jury to answer special issues not having been, at the time of the trial, one of the matters deemed excepted to under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 647, exception to the submission to them of special issues presenting questions of law was necessary.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Peter A. Kearney against Teresa Bell. From an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edmund Tausky, for appellant. T. Z. Blakeman, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The appeal was originally heard and determined in the District Court of Appeal for the First appellate district. That court, after first reversing the order appealed from granted a rehearing, and thereafter entered a judgment of affirmance, stating the grounds for its later action in an opinion, a copy of which is as follows:

"In this case a rehearing was granted, and upon further consideration we adopt that portion of the opinion reading as follows:

"This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

"The second amended complaint, upon which the action was tried, contains two counts, each upon an account stated for $25,500, of which $21,780 remained unpaid. In the first count it is charged that the account was stated on the 25th day of August, 1898, and in the second on the 23d day of January, 1899.

"In her answer defendant denied the material allegations of each of said counts, and also as a separate defense pleaded in substance that she had been induced to execute the instrument relied on as the account stated, of August 25, 1898, by false and fraudulent representations made to her by plaintiff.

"The action came on for trial before a jury, and at the beginning thereof plaintiff moved the court to first try and dispose of the issues presented by what he termed the equitable defense of fraud. The motion was denied.

"After the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant filed an amendment, in which she set up in substance that she had been induced to execute the writing of January 23, 1899, relied on as an account stated on that day, by false and fraudulent representations made to her by plaintiff. Whereupon plaintiff renewed his said motion, and the same was again denied, and the whole case was finally submitted to the jury for a general verdict and answers to special issues directed to the defense of fraud. Plaintiff urges that the court erred in said rulings. With this contention we cannot agree.

[1] "An account stated is a contract, and like any other contract may be avoided by showing that the assent of one party thereto was procured by the fraud of the one seeking to enforce the contract. Such a defense is a legal and complete defense. "Both courts of law and equity in proper cases have jurisdiction in cases of fraud, and when the acts constituting the fraud and the relief sought are such as are cognizable in a court of law, the parties are entitled to a jury trial. * * *" Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428 [12 Pac. 454]. The action upon an account stated is an action at law, and we know of no reason why the defense that the defendant's assent to the account stated was procured by fraud may not be passed upon by the jury, under the instructions of the court. This is what was done in this case, and there was no error in so doing. Defendant sought no affirmative relief. The fraud was pleaded simply as a defense to an action for a money judgment only.

"Defendant was and is the widow of Thomas Bell, deceased, and had been given a family allowance for the support of herself and the minor children of herself and decedent, by order of the court in which was pending the administration of the estate of said deceased. Plaintiff, as a physician, had rendered services to defendant and her children, covering a period from October, 1892, to some time in 1898. On August 25, 1898, plaintiff rendered to defendant a bill for his services as follows: "San Francisco, Cal., Aug. 25, 1898. Mrs. Teresa Bell (Guardian), to Peter A. Kearney, M. D., Dr. For professional services rendered Marie T. Bell, Robina Bell, Muriel Bell, Reginald Bell, Eustace Bell from October 17, 1892, to May 21, 1898, and Thomas F. Bell, from October 17, 1892 to May 10, 1896—$25,500, twenty-five thousand five hundred dollars." Defendant indorsed on the back thereof the following: "Messrs. Maxwell & Staacke, executors of the Bell estate. Pay this account and charge the same to the family allowance, Teresa Bell,"—and returned the same to plaintiff. This paper was marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 1." The bill not having been paid, on the 23d day of January, 1899, plaintiff presented to defendant another writing, and at his request she signed it and returned it to him. This writing is as follows: "On the 25th day of August, 1898, I gave Dr. Peter A. Kearney an order for the payment of $25,500 on the executors of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, due him for services rendered as physician to me and my children at my request, and said executors having refused to pay or honor said order, I hereby acknowledge said indebtedness as just and legal this 23d day of January, 1899. Teresa Bell." This paper was marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 2."

[2] "There can be no doubt but that this second paper, read in connection with the first paper, constituted an account stated, and, as the execution thereof was admitted by defendant, entitled plaintiff to a verdict, unless the evidence showed that the execution thereof by defendant was procured by the fraud of plaintiff. In this connection the court instructed the jury as follows: "The paper marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 2,' taken in connection with the paper marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 1,' constitute an account stated between plaintiff and defendant, unless you find that defendant's signature to said paper was procured by plaintiff through or by means of misrepresentation or artifice on plaintiff's part. The presumption of law is that a person's signature to an instrument was made freely and voluntarily, and was obtained without fraud, misrepresentation, or artifice, and the burden of proving the contrary is on the party alleging it." But at the request of the defendant the court also charged the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, when she signed and delivered to plaintiff the writing dated January 23d, 1899, believed and intended the same to be only a further acknowledgment of plaintiff's right to collect from the family allowance, granted in the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, the sum of $25,500, not binding her individually to pay plaintiff said sum of $25,500, they will find for the defendant"—to which plaintiff excepted. It is claimed that this instruction is erroneous, for the reason that the jury were not told that defendant's belief must be the result of misrepresentation on plaintiff's part, or that they must believe that defendant's signature was obtained by means of false statements relied on by defendant.

"It was upon this theory that the instruction was held to be erroneous, and the judgment reversed in the former opinion; but, upon rehearing and a further consideration of the instruction and of all the record, we have concluded that the jury were told over and over again in other instructions that the belief must have been the result of false and fraudulent representations by plaintiff. Instructions must be read together as a whole; and when so read, if they are not contradictory, and if, supplemented by each other, they fairly state the law, a case will not be reversed because one particular instruction does not state all the rule with its modifications. The court of its own motion instructed the jury as follows: "If you find, therefore, that plaintiff was not guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation or artifice in procuring defendant's signature to the papers marked, respectively, 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 1' and 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 2,' your verdict must be for the plaintiff for the balance remaining unpaid on said account." And at the request of the defendant as follows: "If you find from the evidence in this case that the writings or instruments of August 25, 1898, and January 23, 1899, were signed by defendant freely and voluntarily, without any misrepresentation or fraud or undue influence or artifice made by or practiced upon the defendant by plaintiff, then the plaintiff will be entitled to recover." And again the court instructed the jury as follows: "The paper marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 2,' taken in connection with the paper marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 1,' constitute an account stated between plaintiff and defendant, unless you find that defendant's signature to said paper was procured by plaintiff through or by means of misrepresentation or artifice on plaintiff's part." And in the concluding part of the court's charge to the jury the court again said: "Therefore, to crystallize this whole matter, I will say to you, if you find that the defendant in this case freely, voluntarily, and without any fraudulent practices or artifice or deception practiced on the part of plaintiff, executed and signed these papers, they constitute an account stated, and plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict for the amount of that account, less the payments made thereon. * * * But if, on the other hand, you find that the signature of the defendant to the papers was procured by fraud, misrepresentation, artifice of any kind, then it will be your duty to render a verdict in favor of defendant."

"It is further shown by the special issues submitted to the jury and the answers of the jury thereto that they were not misled by the instruction complained of, and that they not only understood the instructions as given, but found that the defendant's belief was the result of misrepresentation on the part of plaintiff. Among the special issues submitted to the jury at plaintiff's request, and their answers, were the following: "(3) Did defendant know the entire contents of the bill of August 25, 1898, before indorsing thereon that request to the executors?" The jury answered, "No." "Did the plaintiff, when he asked the defendant to sign the paper of January 23, 1899, represent to her that said bill was merely a further written acknowledgment of his right to collect $25, 500 from the family allowance?" The jury answered, "Yes." "(6) Did the plaintiff, when he asked the defendant to sign the paper of January 23, 1899, state to her that if she would sign that paper he would have his attorney get the executors to pay the balance due her upon family allowance?" The jury answered, "Yes." And at defendant's request the following special issues were submitted to the jury and answered as follows: "(5) Did the plaintiff obtain from the defendant the order indorsed and signed by her upon the account dated August 25, 1898, by means of any misrepresentations as to the quantity or value of his services?" The jury answered, "Yes." "(6) Did the plaintiff obtain from the defendant the writing signed by her and dated January 23, 1899, by means of any misrepresentation or untrue statement?" The jury answered, "Yes."

"The case was tried under our system with the aid of a jury, and the special function of the jury was to pass upon the facts; and, as the jury found, in answer to special issues and in several different forms, that the writing was procured from the defendant by means of false representations, it could not have based its verdict upon a finding as to the mere belief of the defendant as to the legal effect of the paper. No one could read the record, the instructions of the court, and the special findings of the jury and believe that the instruction claimed to be erroneous had any influence upon the verdict of the jury. The jury based its verdict upon the findings as to the belief founded upon and induced by misrepresentations, and under the special instruction of the court, given at plaintiff's request, to wit: "If you find, therefore, that plaintiff was not guilty of any fraud or misrepresentation or artifice in procuring defendant's signature to the papers marked, respectively, 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 1' and 'Plaintiff's Exhibit 2,' your verdict must be for the plaintiff for the balance remaining unpaid upon said account."

"The conclusion we have reached is supported by many well-considered cases. The case of De Witt v. Floreston Pulp & Paper Co., 7 Cal. App. 774 [96 Pac. 397], decided by this court is directly in point. There, in an action for damages on account of personal injuries, the court at the request of the plaintiff instructed the jury that if the injuries received by the plaintiff "were caused by the failure of the defendant to furnish reasonably safe and suitable tools" the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. It was claimed, and correctly claimed, that the instruction did not state the law correctly for the reason that the law only requires the employer to "use reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of such tools and appliances." It was there said: "Instructions must be read as a whole, and when so read, if they are not contradictory, and if, supplemented by each other, they fairly state the law, a case will not be reversed because any one instruction does not state all the rule with its modifications. Now under the rule it is the duty of the employer to furnish his employés with reasonably safe tools and appliances for the doing of the work intended to be done thereby. The law is so stated by all the authorities. If it were not so, then we would have the converse—that it is not the duty of the employer to furnish his employés with safe and suitable tools and appliances. The duty of the employer is performed, however, when he exercises reasonable and ordinary care, such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in the selection of tools and appliances for the uses and purposes for which they are intended. The instructions complained of do not give the last rule stated, or, in other words, they do not instruct the jury as to when or how the duty is performed; but elsewhere the jury are fully instructed as to such duty." The opinion then, after showing that the other instructions fully covered the matter omitted from the instruction under consideration, concludes: "It seems to us that the instructions complained of could not have misled the jury when the court, as we have shown, repeated time and again that the duty of the defendant was performed if it exercised reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of the elbow. The jury evidently believed from the testimony that defendant did not use that degree of care which a reasonably prudent man would use in the selection of the elbow. It is no doubt the general rule that when the court instructs the jury upon what state of facts they may find a verdict the instructions should include all the facts in controversy upon which evidence has been offered material to the rights of the defendant or the plaintiff, as the case may be; but this rule must be reasonably applied in view of the whole record and all the instructions, for the purpose of determining as to whether or not the jury may, as reasonable men, have been misled by the instruction." In the case last cited the Supreme Court denied a petition for rehearing. We need only refer to the authorities collated and cited in that case to justify the conclusion we have reached in this, and we will cite no further authorities upon the proposition.

[3] "It would have been better for the court to have excluded evidence as to defendant's financial condition at the time she signed the statement; but, as the plaintiff was her family physician and was acquainted with her financial condition, as shown by the evidence, it was closely connected with the negotiations leading up to the signing of the papers. We do not believe it to be of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the case, or that its exclusion would have in any way affected the verdict of the jury.

"As to the evidence, we have carefully examined it, and we find that there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury and their special findings on the issues submitted to them.

"The order is affirmed."

Subsequently this court made its order transferring the cause here for hearing. After careful consideration of the arguments advanced by the respective parties, we have reached the conclusion that the District Court of Appeal was right in affirming the order denying a new trial. With respect to the matters discussed by that court, we are entirely satisfied with its opinion above quoted. The Court of Appeal did not, however, notice all of the contentions advanced by appellant, and some additional points made by him should, we think, be given attention.

[4] 1. It is earnestly contended that the court erred in compelling the plaintiff to produce his books of account, and in permitting the defendant to inquire into the various items of the account. It is, no doubt, the general rule that the correctness of the various items of an account stated cannot be attacked. Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702. "An action upon an account stated is not founded upon the original items, but upon the balance ascertained by the mutual consent of the parties." Carey v. Petroleum Co., 33 Cal. 697. But this rule has no application where the defendant has raised an issue regarding his assent to the alleged account stated, and the items have a logical bearing on this issue. Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 550, 37 Pac. 504. Nor does it apply where the account stated is, as it is here, attacked for fraud or mistake tainting the entire transaction. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) p. 463. In such cases the real issue is whether the parties ever gave a binding assent to the account. Any competent evidence which is relevant to that issue may be introduced. See Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 107 U. S. 325, 1 Sup. Ct. 173, 27 L. Ed. 319. In Coffee v. Williams, supra, it was held that where the defendant's assent to the account had been denied it was proper to go into the various items, as the falsity of the items had a tendency to show that the defendant had never agreed to the alleged account. On similar reasoning, where it is averred that assent to the account has been obtained by fraud, proof of the falsity of the items, if such proof tends to support the charge of fraud, may be made. In the case at bar, the testimony offered by the defendant in contradiction of the items appearing on plaintiff's books, and the entries themselves, were relevant to the issue of fraud raised by the answer. There was therefore no error in the admission of this evidence.

[5] 2. The witness Manning was permitted to refresh his recollection from a memorandum made six or seven years after the event regarding which he testified. There was no showing sufficient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, to authorize the use of the memorandum for this purpose. But all that Manning testified to was that he had gone to the defendant's ranch on January 16, 1896 (one of the dates on which plaintiff claimed to have rendered services to the defendant at the ranch), and that he had not seen plaintiff there. The plaintiff and another witness testified that plaintiff had left the ranch on January 16th by the morning train, presumably before Manning's arrival. In view of these facts, the testimony of Manning had a very slight, if any, tendency to contradict the plaintiff, and its admission was not substantially prejudicial.

[6] 3. The appellant complains that two of the special issues submitted at the request of the defendant presented to the jury questions of law, rather than of fact. We are unable to see that the plaintiff was harmed by the course followed, if it was improper. Furthermore, no exception was taken, and the action of the court in directing a jury to answer special issues was not, at the time this action was tried, one of the matters deemed excepted to under the provisions of section 647 of the Code of Civil Procedure. For these reasons, in addition to those stated by the District Court of Appeal, we think the motion for new trial was properly denied.

The order is affirmed.

1. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 94*)—STAY OF EXECUTION—QUASHING STAY OF EXECUTION—EFFECT.

Where a sheriff, not knowing that the court had entered an order staying further proceedings on a judgment, threatened to levy upon the business of the judgment debtor, and the debtor paid to the sheriff the amount of the judgment, the sheriff was justified in paying this money to the judgment creditor, when the court recalled its order staying further proceedings, and the debtor failed to stay them by a proper bond on appeal.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1057, providing that where an undertaking is required by law the officer taking same must require the sureties to make an affidavit that they are each residents and householders or freeholders within the state, the allegation that the sureties are either householders or freeholders is a material part of the affidavit, and where an affidavit appended to an appeal bond failed to state those facts the bond was void, and did not stay execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. T. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by E. R. Maze against Arthur B. Langford, as Sheriff of Santa Clara County, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 117 Pac. 930.

Will M. Beggs and R. C. McComish, for appellants. Wm. A. Coulter, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, in an action for damages against the sheriff of Santa Clara county and his surety, for turning over to one E. V. Burke $500 belonging to the plaintiff.

The salient facts of the case are as follows: E. V. Burke, on May 8, 1908, obtained a judgment against E. R. Maze, the plaintiff herein, for the sum of $500 and costs. On the same day Burke procured to be issued thereon a writ of execution, directed to the defendant Langford as sheriff, commanding him to satisfy the said judgment out of the property of E. R. Maze, defendant in that case, the plaintiff here. The next day a deputy sheriff proceeded to Mountain View, where E. R. Maze with a partner was engaged in the hardware business, and demanded the amount of the judgment, threatening that if it was not at once paid he would levy on the stock of hardware in the store belonging to E. R. Maze and his partner, and put a receiver in charge. Before the deputy sheriff had taken any definite action in the matter, and later in the day, he was told by E. R. Maze that the court in which said action was pending had made an order staying the execution. Such was the fact, but the sheriff's office had not been notified of such order, and the deputy sheriff therefore insisted on proceeding with the execution, whereupon E. R. Maze, in order to prevent said hardware business from being placed in the hands of a receiver, turned over to the deputy sheriff on the execution the amount demanded, with the understanding and under such circumstances that it was not and cannot be regarded as a payment of or satisfaction of said judgment. On Monday, May 11th, E. R. Maze, by his attorney, delivered to Langford, the sheriff, a copy of the order staying execution. Thereafter, on the 14th day of May, E. R. Maze took an appeal from said judgment, and filed his undertaking on appeal and to stay execution the affidavit to said undertaking containing no allegation that the sureties therein named were freeholders or householders. Thereafter both parties demanded of the sheriff, in writing, that he deliver to each of them the money in question, and E. R. Maze attached to his demand a copy of said undertaking. Subsequently, on May 15th, the court, having set aside its purported order suspending the execution of said judgment, the sheriff paid over the $500 to E. V. Burke. In March, 1909, this judgment was reversed, and the superior court, as directed by the appellate court, entered judgment on its findings in favor of E. R. Maze. Thereafter Maze brought the present suit to recover from the sheriff $500, together with interest and costs and the 25 per cent. penalty provided for in section 4317 of the Political Code. The trial court found the facts substantially as related above, and rendered judgment in favor of Maze against Langford and his surety, the American Bonding Company, for the $500 demanded, with interest and costs, but refused to allow the penalty claimed, upon the ground that the sheriff, not having acted personally in the matter, was not liable therefor. This appeal is prosecuted by both defendants.

[1] When the court recalled its order staying further proceedings under the judgment, the sheriff was then, if not before, at liberty to pay the money to the judgment creditor, if the stay bond on appeal was defective and void. We have no doubt that the affidavit to the stay bond, failing as it does to state that the sureties were freeholders or householders, as required by section 1057, Code of Civil Procedure, omits an element essential to the validity of the bond. Tibbet v. Tom Sue, 122 Cal. 208, 54 Pac. 741. Said section declares: "In any case where an undertaking or bond is authorized or required by any law of this state, the officer taking the same must * * * require the sureties to accompany it with an affidavit that they are each residents and householders or freeholders within the state, and are each worth the sum specified in the undertaking or bond over and above all their just debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution. * * *"

[2] In the case of Tibbet v. Tom Sue, supra, after quoting the part of the section just referred to, the court, speaking of the circumstance that the sureties in an attachment proceeding were not shown to be either freeholders or householders, observed: "Such affidavit must accompany the undertaking, for the law demands it. That the sureties upon the undertaking are either householders or freeholders is a material part of the affidavit. It is probably the most material fact demanded by the affidavit. If the affidavit may omit this statement, then the entire affidavit goes for naught, and an undertaking without any affidavit of the sureties whatever would support the writ, even as against a motion by the defendant to discharge it."

The plaintiff in the present case, however, contends that the defendant sheriff had no right to question the validity of the undertaking; and he relies on the case of Sam Yuen v. McMann, 99 Cal. 497, 34 Pac. 80. That case is not in point. There the sheriff refused upon demand to release from levy personal property taken upon an execution, giving as his reason that the assignors of plaintiff were not entitled to such release until the sureties upon the undertaking staying execution of the judgment had justified. But the court held that according to the explicit language of section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, the "effect of perfecting an appeal and giving an undertaking was * * * to release from levy property levied upon under execution issued upon such judgment," irrespective of any question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties, and that therefore the sheriff's position could not be sustained. It was not held in that case that the sheriff would be warranted in retaining property held by him under execution on a judgment, where the stay bond on appeal was, as in the present case, absolutely void. The justification of the sureties on a bond is a thing apart from its validity; while, on the other hand, the qualification of the sureties is a material part of the bond.

The judgment and order are reversed.

MAZE v. LANGFORD, Sheriff et al.
(Civ. 817.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 1, 1911.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by E. R. Maze against Arthur B. Langford, as Sheriff of Santa Clara County, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. A. Coulter, for appellant. Will M. Beggs and R. C. McComish, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor, and is taken on the judgment roll alone.

The facts of the case are stated in an opinion this day filed in the case numbered 826, and entitled "E. R. Maze, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Arthur B. Langford, as Sheriff of the County of Santa Clara, State of California, and the American Bonding Company, a Corporation, Defendants and Appellants," 117 Pac. 929, which is an appeal from the same judgment, but taken by the defendants.

As will be seen by reference to said opinion, the trial court found that the defendant Langford was not warranted in paying to E. V. Burke the sum of $500—the subject-matter of the action—and accordingly gave judgment for that sum in favor of plaintiff and against defendants, but refused to give plaintiff judgment for the 25 per cent. damages and 10 per cent. per month interest provided for in section 4162 of the Political Code, to which he claimed to be also entitled. Both parties have appealed.

We have this day decided in said case numbered 826 that the stay bond on appeal was void, and that defendant Langford was justified in paying to Burke the said sum of $500, and have accordingly reversed said judgment.

It follows that the plaintiff, not being entitled to the principal, has no valid claim to the incident thereto, i. e., the penalty.

The judgment is reversed.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 702*)—USE OF STREETS—LAW OF THE ROAD.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—RES IPSA LOQUITUR DOCTRINE—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION.

Where an automobile in defendant's exclusive control collided with plaintiff's milk wagon, which was standing in the street, which was clear, except as to the wagon and automobile, and was well lighted and in good condition, and the wagon also carried a reflecting light, and plaintiff was using due care and did not know of the automobile's approach until the collision, the res ipsa loquitur doctrine raises a presumption that the collision was caused by defendant's negligence in handling the automobile.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—DUTY TO PRODUCE—PARTY HAVING KNOWLEDGE.

Where an automobile, at night, in a well-lighted street 48 feet wide, ran into a delivery wagon standing at the curb, the circumstances required defendant to produce evidence showing his exercise of reasonable care, under the rule that a party peculiarly having within his power to produce evidence should be required to do so.

jury could infer that he was exceeding the legal rate of speed, and hence was guilty of negligence.

M. W. Simpson, for appellant. Reed, Black & Reed, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for damages for personal injuries.

Briefly the facts disclosed by plaintiff's evidence are as follows: On February 13, 1909, the plaintiff was driving a horse and wagon, delivering milk to customers in the city of Alameda. He had come to a stop near the sidewalk, and was engaged in pouring milk from a large can on his wagon into another, when the defendant driving an automobile, collided with the wagon, and by so doing injured the plaintiff. The collision occurred on Park street, about midway between Eagle and Clement avenues, and defendant at the time was proceeding in a northerly direction toward the last-named avenue. Plaintiff's horse and wagon were standing on the left (east) side of the street and facing southerly. On the right side of the wagon, attached to the seat, was an ordinary "milk wagon lamp," in good order, with a reflector, and the lamp was burning. The roadway at this point from curb to curb is 48 feet wide, and was at the time of the collision in good condition. The accident occurred at 8 o'clock in the evening, and there was at the time a lighted, ordinary street arc light suspended about 25 or 30 feet above the middle of the crossing at the corner of Park street and Clement avenue. On this question one of the witnesses testified "there was light all around there," and that it was light enough at Eagle avenue and Park street for him to identify the defendant 50 feet away. Plaintiff testified in his own behalf that he drove along the right side of Park street, and did not cross over to the left side until in front of his customer's house, where the collision happened. The defendant, instead of going to the left, attempted to pass the wagon on the right-hand side, and as there was not room enough to do so the collision ensued. The street was clear at the time, there being no vehicles of any kind in the block, except the two involved, and the defendant was operating and in control of his automobile, which, just before the collision, was running between 10 and 15 miles per hour. At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove negligence on the part of the defendant. The motion was granted, and final judgment was entered, and to this order and ruling the plaintiff duly excepted.

[1-3] Preliminarily it may be well to state: (1) That the driver of a vehicle should proceed carefully and be on the alert, lest he collide with others. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 677; Wistrom v. Redlick Bros., Inc., 6 Cal. App. 671, 92 Pac. 1048. (2) That the left side of a street may be used by a truck to discharge its load, by a coach, buggy, or automobile to allow passengers to alight, or as a matter of convenience a funeral may be formed on that side of the street. So the driver of a delivery wagon may use any portion of the street necessary for him in the performance of his business or employment. The law of the state, as declared in section 2931 of the Political Code, applies to moving vehicles, and necessarily has no application to a case like the present, where the driver was delivering milk to a customer who resided on the left side of the street.

[4] Plaintiff contends that the accident was the direct result of defendant's negligence, and he relies chiefly upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to make out his case. The rule thus invoked is laid down in the case of Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, and a number of other California cases as follows: "When the thing which causes the accident is shown to be under the management and control of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have such management and control use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from the want of ordinary care by the defendant." Under such circumstances, proof of the happening of the event raises a presumption of the defendant's negligence, and casts upon the defendant the burden of showing that ordinary care was exercised. We think the case at bar satisfies every element of this doctrine and comes within the rule. The automobile was in the exclusive control and under the management of the defendant; and automobiles when properly managed do not, in the ordinary course of things, collide with standing wagons. It is unlike the case of a runaway horse, in charge or not of his driver, causing injury, for in such a case it is as reasonable to infer that it was the negligence of a stranger as to assume it was that of the driver which caused the horse to run away. In cases of that kind, the rule fails, and the doctrine res ipsa loquitur cannot be invoked. Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 573, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760, and cases cited.

In Rowe v. Such the court held that no presumption of negligence arose from the mere fact that the horse ran away. There, when the driver was first seen, he was "in the air" and falling from his seat to the ground. The court said that whether he lost control of his horse through negligence was not shown, and that whatever caused the runaway was a matter of speculation, pure and simple, and it was as fair to presume that the cause was unavoidable as that it was fault of the driver. The court then quotes from the case of Button v. Frink, 51 Conn. 342, 50 Am. Rep. 24, as follows: "A man driving furiously along the street runs into my carriage and breaks it. Here the act indicates negligence on the part of the driver. Again, the defendant's horse is running furiously along the street, dragging the shafts of a carriage after him, and runs against and breaks my carriage. This indicates accident only, and not negligence."

[5] In the present case we cannot reasonably attribute the accident to the carelessness of a third person. The circumstances are more like the supposed case in Button v. Frink, supra, for the defendant was driving his motor car at from 10 to 15 miles an hour along the street, and he ran into the plaintiff's wagon, which was at a standstill. As in the supposed case, the act of the defendant, in itself unexplained, indicates negligence on his part. As already indicated, the record shows that the roadway was in good condition; there were no other vehicles in the block; the horse and wagon were standing where the plaintiff had a right to halt them. Moreover, the plaintiff was unaware of the approach of the automobile until the collision occurred. There was no want of care on the part of the plaintiff, and it would seem that the accident must have resulted from the negligence of the defendant, and not from that of some third party. We therefore think that this is a case for the application of the rule res ipsa loquitur, and also of the principal that he who has peculiarly within his power the means of producing evidence of reasonable care shall be required to do so.

In Morris v. Strobel & Wilken Co., 81 Hun, 1, 30 N. Y. Supp. 571, the court's ruling is thus stated: "The mere falling of a sign-board from defendant's building into the street is evidence of negligence; the maxim res ipsa loquitur being applicable in such case." The court referred to several English cases, and, among others, to the case of Byrne v. Boadle, 2 Hurl. & C. 722, where the facts disclosed an injury caused by the falling of a barrel into a highway from the window of a shop; and in discussing the question of the proprietor's liability Pollock, C. B., said: "There are many accidents from which no presumption of negligence can arise, but this is not true in all cases. It is the duty of persons who keep barrels in a warehouse to take care that they do not roll out; and I think that such a case would beyond all doubt afford prima facie evidence of negligence. A barrel could not roll out of a warehouse without some negligence. So, in building or repairing a house, if a person passing along the road is injured by something falling upon him, I think the accident would be prima facie evidence of negligence."

In Howser v. Cumberland & P. R. Co., 80 Md. 146, 30 Atl. 906, 27 L. R. A. 154, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332, the plaintiff was walking along a pathway outside the defendant's right of way, and was struck by cross-ties that fell from a moving train. In Houston v. Brush, 66 Vt. 346, 29 Atl. 380, the plaintiff, while driving along under defendant's elevated railway, was struck and injured by an iron plate, which fell from the structure. In Dixon v. Plums, 98 Cal. 388, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180, and in Knott v. McGilvray, 124 Cal. 129, 56 Pac. 789, the plaintiffs, while proceeding along public sidewalks, were hurt by falling missiles. In each of these cases the doctrine under discussion was successfully invoked.

In the case of Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Giese, 229 Ill. 260, 82 N. E. 232, it was held (as correctly stated in the syllabus) as follows: "An injury caused by a street car leaving the track and striking a wagon in which plaintiff was riding is within the maxim res ipsa loquitur, and proof of the injury will justify a recovery, unless the defendant shows that it was not at fault." Commenting on the facts, and after quoting the maxim, the court in its opinion said: "All of the elements of the accident were within the complete control of appellant, and the result is so far out of the usual course of things that there is no fair inference that it could have been produced by any other cause than negligence." See, also, Chico Bridge Co. v. Sacramento, 123 Cal. 183, 55 Pac. 780.

[6] Passing to another point, it is tacitly conceded, and indeed it must be, that ordinance No. 405 of the city of Alameda prohibits a rate of speed on Park street greater than 8 miles an hour. The evidence shows that at a point 100 or 150 feet from the place of the collision the defendant was driving his automobile at a speed of between 10 and 15 miles an hour—not an excessive speed, but greater than that allowed by the local ordinance—and we think this circumstance is one from which the jury might reasonably have inferred that at or immediately prior to the collision the defendant was exceeding the legal rate of speed (Olsen v. Levy, 8 Cal. App. 487, 97 Pac. 76), and hence must be presumed to be guilty of negligence.

The judgment is reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1182*)—APPEAL—APPEARANCE FOR ACCUSED—EFFECT OF NONAPPEARANCE.

The appellate court is not bound to search the transcript for errors in the court's rulings, where accused does not appear by counsel.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Frank Rameriz was convicted of statutory rape, and from an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Light, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was accused by information of the crime of rape upon a female under the age of 16 years, was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 25 years. Defendant moved for a new trial, which being denied, he appealed from the order. There is no appearance here on behalf of defendant, and the case is probably before us by operation of the statute then in force, which automatically brought the record up.

We do not understand that any duty is placed upon the court to search the transcript for possible errors, where the defendant fails to make an appearance by counsel. On the contrary, we feel at liberty to affirm the judgment and order without an examination of the testimony or rulings of the court. In the present case, however, we have read the testimony and noted the rulings of the court during the progress of the trial, and have also examined the instructions given to the jury. The defendant appears to have had a fair trial, the jury were fully and correctly instructed as to the law, and the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. O'DONNELL (Cr. 151.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1911.)

1. BURGLARY (§ 41*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to warrant a conviction of burglary in the second degree.

2. BURGLARY (§ 46*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that on the same afternoon that a burglary was committed defendant left with the proprietor of a saloon certain articles, including a door key and a gold dollar, the key and dollar being part of the property taken from the residence burglarized, was a sufficient predicate for an instruction on recent possession of stolen property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Thomas O'Donnell was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Hewitt, for appellant. Attorney General Webb and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] This case may be disposed of with scant comment. The appellant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and in the recital of the evidence we may follow substantially the opening statement to the jury, made by Mr. Schillig, the district attorney of Sutter county: On the 19th day of September, 1910, the residence of one Henry Van Tiger, of Yuba City, was entered and burglarized. The defendant had been employed on the premises in an almond orchard for ten days or two weeks, and he was familiar with the surroundings and knew that the members of the Van Tiger family were engaged in hulling almonds in the orchard and back of the barn. He quit his employment and was paid off on Saturday evening, the 17th of September, and on the afternoon of the 19th he was seen going towards the Van Tiger residence only a short distance away; about a half hour later he was seen returning. The same afternoon he went into a saloon in Marysville and left with the proprietor some articles, including an ordinary door key, and also exhibited to the latter a gold dollar. Such key and a gold dollar were a part of the property taken from said residence. After his arrest the appellant declared that he had no gold dollar in his possession while he was in that part of the country, or at any other time. He also denied that he was in the neighborhood on the 18th or 19th of September, stating that he left Marysville and went to Sacramento on the 17th, and remained there until the next Saturday, the 24th. The foregoing circumstances justify, we think, a rational inference that appellant committed the crime charged. People v. Smith, 79 Cal. 554, 21 Pac. 952; People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547. We can see no merit in the contention that the court should have sustained the objection made to the evidence of appellant's statement to the district attorney. In the first place, it was not a confession, and besides it was clearly shown to have been made freely and voluntarily.

[2] The only other point suggested by appellant is that, by reason of the entire want of evidence as to the possession on his part of any of the stolen property, the court erred in giving the instruction upon that subject.

It is to be observed that the court guardedly refrained from invading the province of the jury, advising them that they might consider as a circumstance, if unexplained, tending to prove guilt, the possession of the stolen property by the defendant recently after the alleged commission of the offense, "if you find any such property to have been in his possession." The possession of the gold dollar, under the circumstances narrated by the witnesses, was a sufficient predicate for this instruction. The scarcity of the coin and the denial of its possession by defendant authorized the inference that it was a part of the stolen property.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BARTLETT SPRINGS CO. v. STANDARD BOX CO. (Civ. 816.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 25, 1911.)

CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—CONSTRUCTION—MUTUALITY.

A contract, by which defendant agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to purchase certain kinds of wooden boxes to the extent of plaintiff's demand therefor during the succeeding year, was not lacking in mutuality; plaintiff being bound thereby to purchase his requirements for the year from defendant, and defendant being bound to sell upon plaintiff's demand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. H. Graham, Judge.

Action by the Bartlett Springs Company against the Standard Box Company. From an order denying a motion for a new trial upon judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. L. Benjamin, for appellant. Frank V. Bell, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the amount demanded. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant, which was denied, and it is from the order denying such motion that this appeal is taken.

On March 5, 1906, the parties to this action entered into an agreement, by the terms of which the defendant was to sell and the plaintiff was to purchase certain kinds of wooden boxes to the entire extent of plaintiff's demand for the period of one year from the date of the contract. The market price of boxes increased, and the defendant only partially performed its part of the contract, filling but one comparatively small order, to wit, an order for 1,000 boxes. The plaintiff purchased elsewhere boxes as it needed them during the period covered by the contract, and in due time brought this action to recover from the defendant the difference between the contract price and the increased price which it was compelled to pay for such boxes. Defendant contends that the plaintiff under the contract was not bound in any way to take boxes from the defendant during the year mentioned in the contract, and that the latter could not have required the plaintiff to do so, and that therefore the agreement was lacking in mutuality, and was void.

We cannot agree with this view. By the agreement the defendant was to furnish and the plaintiff was to take all the boxes that it would need in its business during the time stated. Both parties were bound by the contract, and if the plaintiff had failed to carry out its obligations thereunder and had purchased elsewhere the boxes needed by it in its business for the year designated, it would have been liable to the defendant for any damages sustained by the latter. The authorities amply sustain this position. In Nat. Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, the court held that a contract, whereby a manufacturer of pig iron was to sell, and a user of that article was to purchase, all of certain iron that it might need in its business during a specified season, was a valid contract, observing: "It cannot be said that appellee was not bound by the contract. It had no right to purchase iron elsewhere for use in its business. If it had done so, appellant might have maintained an action for a breach of the contract. It was bound by the contract to take of appellant, at the prices named, its entire supply of iron for the year; that is, such quantity of iron, in view of the situation and business of appellee, as was reasonably required and necessary in its manufacturing business. A foundry may purchase its supply of coal for the season of the coal dealer. A hotel may do the same. * * * Such contracts are not uncommon, and we have never understood that they were void." See Hercules Coal & M. Co. v. Central Investment Co., 98 Ill. App. 427. In the case of Dailey Co. v. Clark Can Co., 128 Mich. 591, 87 N. W. 761, there were an offer and acceptance in writing, by the terms of which the plaintiff, who was in the canning business, was to purchase from defendant the tin cases which it might need in its business for a specified period. This was held not to be a mere option, but a valid contract binding both parties. There, as here, the plaintiff could not go outside to buy without violating the contract, and the defendant could not, without doing likewise, refuse plaintiff's demands. In the cases relied on by the defendant, the promisees were not obligated to purchase, nor bound in any way by the terms of the contracts. In Hoffman v. Maffioli, 104 Wis. 630, 80 N. W. 1032, 47

L. R. A. 427, it was held by a divided court that an accepted offer to furnish crushed rock and curbing at certain prices in such quantities as the defendant might desire did not constitute an enforceable contract. There the promisee "confessedly was not obligated," so the court said, "to take * * * under the contract all the stone to complete his contract, but only such quantities as he might desire." The reasoning in that case supports the case at bar. In McCaw Mfg. Co. v. Felder, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664, the defendant accepted an offer by the plaintiff to furnish the defendant, at specified prices, all the boxes of a certain character the defendant might want for the period of one year. The court, making its decision turn on the word "want," said that the defendant had not agreed to purchase a single box; that it had not agreed "to want any boxes." Accordingly the agreement was held inoperative as a valid and binding contract. This case, we think, is authority against the defendant, for later on in the opinion the court, in discussing the refusal of the trial court to allow the defendant to amend its plea, by setting up an oral contemporaneous agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to furnish the defendant and the defendant agreed to buy all the boxes necessary to pack the output of the factory of the defendant for the time specified, held (citing cases) that this agreement constituted a valid contract, which could be enforced by either party, and that the proposed amendment should have been allowed. So in Bailey et al. v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535 (Gil. 465), the plaintiffs were to purchase and the defendant was to sell all the pig iron which the plaintiffs might want in their business at given prices for the time specified; but, says the court, in holding the contract nudum pactum, "they (the plaintiffs) did not engage to want any quantity whatever," or "of course to purchase any iron of defendant." This case is not only different from the case at bar in its facts, but it is practically overruled by Ames-Brooks Co. v. Ætna Ins. Co., 83 Minn. 346, 350, 86 N. W. 344. See note, 9 Cyc. 330.

The effect of the cases on the point being discussed is correctly and well stated in 9 Cyc. 327, as follows: "There are many cases in which, although the offer is definite enough, yet the acceptor, by merely accepting, has really himself promised nothing in return, has not made himself liable for anything, so that, although one is bound, the other is not, and the engagement lacks what is called mutuality. In such a case there is not an enforceable agreement. The most frequent example of this is when one offers to supply another with such goods of a certain kind as he may choose to order or may 'wish' during a certain time, and the other accepts the offer. Here there is no consideration for the promise or offer, for the promisee has not bound himself to anything, and has incurred no legal liability at all. The correct view of the case is that there is no agreement binding on the promisor, but simply an offer on his part, which may be accepted by giving an order until such time as it is actually withdrawn or expires by limitation of time. Where, however, the acceptance does really impose any obligation on the acceptor, then a consideration is present and a binding contract results; and this is so wherever the acceptor's freedom of action is in any way limited. It is not limited at all where he simply assents to the seller's offer to sell all the goods he may order or 'desire' during a certain time, for he has not promised to order, nor is he bound to do so; but it is limited where the offer is to supply him with all the goods of a particular kind which he may 'require' or which he may need during a certain time, for here, although it may be that he will neither need nor require any, yet if he does he has bound himself to buy them from the proposer, and has hence parted with his right to buy them from whom he pleases."

The defendant also contends that the contract was void because too indefinite; that the plaintiff was not ready, able, and willing to perform its part of the contract; that the plaintiff failed to prove any damages. We have examined each of these points, together with the one that the defendant was released from liability because it was impossible to perform the contract, and conclude that neither of them has any merit. Considering briefly the last-mentioned point (which is as meritorious as the others), it is sufficient to say that the defendant did not set up in his answer that the contract was impossible of performance. This was not an issue in the case, either according to the pleadings or the theory on which it was tried. There was no finding on this subject, nor does the defendant enumerate this as one of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. It is also apparent from the record that this contention of the defendant is groundless, inasmuch as plaintiff was able to and did get the boxes as it needed them.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JULES LEVY & BRO. v. A. MAUTZ & CO.
(Civ. 812.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 25, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

In the absence of a statement of the case, the findings of the trial court are conclusive as to the facts found, and, if the conclusions deduced therefrom necessarily follow as a matter of law, the judgment must be upheld.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3762-3771; Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

2. SALES (§ 1*)—CONTRACT—CERTAINTY—DESIGNATION OF PRICE.

Under Civ. Code, § 1727, providing that a contract of sale must be certain as to the thing sold and designate the price to be paid therefor, an executory contract of sale, if uncertain and incapable of being made certain as to the price, is insufficient to sustain an action for damages by either party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 3-5; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. SALES (§ 78*)—CONTRACT—TERMS—PRICE—FAILURE TO FIX.

In general, where no price is fixed in a contract for the sale of a commodity, the law on delivery and acceptance of the thing sold implies an agreement to pay the reasonable value of the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 206; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

4. SALES (§ 1*)—CONTRACT—TERMS—PRICE.

Where the price of a commodity called for by a contract of sale, but not delivered, is to be subsequently ascertained by the valuation of others, or by agreement of the parties, the contract is incomplete and unenforceable until the price is so fixed and agreed on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 3-5; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 15*)—ASSENT—MEETING OF MINDS.

The due execution of a contract requires the assent of at least two minds to each and all of the essentials of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-66; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. SALES (§ 1*)—CONTRACT—MEETING OF MINDS—TERMS.

Defendant agreed to purchase from a firm, to the business of which plaintiff succeeded, merchandise to the minimum amount of $4,000 a year for five years, beginning August 1, 1911, and on failure so to do to pay the firm, at the end of each yearly period, 25 per cent. of the difference between the value of the goods actually purchased in any one year and $4,000. The prices to be paid for the goods to be purchased and the terms and conditions on which the sales were to be made were not specified, but were to be ascertained and fixed from time to time by future agreement of the parties. Held, that there was no sufficient meeting of minds as to the price of the goods to be purchased, or the terms on which they were to be sold, so as to entitle plaintiff to recover damages for defendant's failure to purchase the required amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco: John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Jules Levy & Bro. against A. Mautz & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, for appellant. Dinkelspiel & Schlesinger and Bert Schlesinger, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This action was brought by the corporation plaintiff to recover the sum of $329.93 as damages against the corporation defendant, for the breach of a contract, wherein the defendant agreed to purchase from Jules Levy and Max Levy, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Jules Levy & Bro., and their successors or assigns, goods and merchandise such as Jules Levy & Bro. dealt in to the minimum amount of $4,000 a year, yearly, for a period of five years beginning August 1, 1905. It was further stipulated in the contract sued on that if the defendant failed in any of the yearly periods specified therein, beginning with August 1st of any one year and ending July 31st of the next year, to purchase from Jules Levy & Bro. merchandise to the full amount of $4,000 the defendant was to pay to them, at the end of such yearly periods, 25 per cent. of the difference between the value of the goods actually purchased in any one year and the sum of $4,000.

The copartnership of Jules Levy & Bro., its successors and assigns, by the further terms of the contract, were obligated to sell to the defendant, for cash or such terms as might be from time to time agreed to by the parties to the contract, merchandise such as the defendant was then dealing in to the amount of $4,000 a year, beginning August 1, 1905, for so long a time as Jules Levy & Bro. might remain in the lace goods business.

Prior to the execution of this contract, the defendant had made and delivered its promissory note to the firm of Jules Levy & Bro., apparently in payment of a pre-existing indebtedness, and one of the considerations for the contract sued on was, as appears from the recitals of the contract and the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, the promise and agreement of Jules Levy & Bro. to forbear bringing suit against the defendant upon said promissory note until after the 1st day of January, 1906. On February 12, 1907, the copartnership of Jules Levy & Bro. was merged into the corporation plaintiff, and thereupon the said copartnership transferred and assigned all of its property, contracts, etc., including the contract or agreement herein sued on, to the plaintiff.

The due execution of the contract was not denied, and all the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint are specifically found in the language of the complaint to be true; but in addition the trial court found "that during the period of time the defendant is charged with having failed to purchase goods from the plaintiff that no goods of any kind or character were ever selected by the defendant from any merchandise belonging to the plaintiff or otherwise identified; that during said time the plaintiff and defendant never agreed upon any fixed terms of credit or other terms for the sale or purchase of goods, and no terms of credit were agreed upon between said parties, nor were prices agreed upon, and that the defendant had not ordered from the plaintiff, nor had the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, any articles except such as had been paid for and not the subject of the suit."

As conclusions of law from the findings of fact, the trial court found, among other things, and in effect that the contract sued on was void for uncertainty and incapable of enforcement in this: That the prices to be paid for the goods, or the terms upon which the sales were to be made, were not specified in the contract, but were to be fixed by a subsequent agreement of the parties, and that no such agreement was ever made. Judgment was rendered and entered for the defendant, and the case comes here upon an appeal from the judgment and upon the judgment roll.

[1] The only point presented for consideration upon this appeal is that the findings do not justify the conclusions of law nor the judgment rendered thereon. In the absence of a statement of the case, the findings of the trial court are conclusive as to the facts found (Woodmen of the World v. Rutledge, 133 Cal. 644, 65 Pac. 1105), and if the conclusions deduced therefrom necessarily follow as a matter of law the judgment must be upheld. Alhambra Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. 379; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576; Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740; Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 Pac. 64.

[2] It is elementary in law that a contract of sale must be certain as to the thing sold, and designate the price to be paid for it (Civ. Code, § 1727); and it is well settled that if an executory contract of sale is uncertain and incapable of being made certain in the essential particular of the price to be paid for the thing sold, neither of the parties can be held to its terms, nor recover damages for its breach, Breckenridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 533, 21 Pac. 179; Association v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539; Talmadge v. Arrowhead, 101 Cal. 367, 35 Pac. 1000; Nat. Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 50, 25 L. Ed. 822; Schenectady Stove Co. v. Holbrook, 101 N. Y. 48, 4 N. E. 4; Grafton v. Cummings, 99 U. S. 106, 25 L. Ed. 366.

[3] It is true generally that where no price is fixed in a contract for the sale of a commodity the law, upon a delivery and acceptance of the thing sold, implies an understanding between the parties that a reasonable price is to be paid, and in such a case the contract will be deemed to be executed. In other words, in the absence of a fixed price, or an agreement as to the mode of ascertaining the value of the goods sold and delivered pursuant to the contract of sale, the purchaser will be held liable for the reasonable value of the goods. 1 Mechem on Contracts, § 206; Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) p. 91, § 85; Taft v. Travis, 136 Mass. 95; Prenatt v. Runyon, 12 Ind. 174.

[4] Where, however, the price of the commodity called for, but not delivered, is to be subsequently ascertained and fixed by the valuation of others, or by the agreement of the parties, the contract of sale is incomplete and nonenforceable until the price is so fixed or agreed upon. Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451; Bigley v. Risher, 63 Pa. 152; Foster v. Lumberman's Mining Co., 68 Mich. 188, 36 N. W. 171; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How.

544, 12 L. Ed. 1170; Devane v. Fennell, 24 N. C. 36; Albemarle Lumber Co. v. Wilcox, 105 N. C. 34, 10 S. E. 871; 1 Mechem on Contracts, § 209; Wilken Mfg. Co. v. Lumber Co., 94 Mich. 158, 53 N. W. 1045; Bales v. Gilbert, 84 Mo. App. 675; Hutton v. Moore, 26 Ark. 382. In the case at bar the prices to be paid for the goods which were to be purchased yearly by the defendant, for a period of five years, as well as the terms and conditions upon which the sales of said goods and merchandise were to be made, were not specified in the contract, but were, as indicated by the contract and the findings of the court below, to be ascertained and fixed from time to time by the future agreement of the parties.

[5, 6] The due execution of a contract requires the assent of at least two minds to each and all of the essentials of the agreement; and it is only upon evidence of such assent that the law enforces the terms of a contract or gives a remedy for a breach of it. It is apparent from the findings that the minds of the parties in this instance never met upon the essentials of price and terms of payment; and therefore the trial court's conclusion of law that the contract in controversy was void and incapable of enforcement because of its uncertainty in the particulars stated was the only conclusion that could logically or legally be drawn from the findings of fact. This conclusion is decisive of the case, and makes it unnecessary for us to discuss or decide the questions as to whether or not the contract is lacking in mutuality, or was assignable.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Abraham Kafoury was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Burton J. Wyman, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder, and takes this appeal from the judgment and the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant did not offer himself as a witness, and the case was submitted to the jury upon the evidence produced by the people in support of the charge contained in the information. That evidence conclusively established a brutal, unprovoked, and murderous assault with a deadly weapon by the defendant upon the person of his sister-in-law, Mrs. Hadley Kafoury. Not a single circumstance tending to excuse or mitigate the crime is revealed in the record before us. The record shows that the defendant, who, for several months prior to the commission of the crime had resided in the home of his brother, in the city of Oakland, fired three shots from a pistol at the complaining witness. The first shot struck her in the hip, a little below the waist line, and shattered the bone. It was not due to any fault or lack of effort on the part of the defendant that he failed in his purpose to kill, but rather to the courage of the woman, who, upon the first shot being fired, grappled with the defendant in an endeavor to disarm him. During the struggle for the weapon, the defendant fired two more shots without effect. At this juncture, the complaining witness secured partial control of the weapon, and thereupon the defendant dragged her into an adjoining room, where he threw her to the floor, and then with his knees upon her chest, choked her until she lost consciousness. The defendant was prevented from executing his announced intention of killing the woman by the interposition of neighbors, who were attracted to the premises by the screams of her children.

[1-3] The complaining witness, over the objection of the defendant, was permitted to testify as to the location, nature, and effect of the wound inflicted upon her by one of the shots fired at her. There was no error in this. A specific intent to kill is an essential element of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder. The intent in such a case, as in all criminal cases where intent is an ingredient of the crime charged, is a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances of the case. The nature of the assault, and the location and character of the wound inflicted, are relevant and competent evidence of the existence of the intent necessary to support a charge of assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder. Jowell v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 328, 71 S. W. 286; State v. Woodward, 84 Iowa, 172, 50 N. W. 885; King v. State, 21 Ga. 220; State v. Grant, 144 Mo. 56, 45 S. W. 1102; Williams v. Commonwealth, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1427, 43 S. W. 455.

[4] Dr. E. A. Majors, the physician who attended the complaining witness immediately after the assault, was permitted, against the objection of the defendant, to testify that at the time of the assault upon the woman she was three months with child, and as the result of the assault suffered a miscarriage. The defendant's motion to strike out this testimony was denied. We think, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, that the rulings of the trial court admitting this evidence may be sustained upon the theory that the nature of the assault, the circumstances under which it was perpetrated, and the consequences resulting therefrom, were relevant and competent evidence. The assault in this case was composed of a variety of incidents and results so intimately connected and blended with the use of a deadly weapon in the first instance as to make all, or any one of them, a part of the res gestæ, and all or any one of those incidents and results were relevant and competent, if they tended to elucidate, even in the slightest degree, the principal fact in issue, namely, the intent of the defendant to kill. The atrocity of the assault is some evidence of a malicious intent to kill. The words "malice" and "maliciously" import a wish to injure another, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law (Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 4); and the law presumes malice, where the circumstances of the crime indicate that it proceeded from the promptings of an abandoned and malignant heart. In the case at bar, the effect and consequences of the double assault committed upon the complaining witness indicate the force and violence of the assault, which in turn manifests in some degree the intent with which the crime was committed. No question was raised, and none could have been successfully raised, at the trial as to the right of the people to show, as they did in this case, that, as the result of the shooting, the thigh bone of the complaining witness was shattered, and that she was and would be permanently lame in her walk. This was an incident arising immediately out of the commission of the crime, which tended to show the deadly force and violence of the shot fired at the complaining witness. The second assault and all of its attendant circumstances were essentially a part of the res gestæ of the first assault, and therefore we take it that the result and consequences of the second assault were equally as admissible as a part of the res gestæ as the result and consequences of the first assault. It was doubtless upon this theory that the Supreme Court of Texas affirmed the case of Jowell v. State, supra. That was a case where the charge was an assault with the intent to commit murder; and during the trial the physician who attended the assaulted person testified in effect that said person was in a very serious condition, and might never recover, and that his right arm was paralyzed. The objection was made there that the evidence of the subsequent paralysis of the prosecuting witness was immaterial and irrelevant, and shed no light upon the issues of the case; but the Supreme Court, in disposing of the point said: "The description of the wound, the location of the ball, and the production of paralysis were undoubtedly admissible."

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCHWEICHLER. (Cr. 155.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 1, 1911.)

1. PERJURY (§ 25*)—INDICTMENT—MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

Under Pen. Code, § 118, providing that every person who, having taken oath to testify truly before a competent tribunal, states as true and material matter which he knows to be false is guilty of perjury, an indictment for perjury must show the alleged false statement to be material to the issue, either by showing an action at issue in a court of competent jurisdiction, and alleging that the testimony was willfully and feloniously false, and was material to the issue, or by setting forth the nature of the issue and the evidence given thereon, so that it may be seen that the testimony on which the perjury is assigned was material as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 82-89; Dec. Dig. § 25.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5305-5310; vol. 8, p. 7751.]

2. PERJURY (§ 11*)—"MATERIAL."

False testimony is "material," so as to be the subject of an assignment for perjury, when it is such as to be substantially important and to have influence on the issues, especially as distinguished from a mere formal requirement, and capable of properly influencing the result of the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-54; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4404.]

3. PERJURY (§ 11*)—NATURE OF EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

That defendant testified falsely before an election board, on an examination of his qualifications as a voter, that he had worked for C. for 20 days last past, when in fact he had not worked for C. at all, was not material to the issue of his residence in the precinct, and was therefore insufficient to sustain an assignment of perjury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-54; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; H. M. Albury, Judge.

Theodore Henry Schweichler was convicted of perjury and appeals. Reversed, with directions to dismiss.

W. T. Belleu, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant was convicted of perjury and sentenced to the penitentiary for the term of two years. The accusation was that, in an investigation before the election board of Princeton precinct, in the county of Colusa, at the general election on November 8, 1910, he testified falsely concerning his qualifications as a voter in said precinct. The portion of the information deemed sufficient for the purpose of discussion is as follows: "That thereupon, at the time and place last aforesaid, the right of the defendant to vote at said election was duly challenged upon the ground that he, the said defendant, had not resided within the said precinct of Princeton the length of time prescribed by law in order that he might be entitled to vote at said election in said precinct. That the board of election of said Princeton precinct then and there having and had competent jurisdiction to hear, decide, and determine said challenge and proceeding, and was then and there fully empowered to administer the law in said challenge and proceeding. That it then and there became and was material to know, in the determination of said challenge, whether or not the said defendant had been a resident of said precinct of Princeton for and during the time required by law to constitute him a qualified elector of said precinct. And said defendant was then and there duly called as a witness in his own behalf upon the trial of said challenge. That thereupon one Vern D. Shaver, a duly appointed, qualified, and acting member of the board of election of said precinct at said election, to wit, an inspector, and an officer authorized by law and competent to administer an oath to the said defendant in said proceeding, did then and there, to wit, on the said 8th day of November, 1910, at and in Princeton precinct, in Colusa county, state of California, administer an oath in due form of law to said defendant, and being so sworn as aforesaid to testify truly, he, the said defendant, did then and there, and in the trial of said challenge, willfully, knowingly, corruptly, falsely, and feloniously swear, take oath, say, and give in evidence among other things in substance as follows: That he, the said Theodore Henry Schweichler, had been working for one Mr. Cockerill for 20 days last past, whereas in truth and in fact as he, the said Theodore Henry Schweichler, then and there well knew he, the said Theodore Henry Schweichler, had not worked for the said Mr. Cockerill at all during any of the 20 days last past."

[1] It thus appears that the whole basis for the charge of perjury is found in the declaration under oath by defendant that "he had been working for 20 days last past for Mr. Cockerill," and the inquiry is easily suggested whether there is in the information a sufficient exposition of the materiality of this testimony to satisfy the statutory definition of the crime. Section 118 of the Penal Code provides that: "Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer or person, in any of the cases in which such an oath may by law be administered, willfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury." It being essential that the false statement shall be material to the issue, this quality must, of course, appear by proper averments in the information or indictment. People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 229, 55 Pac. 992. "In the absence of a statute to the contrary, it is well settled that an indictment for perjury must show conclusively that the testimony given or assertion made by defendant, and charged to be false, was material to the issue on the trial of which he was sworn." 30 Cyc. p. 1433.

[2, 3] It is equally well settled that there are two modes by which the materiality of the alleged false statement may be shown in the information: "(1) By setting forth the nature of the issue and the evidence given thereon, so that as a matter of law it may be said the testimony upon which the perjury is assigned is material to the issue. (2) By showing an action at issue in a court of competent jurisdiction, the testimony given, its willful and felonious falsity, coupled with the averment that it was material to the issue." People v. Ah Bean, 77 Cal. 12, 18 Pac. 815; People v. Von Tiedeman, 120 Cal. 131, 52 Pac. 155. In the information before us there is no averment that the testimony given by appellant was material to the issue. The second above enumerated method is therefore eliminated from consideration, and, in order to uphold the pleading, it must be declared, as a matter of law, that the alleged false testimony was material to the issue. The issue was: Did appellant reside in Princeton precinct for 30 days preceding the 8th day of November, 1910? Must it be said that the testimony was relevant to this issue, and had a legitimate and effective influence on the decision of the question? Materiality is defined by Bouvier as "the property of substantial importance or influence, especially as distinguished from formal requirement. Capability of properly influencing the result of the trial." Whether appellant worked for Mr. Cockerill or some one else, or whether he worked 20 days or not at all, would not aid any tribunal in the least degree in arriving at a conclusion as to whether he was a resident of Princeton precinct. It must not be forgotten, of course, that, to determine the sufficiency of the pleading, we are confined to the testimony set forth. We have no right to assume that Mr. Cockerill resided in Princeton precinct, or any other circumstance known to the election board or developed by appellant's testimony that is not revealed by the information. We might conceive of a situation where it would be probably material, in the determination of the issue of residence, to inquire whether a witness worked for Mr. Cockerill at a certain time. As is well known, it often happens that evidence which, standing alone, would be rejected as entirely immaterial is quite important and material by reason of its connection with other evidence. For instance, when it has a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove any material fact in the chain of evidence, as in the case of People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 436, 66 Pac. 589, 863, where the materiality of the alleged perjured testimony, given upon the trial for larceny, appears from proof that it had a strong tendency to weaken the evidence going to the point of identification of the stolen property, which was a vital point in the case. In other words, it is enough if it be circumstantially material, although not in itself sufficient to establish the issue. 30 Cyc. p. 1419. But nothing of the kind appears in the case at bar. We are limited to the issue set out in the information, and our only inquiry is whether the statement that appellant worked for 20 days prior to the election for Mr. Cockerill—whoever he may be and wherever he may live—has any legal pertinency to the question as to appellant's residence in Princeton precinct. It would have been a simple matter to have alleged other circumstances, if they existed, whereby it could be seen that appellant's declaration had some logical connection with the issue, or it would perhaps have been more satisfactory to have alleged that said testimony was material; but, since neither situation is presented, we feel satisfied it should be held that the information charged no offense, and that the cause should be reversed, with directions to dismiss the information, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. CURRIE. (Cr. 157.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 1, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 210*)—COMPLAINT—VERIFICATION BY DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

The district attorney may swear to the complaint before the magistrate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 419; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 210*) — PRELIMINARY COMPLAINT.

The fairness of a criminal trial is to be determined by what took place at the trial, so that the fact that the district attorney made the complaint before the magistrate did not show that accused did not have a fair trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 419; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

3. RAPE (§ 52*)—PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in a statutory rape case, held to sustain a finding that prosecutrix's child was not begotten on prosecutrix a month before the time of the intercourse fixed by her, as claimed by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The court, in a statutory rape case, charged that if the jury were satisfied that accused had sexual intercourse with prosecutrix about the time alleged, and that she was then under the age of 16 years, and not his wife, they should convict, and that it was no defense that some other person may have had such intercourse, "as that is no defense, nor does it mitigate the offense of the defendant." Held, that the quoted part of the instruction could not have been construed as giving the court's opinion as to accused's guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

5. RAPE (§ 59*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST.

The court, in a statutory rape case, charged that a charge of this nature was particularly difficult to disprove; that no charge could be more easily made, and none more difficult to disprove, since the complaining witness and the defendant were generally the only witnesses, and the jury should be satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that a case was made out by witnesses, and corroborating evidence, if any, before they found accused guilty, if they did so; and further instructed that the law does not require that prosecutrix be supported by another witness or other corroborating circumstances, but does require that her testimony be examined with caution. Held, that it was not reversible error to refuse requested instructions warning the jury of the danger of finding a verdict of guilty upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness; the instructions given being sufficient in that respect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 88-100; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

6. RAPE (§§ 54, 59*)—CORROBORATING EVIDENCE.

Evidence corroborating prosecutrix is not absolutely essential to a conviction, in a statutory rape case, so that requested instructions defining it, or requiring it to be connected with accused, were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 84; Dec. Dig. §§ 54, 59.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

If there was no evidence corroborating prosecutrix, in a statutory rape case, an instruction defining corroborating evidence was not necessary.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 782*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

A requested instruction, in a statutory rape case, that it is a well-established axiom that it is better that many guilty ones escape, than that one innocent man be convicted, was properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Steve Currie was convicted of having sexual intercourse with a female under sixteen years, and he appeals from the order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

See, also, 14 Cal. App. 67, 111 Pac. 108.

L. N. Peter, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was tried on an information accusing him with having unlawful sexual intercourse, on or about the 25th day of February, 1908, with the female named; she then being under the age of 16 years. He was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 16 years and 6 months. Motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant appeals from the order. This is the second appeal of defendant, after having been twice convicted.

[1, 2] 1. Appellant's first point is that the complaint before the magistrate was sworn to by the district attorney "positively, not upon information and belief," and that "no depositions accompanied the filing of the complaint, and, the charge being a felony, the justice had no legal right to issue the warrant of arrest or hold the examination under such a state of facts." It is suggested as "a seeming legal impossibility that he [the district attorney] should know the facts of his own knowledge." There is nothing in the statute which disqualifies the district attorney from swearing to the complaint. The statute does not prescribe who shall make oath to the complaint. The argument that the defendant could not have, and did not have, a fair trial because of the fact that the district attorney made the complaint and afterwards conducted the trial is without merit. His having made the complaint before the magistrate would not indicate necessarily any greater zeal or interest in the case than the subsequent filing of the information. The fairness of the trial is to be judged by what took place at the trial.

[3] 2. It is contended that the story told by the prosecuting witness is inherently improbable. We do not think it necessary to give publicity to her testimony. These salacious narratives of man's brutal instincts add little to our legal literature and should be kept out of the reports, where the points made do not imperatively demand giving the testimony. We cannot say that the undisputed story told by the prosecuting witness, accepted as true by two juries, contains any such improbabilities as at once to import disbelief in them, or to suggest that, in believing them, the jury showed that it acted under passion and prejudice. The prosecuting witness testified that the illicit act complained of happened on the 24th or 25th of February, 1908, and that she had never, either before or after, had sexual intercourse with defendant or any other person. It was in evidence that she gave birth to a child at Sacramento, on October 31, 1908, eight months and three days after February 25, 1908, and the attending physician testified that the child weighed eight pounds. He also testified, in reply to the question whether the child "had passed the full period of gestation," that "it was full nine months." He also testified that, "if it had not been a full nine-months child, there would have been peculiarities about the child or mother to show it was born sooner than provided for;" and that "there were no such appearances." Upon this latter point it was testified by a physician in rebuttal that, if "it had not been a full nine-months child," there would not have been "any peculiarity about the mother or child to show that it was born sooner than provided for." This expert testimony submitted in defense tended to show that the child had been begotten a month prior to the time fixed by the prosecuting witness when the sexual intercourse took place. The rebuttal tended to show that, where the full period of gestation had not been reached, it could not be told, from any peculiarity of the mother or child, that the child "was born sooner than provided for." From this feature of the case we cannot say that the jury were governed by prejudice and passion in rendering their verdict, or that it would warrant a reversal.

[4] 3. Lastly, it is claimed that "the court failed to properly protect the rights of the defendant in the matter of the instructions to the jury." It is contended that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "You are instructed that if you are satisfied from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant had sexual intercourse with one Gladys M. Cooksey, on or about the time alleged in the information, and that the said Gladys M. Cooksey was then under the age of 16 years, and not the wife of the defendant, it is your duty to find him guilty; and it is no defense that some other person may have had such intercourse, as that is no defense, nor does it mitigate the offense of the defendant." It is claimed that it was error to instruct the jury that "it was immaterial whether the prosecuting witness had improper relations with other men or not," and that the court expressed an opinion of defendant's guilt by the instruction, especially in the use of the phrase, "as that is no defense, nor does it mitigate the offense of the defendant." The court instructed the jury fully as to its duty to be guided by the evidence. We cannot see that the court could have been understood by the jury to have intended any opinion of its own as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant by the instruction complained of.

[5] It is urged as error of the court in refusing to give instructions marked 46 and 47, requested by the defendant. These instructions "cautioned and warned the jury of the danger of finding a verdict against the defendant for the crime of rape upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness alone, and unless there are facts and circumstances as shown by the evidence to corroborate it." People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 223, 65 Am. Dec. 506, and other cases, are cited. In the Benson Case, Chief Justice Murray said: "From the days of Lord Hale to the present time, no case has ever gone to the jury upon the sole testimony of the prosecutrix, unsupported by facts and circumstances corroborating it, without the court warning them of the danger of a conviction on such testimony." At the request of the defendant, the court instructed the jury: "That a charge of this nature is particularly difficult for a defendant to clear himself of. No charge can be more easily made, and none more difficult to disprove. From the nature of the case, the complaining witness and the defendant are generally the only witnesses. You should be satisfied to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the case is made out by witnesses and corroborating evidence, if any, before you find the defendant guilty, if you find him guilty." The court refused the requested instruction, "because substantially given in other instructions." The court also instructed the jury: "That the law does not require in this character of case that the prosecuting witness be supported by another witness or other corroborating circumstances, but does require that you examine her testimony with caution." The question is, Should the case be reversed because the court failed to more carefully and distinctly warn the jury of the danger of convicting the defendant on her testimony alone? We think the court went far enough in its cautionary signal to the jury to awaken in their minds the importance of carefully scrutinizing the testimony of the prosecuting witness, especially so, as the court stated the law to be, which defendant does not question, that a conviction could be found on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness.

[6, 7] There were certain instructions requested by defendant and properly refused by the court, because they were directed solely to a definition of corroborating evidence, and that it must be connected with the defendant. As corroborating evidence was not indispensable, it was not error to refuse to define it, or to give instructions that it must be connected with defendant. Besides, defendant claimed that there was no corroborating evidence, which, if true, there was no call for a definition of such evidence. The jury were instructed that the pregnancy of the prosecutrix was not evidence of defendant's guilt. This was in fact the only circumstance that could be claimed as tending in any way to corroborate her.

Other instructions were refused because elsewhere substantially given, in which the record bears out the court.

[8] The only remaining instruction refused, of which complaint is made, was the familiar dictum thus stated, "that it is a well-established axiom that it is better that many guilty ones may escape, than that one innocent man be convicted." Its refusal was not error.

The order is affirmed.

HICKS v. DESMOND, City Clerk.
(Civ. 899.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California, July 31, 1911.)

ELECTIONS (§ 126*)—CITY OFFICER—TRUSTEES —NOMINATION—"REPRESENTS."

Sacramento City Charter, § 8, as amended 1911, provides that the board of trustees shall consist of nine members, one from each ward, who shall be a resident of such ward, a trustee to which ward shall be elected by the qualified voters of the city, and each such elector shall be entitled to vote on the election of each trustee. Primary Election Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 775) § 5, subd. 6, provides that, except in the case of a candidate to a nomination to a judicial office or a school office, nomination papers shall be signed as follows: By not less than 1 per cent. and not more than 2 per cent. of the voters of the party of the candidate seeking nomination within the state or political subdivision thereof in which the candidate seeks nomination. Section 7 of the charter declares that the legislative power of the city is vested in the board of trustees, and that each member of the board shall be a qualified elector at least 25 years of age, shall have been a citizen of the state and an inhabitant of the city three years, and "of the ward which he represents for at least one year next before the day of his election." Held, that the word "represents" was used in section 7, not to define the power or prescribe the duties or limit the territorial authority of a member of the board of trustees, but was employed to declare one of the several qualifications of eligibility of a member of the board; and, since, under the primary election law, candidates to be voted for within the city by the voters at large must be nominated by the voters at large, the charter should be construed as requiring the nominations of trustees by electors belonging to the political party of the candidate residing in the entire city, and not alone by the members of the candidate's political party within the ward from which the trustee is elected.

Application by J. B. Hicks for writ of mandamus against M. J. Desmond, as City Clerk of the City of Sacramento. Demurrer to petition overruled, and application granted.

Hugh B. Bradford and Clinton L. White, for petitioner. J. R. Hughes, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to file the nomination papers of petitioner as a candidate for the office of member of the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento, for the third ward of said city. The respondent has interposed a general demurrer to the petition, and thus the question to be determined is presented.

The single proposition submitted for decision by this proceeding is whether the nomination of a candidate for the office of trustee of said city shall be made only by such electors belonging to the political party of which such candidate is a member as reside within the limits of the ward of which such candidate is a resident, or by all the electors of the entire city that are members of such candidate's political party. This question arises upon conflicting constructions of the meaning and intent of an amendment of section 8 of the charter of the city of Sacramento, which was, at the general municipal election held in said city in the month of November, 1909, submitted to and ratified by the electors of said city and approved by the Legislature of 1911. Said amendment, in so far as it is of interest to this inquiry, reads as follows: "The board of trustees shall consist of nine (9) members, one member from each ward, and he shall be a resident of such ward. The trustee from each ward shall be elected by the qualified voters of the city and each such elector shall be entitled to vote on the election of each trustee."

It will be observed that said amendment, while expressly providing that candidates for the office of trustee shall be voted for by all the voters of the city, makes no specific provision as to the manner in which such candidates shall be nominated by the several political parties. It is therefore, contended by the respondent that nominations for trustee of said city must be made in accordance with the requirements of subdivision 6 of section 5 of the primary act of 1911, and that, under the terms of said subdivision of said section, properly construed, such nominations must be made by wards.

Section 5, subdivision 6, of the primary act of 1911 (Bancroft's Ed. Stats. 1911, p. 775), provides: "Except in the case of a candidate for nomination to a judicial office or a school office, nomination papers shall be signed as follows: By not less than one per centum and not more than two per centum of the voters of the party of the candidate seeking nomination within the state or political subdivision thereof in which said candidate seeks nomination." (Italics ours.)

The argument of respondent is founded on his construction of section 7 of the charter of said city, which reads as follows: "The legislative power of the city of Sacramento shall be vested in a board of trustees, who shall hold office for the term of four years, subject to the exception stated in the next section. Each member of the board of trustees shall be a qualified elector at least twenty-five years of age, and shall have been a citizen of this state, and an inhabitant of the city, for at least three years, and of the ward which he represents for at least one year next before the day of his election."

The contention of the corporation counsel, representing the respondent herein, is that said section of said charter contemplates that a trustee shall be selected to specially represent the ward for which he is elected, and that he represents the city at large only in the discharge of a duty incidental to such office, and that thus it was intended that the boundaries of such ward should mark "the political subdivision of the state in which said candidate seeks nomination." From this construction of said section 7, it is argued that, since that section was a part of the city charter at the times that the amendment of section 8 of said charter was proposed to the voters and ratified by them, it is to be presumed that, in proposing and ratifying said amendment, it was so proposed and ratified with the terms of section 7 in mind, and that, if it was intended that a different rule should be followed in the nomination of a trustee from that contended for by the respondent, "a provision would have been inserted in said section 8, providing that trustees shall be nominated and elected by the electors of the city, instead of being silent upon that matter."

The position of the respondent, it will be noted, is planted largely upon the meaning of the word "represents," as it is employed in section 7 of the charter; but we are of the opinion that he gives the word as so used a different or much more restricted signification than it was intended by the framers of the charter to imply. It appears to our minds quite manifest that to construe section 7 of the charter as respondent understands its meaning the significance of the phrase as used in that section, "and of the ward which he represents," must be held to lie in an intention or a purpose of the framers of the charter to thus fix and limit the duties and official jurisdiction of a member of the board of trustees so that he is thereby intended to be, and in contemplation of said section is, a mere district or ward, rather than a city, official. The section is in our judgment incapable of such a construction.

It appears to us to be very clear, from the language of section 7, that the sole purpose of the provisions thereof is simply to prescribe the qualifications which a citizen must possess to render him eligible to membership of the board of trustees. There is nothing in the language of said section from which it may be implied that there was any intention to thereby prescribe or limit the duties of a member of the board of trustees. The obvious purpose of the framers of the charter in subdividing the municipality into districts or wards, and providing that the members constituting the governing or legislative body of said municipal government should be selected by wards, was to establish a scheme, fashioned after the plan of the legislative districts of the state, by which each portion of the city so divided and designated would thus receive as nearly as might be equal representation in matters of local legislation or regulation. In other words, the sole object in dividing the city into wards for the purpose of selecting members of the legislative body of the municipality was, manifestly, to prevent the happening of the contingency, possible under a scheme by which trustees could be selected, regardless of the location of their voting residences, of the selection of all the members of the board of trustees from one or perhaps two portions of the city, whereby other portions of the city might not have, in practical effect, that special representation in the matters of local legislation essential to the full and complete safeguarding of those interests peculiarly affecting their welfare. It is therefore very clear that the word "represents" in section 7 was used, not for the purpose of defining the power or prescribing the duties or of limiting in any degree the territorial authority of a member of the board of trustees, but, as before suggested, was therein employed solely for the purpose of declaring or defining one of the several qualifications of eligibility to membership of said board; that is, to designate the period of time during which a citizen must have resided within the ward for which he may seek election to the office of trustee before, in that respect, he is eligible to exercise the duties of that office.

Nor do we perceive any merit in the argument that, had it been intended by the amendment of section 8 that candidates for the office of trustee should be nominated by the voters at large of the political parties to which such candidates may, respectively, belong, a provision expressly authorizing such manner of nomination would and should have been inserted in said amendment. At the time of the framing and the ratification of said amendment, it was provided by the general primary election law that "for any officer voted for entirely within one city * * *" the nomination papers should be signed "by at least three per centum of the party vote in at least one-fourth of all the election precincts within the district in which the officer is to be voted for. * * *"

Subdivision D of subdivision 5 of section 5, Primary Election Law (Stats. 1909, p. 695). Thus it will be observed that when the amendment was framed and submitted to and ratified by the voters of the city of Sacramento there was no necessity for inserting in said amendment a provision expressly requiring the nomination for trustee to be made by the voters of the candidate's party in the city at large. The effect of the ratification and approval of the amendment was, by virtue of the provision of the primary act as it then existed, to require the nominations for that office to be made by the voters throughout the entire city. Indeed, at the time the amendment was framed, submitted, and ratified, the incorporation therein of a provision of that character would obviously have been regarded as supererogatory, since the general law of the state upon that subject had itself already provided that, where the candidate was to be voted for within the city by the voters at large, his nomination should likewise be made by the voters at large belonging to the political party to which he belongs; and therefore the silence of the amendment in that regard was doubtless ex industria, and very properly so. It thus becomes very clear, we think, that the purpose of the amendment and the intention of the voters in ratifying the same was to establish the city at large as an election district for each trustee for all the essential purposes of an election to public office under the general laws, by the provisions of which only may a citizen present his aspirations to the voters to serve the public in an official capacity. In other words, in view of the provisions of subdivision D of subdivision 5 of section 5 of the primary election law, as said provisions read prior to their amendment by the Legislature of 1911, it seems to us that no proposition could be farther removed from the realm of disputation than that the purpose in the minds of the framers of the amendment of section 8 of the charter and the scope and effect thereof as it was ratified by the voters were to require a candidate for trustee to not only submit his candidacy as a nominee of his party for such office to the voters of the city at large, but, in order to secure the nomination for that office from the party of which he is a member, to first submit his candidacy for such nomination to those electors of the city at large that belong to or are members of his political party. We find nothing in the primary act, as it was amended by the Legislature of 1911, inconsistent with the construction thus placed upon the amendment of section 8 of said charter. As stated, said amendment, aided by subdivision D of subdivision 5 of section 5 of the act of 1909, fixed the boundaries of the city as the boundaries of the election district for trustee, and such district could not be changed, except by express language, or by language or a scheme so plainly inconsistent therewith as to effect a change by necessary implication. In other words, the provision in the act of 1909 is, in effect, that where the officer is to be voted for within the city—that is, voted for by the voters of the city at large—the nomination must be made by the voters in the city at large belonging to the party of the candidate; while the provision of the later act is merely that the nomination is to be made by the voters belonging to the candidate's party "within the political subdivision in which the candidate seeks nomination." It is therefore to be at once perceived that the provision in the act of 1911 does not, either expressly or by implication, repeal the effect of the former provision which, with the amendment of the charter in question, established the city as the election district for trustee; for the political subdivision (referred to by the provision of the later act) in which the candidate for that position "seeks nomination" is the subdivision which had theretofore been established in the manner suggested. If the provision in the act of 1911 declared that the candidate should secure to his nomination papers the specified number of signatures from the voters of his party within the district or subdivision which he was to be elected to specialty represent, or used other language of like import in that regard, then, obviously, a different proposition would be submitted, for in such case it could perhaps be said to appear reasonably clear that the intention was to change the election district for said office, so far as it concerned the nomination. But no such proposition is presented here, and, as stated, the language of the provision of the act of 1911 cannot, by any rational construction, be held to have changed the election district or the boundaries thereof for the nomination for the office of trustee of said city.

It may with no impropriety be added that, if the construction given the amendment of the charter by respondent is to be adopted, it may readily be seen how the fulfillment of its obvious object could easily be circumvented. It will not, of course, be denied that the ultimate object sought to be attained by the amendment was to give to the voters of the city at large, rather than to confine the exercise of that right to the immeasurably smaller number of voters residing within each of the wards, the privilege of having something to say upon the most important question that can concern the administration of the affairs of a municipal government, viz.: The right to take part in the selection of those officers upon whom is bestowed almost the entire legislative and administrative power of such a government—those officers indeed, constituting the legislative body of the city, to whom is committed the all-important power of levying taxes upon the property of the citizen and of disbursing the public revenues, of adopting or rejecting regulations designed to promote and conserve public morals and public health, and, in short, of exercising a variety of powers directly affecting the personal and property rights of the inhabitants of the community embraced within the municipal jurisdiction. Most certainly it could not be said that the voters of the city at large were vested with the full measure of power in that regard, if the amendment in question may be so construed as to restrict them in the right to express their preferences for trustees to the mere act of voting at the general election for one of the candidates nominated for that office by a small percentage of the voters residing within a ward, since it would still be in the power of the voters of such ward, if they chose to do so, to so manipulate the nominations by the political parties as that individuals would thus be presented to the voters at large as candidates for that office who would not be, by reason of unfitness, in point of both character and ability, the choice of the voters of the city at large. In other words, if the construction of the scope of the amendment as respondent understands it is correct, the voters at large would be compelled to select either the one or the other of two or three nominees, neither of whom possessed the first qualification for the performance of so responsible and important public duties. Thus it is clear that the amendment, if construed in harmony with respondent's contention, might, and perhaps would, in many instances, result in conferring upon the voters of the city at large no greater or better advantages, in respect of the election of trustees, than they enjoyed prior to the adoption of the amendment. Nor, as has been suggested, would it be a reply to this proposition to say that, in the supposititious case, the voters of the city at large could secure relief by casting aside party lines and so proceed to select some capable and trustworthy citizen as a candidate, independently of a political party nomination for the office, or, having that course open to them, that it could, therefore, well be maintained that the object of the amendment in question was not to clothe them with the right to participate in the nominations for trustee. For the policies and principles of our governments in this country, as is and has been immemorably true in other and older countries than this, have always, as a general rule, been worked out and crystallized into practical facts through the instrumentality of political parties which have thus become an essential part of our institutions. Indeed, in this state at the present time, as has been true for many years past, we have a positive or legislative recognition of these political partisan organizations in the laws regulating the methods of conducting primary elections or elections prosecuted within party lines. And most unquestionably it is not in accordance with the intent or the spirit of the primary law, or any local regulation framed in pursuance thereof, to so hamper the rights of electors who, from a conviction of principle, have identified themselves with a political party, as to drive them from their party, in order that they may be permitted to select men of fitness in all respects to represent them in the public service. On the contrary, the central purpose of recent legislation is to give to the voter full opportunity to express himself fully and effectively with regard to the men who shall be selected to stand as the nominees of the political party to whose principles and policies he conceives it to be his duty as a loyal supporter of good government to pledge his allegiance. Besides, common experience justifies the declaration that, as a rule, a majority of the members of a political party are disposed to religiously and often blindly adhere to party lines and so "stick to the ticket," notwithstanding that conditions may, for the sake of good government, imperatively demand an abandonment of party in the selection of public officials. But it is not necessary to further pursue an investigation for reasons, apart from those which are apparent on the face of the amendment in question itself, viewed by the light of the provision of the primary act of 1909 to which we have referred, disclosing that the object of said amendment of section 8 of the charter of Sacramento was to give the voters of that city at large the right to nominate, as well as to elect, trustees. It is, as we have declared, clear to us that such was the object of the amendment, and that it was fully accomplished.

For the reasons stated herein, the demurrer to the petition was heretofore overruled, and the prayer for a writ of mandate granted.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

HOGAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MERCED COUNTY et al. (Civ. 895.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Aug. 8, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 27, 1911.)

1. PROHIBITION (§ 11*)—SCOPE OF WRIT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, defining a writ of prohibition as the counterpart of a writ of mandate, arresting the proceedings of any tribunal, corporation, board, or person, whether exercising ministerial or judicial functions, when such proceedings are without, or in excess of, the jurisdiction of the tribunal, corporation, board, or person, the scope of such writ is limited to a trial of the question of jurisdiction, and cannot be extended to a review of errors of law committed by any tribunal, corporation, board, or person in a proceeding of which such tribunal, etc., had jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—CONVICTION BEFORE JUSTICE—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

Where petitioner was convicted of a misdemeanor before a justice, whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict was reviewable only on appeal to the superior court, as provided by Pen. Code, § 1466, and could not be determined by a writ of prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-19; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—JURISDICTION—REVIEW—INSUFFICIENT COMPLAINT.

Whether the complaint on which petitioner was convicted of a misdemeanor before a justice was insufficient to confer jurisdiction on the justice may be determined on a writ of prohibition to restrain the justice from carrying the sentence imposed, pursuant to such conviction, into effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-56; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 111*)—EXCEPTIONS.

Pen. Code, § 604, provides that every person who maliciously injures or destroys any standing crops, grain, cultivated fruit, or vegetables, "in any case in which a punishment is not prescribed by this Code," is guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that since the exception with which such section concerns itself forms no essential part of the description of the crime defined, but merely deals with the punishment for the crime described, a complaint charging that petitioner did willfully, etc., injure and destroy a standing crop of grain, then the property of complainant, etc., was not fatally defective for failure to negative that the acts complained of constituted other crimes otherwise punishable, it being necessary to negative an exception in a statute only where it expressly exempts from its operation the commission of certain other acts than those mentioned therein, for which a punishment is otherwise or by some other enactment prescribed; and such exception is so incorporated with and becomes a part of the statute as to constitute a part of the definition of the crime.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 304*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—STATUTES.

Pen. Code, § 604, provides that every person who shall maliciously injure or destroy any standing crops, grain, cultivated fruits, or vegetables, in any case for which the punishment is not otherwise prescribed by the Code is guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that the only other section of the Code, apart from section 602, subd. 3, which provides another and different punishment for a similar offense is section 600, which makes it an offense to destroy standing grain or grass by burning.

6. CROPS (§ 1*)—DEFINITION.

The word "crops" includes growing grain or grass.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1755, 1756.]

7. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 111*)—STATUTES—EXCEPTIONS.

Pen. Code, § 602, subd. 3, provides that every person who willfully commits a trespass by either maliciously injuring or severing from the freehold of another anything attached thereto, or the produce thereof, is guilty of a misdemeanor; and section 604 declares that every person who maliciously injures or destroys any standing crops, etc., in any case for which a punishment is not otherwise prescribed by the Code, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that section 602, subd. 3, is distinguished from section 604, in that it prescribes a penalty for a trespass by which the freehold of another is maliciously injured in any of the ways expressly pointed out by such section and subdivision, or by any act within the contemplation of the language thereof, while section 604 is intended to punish the act of injuring or destroying, not the freehold itself, but the crops, grain, etc., growing thereon; and hence a complaint under section 604, charging that defendant did willfully injure and destroy a standing crop of grain, the property of complainant, situated, etc., was not fatally defective for failure to allege that such destruction was not committed by means of trespass to the freehold, and therefore punishable under section 602, subd. 3.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 260*)—MISDEMEANORS—CONVICTION BEFORE JUSTICE—REVIEW BY SUPERIOR COURT—JURISDICTION.

Under Pen. Code, § 1260, authorizing appeals from convictions before a justice to the superior court where, on such an appeal, the superior court was convinced that accused, who had been convicted of a misdemeanor before a justice, had not been accorded a fair trial, and that the sentence imposed was unreasonably severe, it had power to modify the judgment by reducing the sentence to such as would be reasonable and just, or grant a new trial.

Petition by H. H. Hogan for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court in and for Merced County and Hon. E. N. Rector, judge thereof. Demurrer to petition sustained, and alternative writ discharged.

Carroll Cook, for petitioner. F. G. Oslander and H. S. Shaffer, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondents from making any order, other than to reverse or modify the same, in relation to a certain judgment, rendered and entered in a criminal action against the petitioner by the justice's court of township No. 5 of Merced county, and from which an appeal has been taken to and is now pending before the respondent superior court.

The questions presented for discussion and decision are raised by a general demurrer, which has been interposed to the petition by the respondents. The averments of the petition disclose the following facts: On the 17th day of April, 1911, a complaint was filed in the justice's court of township No. 5, in the county of Merced, charging the petitioner with having violated the provisions of section 604 of the Penal Code. Said section reads as follows: "Every person who maliciously injures or destroys any standing crops, grain, cultivated fruits or vegetables, the property of another, in a case for which a punishment is not otherwise prescribed by this Code, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

The complaint upon which the petitioner was tried is in the following language: "That said Howard H. Hogan, on or about the 15th day of April, A. D. 1911, in the said county of Merced, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously injure and destroy standing crop of grain, then and there the property of the said Mary Collier, situated at the southeasterly part of section 5, Tp. 7 S., R. 10 E., in Merced county, California; said land and premises and crop being then and there the property of the said Mary Collier." On the 25th day of April, 1911, the petitioner, having previously been arraigned upon and entered a plea of "not guilty" to the charge thus preferred against him, was put upon his trial upon said complaint, and the jury by whom the facts were tried returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty as charged." Thereupon the justice of the peace, pronouncing judgment against petitioner, sentenced him to a term of six months in the county jail of Merced county.

As seen, the petitioner, in due time, took an appeal to the superior court of Merced county upon a statement of the case settled by the justice of the peace, as required by law. Section 1468, Pen. Code. The appeal subsequently came on for hearing before the respondents, and, after arguments thereon, the same was submitted for decision and taken under advisement. On the 16th day of June, 1911, the respondent, judge of the superior court, without making any order in the premises, filed a written opinion in which he announced that the conclusion at which he had arrived on said appeal was that he had discovered no substantial reason justifying an order, other than one affirming the judgment. Embodied in the petition herein is a portion of the written opinion referred to, and we shall here reproduce the same, not because, in our judgment, it has any bearing on the ultimate question submitted for decision by this court (that of jurisdiction), but solely for the purpose of making some suggestions which, under the circumstances of the case as it is presented here may be offered with no impropriety.

"The court has given this matter particular consideration, for the reason that it appears, very clearly, from the statement that the defendant was not, to say the least, 'in the hands of his friends' in the court below. The sentence of the court that the defendant be imprisoned in the county jail for the term of six months seems unreasonably severe. This is the maximum sentence of imprisonment that could be imposed; and the law contemplates that it shall not be imposed in cases like this, except where express malice clearly appears. The peace and dignity of the people of the state of California would probably not have been considered by the complaining witness to have been invaded by the defendant, and this case would therefore never have had any existence at all, if the defendant had granted her demand for the written agreement to furnish her lands with water. In such circumstances she would probably have accepted, most gladly, the defendant's offer to pay liberally for all damages done to the land and crop in making his repairs. There, I say, the sentence seems unreasonably severe. The peace and dignity of the people of the state of California are not considered when her officers employ the power placed in their hands to satisfy a private grudge of an individual or a neighborhood, however well founded that grudge might be. It will be necessary for this court to affirm the judgment, with the hope, nevertheless, that the judge of the court below may see fit to modify the same until the demands of justice shall be simply fully met, and not leave it so that the malice or revenge of any individual or community shall be satisfied."

The petition further alleges that the statement on appeal in said action to the superior court, which statement, it is averred, sets forth, in narrative form, the testimony given at the trial of said cause, "wholly fails to show that there was any testimony given at said trial tending to establish any of the material facts necessary to a conviction of the defendant as hereinafter set forth," following which allegation is a specific statement of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the conviction.

[1] The sole question which is presented or may be considered in a proceeding upon a writ of prohibition is one of jurisdiction. In the language of our Code (section 1102, Code Civ. Proc.), the office of the writ is to arrest "the proceedings of any tribunal, corporation, board or person, whether exercising functions judicial or ministerial, when such proceedings are without, or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal, corporation, board or person." The general rule is and has always been, so far as we know, to the contrary, that neither this nor any other writ whose sole object is to try the question of jurisdiction can be made to subserve the purposes of a writ of error, or be extended in its corrective scope to the review of errors of law committed by any "tribunal, corporation, board or person," in a proceeding of which such tribunal, etc., has jurisdiction under the law. This rule has been, generally speaking, strictly adhered to, at least in California. In the very recent case of the Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Superior Court, etc., reported in 115 Pac. 1100, decided by this court, the question was, upon prohibition, whether the Postal Telegraph Company, a foreign corporation, was authorized by the law of this state to exercise the power of eminent domain. The contention of the petitioner in that case was that no such right was conferred upon foreign telegraph corporations, and that therefore no complaint could by any possibility be filed in the trial court which could give that tribunal jurisdiction to try a case for the condemnation of property by such a corporation. This court conceived that point to be well made, and so heard the proceeding, holding ultimately, however, that foreign telegraph corporations were, under certain conditions prescribed by the federal government, authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain in California. But the Supreme Court denied a petition for a hearing of the cause by that court after the decision of this court on the sole ground that, notwithstanding "that the capacity of a foreign corporation to exercise the power of eminent domain in this state is purely a question of law, it is (nevertheless) a question as much within the jurisdiction of the superior court as other questions of law arising in similar cases which are held to be reviewable here only on appeal." Manifestly, therefore, we must be prepared to say that the record before us shows that the respondents are without jurisdiction to render any judgment on the appeal, before we would be authorized to make or grant an order restraining them from doing so. We find no warrant for so declaring.

But counsel for the petitioner here strenuously insist that, in proceedings on prohibition, jurisdiction is not the only question which may be considered and determined, but that this court has the power, through the employment of that writ, to prevent the exercise, by an inferior tribunal, etc., of any judicial act contrary to law, and a number of California cases, as well as some from other jurisdictions, are cited as supporting that position; the theory upon which the argument proceeds being that the higher courts, by appropriate original proceedings which may be instituted therein, are thus given the power to exercise the power of general supervision over and control of the proceedings in the subordinate courts, where there is no remedy in the ordinary course of law for the correction of errors committed in such proceedings. In other words, in substantial effect, the argument is that, where an inferior tribunal threatens to do an act which is contrary to law, such act may be prevented by the courts of last resort through the writ of prohibition, without regard to whether the act so threatened affects or concerns the jurisdiction of the court to do the threatened act or not. It is therefore contended that in this proceeding we are at liberty to review the evidence adduced in the justice's court, as the same is narrated in the petition here, for the purpose of determining its evidentiary value, and review and pass upon any and all the alleged errors committed by the justice's court in the trial of the cause.

[2] It is very clear that we cannot accept the theory thus advanced without extending the writ of prohibition far beyond any purpose it is designed to subserve. In the first place, it is to be remarked that the question whether the evidence upon which the jury in the justice's court convicted the petitioner is sufficient to justify the verdict is one which, obviously, cannot be reviewed in a proceeding of this character. That question was one entirely for the jury in the first instance, and if the charge be true that the evidence does not support the finding of the jury then the sole remedy for the correction of the error thus committed lies in an appeal to the superior court. Section 1466, Pen. Code. In other words, it is within the jurisdiction of the jury to return a verdict of guilty, whether the evidence warrants it or not; and equally it is within the jurisdiction of the superior court, on an appeal thereto from a judgment rendered in a criminal action cognizable by the justice's court, to decide whether there exists or does not exist any ground, whether arising upon the evidence or the rulings or the instructions, if any be given, for affirmance, reversal, or modification of such judgment; nor can said court be prevented from exercising such jurisdiction, or, in the exercise thereof, be required to decide the appeal in a particular way.

A distinction must be recognized between those cases, of which Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 Pac. 341, and In re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 526, 34 Pac. 227, 21 L. R. A. 755, 37 Am. St. Rep. 78, are exemplars, wherein the question of jurisdiction rests so essentially upon extrinsic facts that a review thereof is not only necessary, but proper, in order to determine that question, and those cases wherein the determination of the question of jurisdiction rests entirely on the power vested by the Legislature in the courts to perform certain definitely specified acts. In the Bruner Case, the question of the court's jurisdiction to try the petitioner on a certain felony charge arose upon the question of the validity of the indictment upon which it was proposed to put him upon his trial; the validity of said indictment having been challenged on the ground that an elisor had been appointed to summons the grand jury by which the indictment was found and returned; it affirmatively appearing that the sheriff was in no way disqualified from summoning said jury. The question in that case was whether the court had jurisdiction to appoint an elisor for that purpose, in the absence of an affirmative showing that the sheriff was disqualified; and, of course, it was necessary, in order to determine that question, for the court, on prohibition, to ascertain the fact whether the sheriff was or was not so disqualified. In the Shortridge Case, the petitioner had been adjudged guilty of contempt of court for the violation of an order of said court, made in a divorce case, interdicting the publication of the testimony heard in said case. The petitioner, publisher of a daily newspaper at the county seat of the county in which the court proceedings were had, published a report of the testimony in violation of said order. There was no question in either of those cases, nor could there be, but that the court had jurisdiction to appoint an elisor and to punish for contempt, in proper cases. The question in both cases was not, therefore, whether, abstractly speaking, the subordinate courts had jurisdiction to do those things, but whether the facts therein disclosed were such as to authorize or justify those courts in exercising that jurisdiction. The real question, in other words, was whether the courts below had abused their discretion in the exercise of the general power or jurisdiction with which they are invested, or, to state the proposition in another way, whether those courts acted upon facts which could not put their jurisdiction as to such matters in motion. Thus it is to be perceived that the question of jurisdiction in those cases rested essentially upon extrinsic facts, and necessarily the courts issuing the writs therein were required to review and examine those facts for the purpose of determining whether the courts below had acted within or beyond their jurisdiction.

But, in the case at bar, no question can arise, either as to the jurisdiction of the justice's court to try the misdemeanor of which the petitioner has been convicted, or the appellate jurisdiction of the respondent superior court of the class of misdemeanors to which it belongs. Jurisdiction in both instances is definitely prescribed and fixed by the law itself, and therefore obviously no proof of facts extrinsic to the law is essential to warrant its exercise. Hence it is plainly to be discerned that there is a very great distinction, in their nature and purpose, between the facts which it was absolutely essential for the Supreme Court to review and consider in the Bruner and Shortridge Cases and the facts which counsel for petitioner urge upon this court to review. In this case, the facts do not, as they could not, affect the question of jurisdiction, but entirely bear upon and relate to the merits of the case; that is, whether they are or are not sufficient to support the verdict rendered against petitioner in the justice's court. As stated in the beginning, that question is one that cannot be reviewed in a proceeding of this character, even if it were conceded that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, without torturing the office of this writ.

We are now brought to a consideration of the only point to which we attached any importance upon the granting of the order for the alternative writ, viz.: That the complaint upon which petitioner was convicted does not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense under the terms of the section of the Penal Code upon which that pleading was drafted. The contention is that, if the complaint does not state a public offense, the judgment of imprisonment is void, and that therefore the respondents are without jurisdiction to make any order whatsoever on the appeal.

[3] It has been held that a complaint which purports to charge a misdemeanor of which justices' courts have jurisdiction, but which fails to state any offense known to the law, may, upon the conviction of the accused under the averments of such pretended pleading, be declared void on habeas corpus, and the accused discharged from custody. Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 96 Pac. 804. Since unlawful restraint of one's liberty, from which restraint he may be released through the writ of habeas corpus, involves, essentially, the question of jurisdiction, it follows, of course, that where, as here, the relief sought is to prevent the performance of an act which, it is alleged, would be in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, or where, as in the Shortridge Case, supra, such act has already been performed, the writ of prohibition, in the first-mentioned case, and the writ of certiorari, in the last-mentioned case, may be invoked to prevent the doing of or to annul, as the case may be, the act, the validity of which is thus challenged. But we think the complaint, with sufficient clearness, states the offense sought to be thereby charged.

[4] The specific claim of the petitioner is, however, that the complaint does not set forth all the facts essential to a proper description of the crime, as it is defined by section 604 of the Penal Code. That section, it will be remembered, provides that every person who maliciously injures or destroys any standing crops, grain, cultivated fruits, or vegetables, etc., "in any case for which a punishment is not otherwise prescribed by this Code, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The argument is that the complaint, to have stated the offense defined by that section, should have alleged, and thus have shown, that the act charged against the petitioner by the complaint is one "for which a punishment is not otherwise provided" by the Penal Code. To sustain this contention, counsel refer us to the case of the People v. Grinnell, 9 Cal. App. 238, 98 Pac. 681, wherein an indictment, purporting to charge the defendant with the crime denounced by section 288 of the Penal Code, was held fatally defective, in that it did not, by appropriate or any averments, negative the exception prescribed in said section. Said section provides that "any person who shall willfully and lewdly commit any lewd or lascivious act other than the acts constituting other crimes provided for in part two of this Code upon or with the body, or any part or member thereof, of a child under the age of fourteen years, with the intent," etc. The indictment merely alleged that the defendant "did willfully and lewdly commit a lewd and lascivious act upon and with the body of a child under the age of fourteen years, * * * with the intent," etc. It will thus be noticed that the indictment contained no allegation which disclosed that the act charged against the accused was not one of those acts "constituting other crimes provided for" in another designated part of the Penal Code, and, as the language referring to the acts "constituting other crimes" was, essentially, partly descriptive of the crime attempted to be charged, the failure to state in the indictment that the act of the defendant did not come within those acts constituting "other crimes" resulted in a failure to properly describe the crime thus sought to be preferred against the accused, and therefore a failure to state a public offense. The rule in such cases is that, where a statute expressly exempts from its operation the commission of certain other acts than those mentioned therein, for which a punishment is otherwise or by some other enactment prescribed, and such exception "is so incorporated with and becomes a part of such statute as to constitute it a part of the definition of the crime," then the exception must be pleaded, in order to properly describe and state the defense. Ex parte Hornes, 154 Cal. 360, 97 Pac. 891; People v. Grinnell, supra, and cases therein cited.

[5, 6] But it is plainly manifest that the "exception" with which section 604 of the Penal Code concerns itself constitutes no essential part of the description of the crime therein defined. There is nothing in the language of said "exception" or in the substance thereof which can add anything to the language precedently used in describing the act which must be committed to constitute the crime, or in describing the intent which must accompany such act to consummate it. In other words, said language or the proposition it expresses is descriptive in no sense or degree, either of the act or the condition of mind which must be present in the commission thereof. Nor does it describe any act or acts constituting a crime under other enactments which, if perpetrated by the accused, would, as in the case of section 288, have the effect of removing his conduct as charged in the complaint from within the purview of said section. The "exception" merely deals with the matter of the punishment for the crime described by said section. It simply means, in other words, that one who may be convicted of the offense of maliciously injuring or destroying any standing crops, etc., shall, in case there is no other or different punishment specifically prescribed for such act by some other section or sections of the Penal Code, be punished as a misdemeanor by the infliction of the penalty prescribed by section 19 of said Code. And the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that the only other section of the Code, apart from subdivision 3 of section 602, which we shall later examine, which provides another and different punishment for an offense bearing any resemblance to that described by section 604, viz., section 600, provides that the destruction, etc., must be by means of "burning," an element without the averment of which the crime denounced by that section would not be stated, or bring the act of destroying the "standing grain or grass" within the terms and penalty of said section; whereas, in a case under section 604, the injury or destruction may be by any other means than by burning. If the complaint should allege that the growing grain or grass, both of which are included within the word "crops," had been destroyed by means of burning, readily it would appear that the act charged was a felony under section 600 of the Code, and not the misdemeanor defined by section 604 thereof.

[7] It is contended, however, that the "standing crop of grain" alleged in the complaint to have been injured and destroyed by petitioner could have been injured and destroyed by the commission of a trespass under subdivision 3 of section 602 of the Penal Code, and it is therefore insisted that the acts set forth in said complaint constitute a case in which a punishment is otherwise prescribed by said Code; hence, in order to have stated an offense under section 604, the complaint should have contained averments disclosing that the acts of which the petitioner was thereby accused were not the acts referred to in said subdivision of section 602. Said section and subdivision provide: "Every person who willfully commits any trespass by either: * * * 3. Maliciously injuring or severing from the freehold of another anything attached thereto, or the produce thereof, * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor." The foregoing provision is manifestly broader in its scope than section 604, and it may be conceded may include within its purview the act which, maliciously perpetrated, constitutes the crime denounced by the last-mentioned section. But it appears to be very clear that the paramount purpose of subdivision 3 of section 602 is to prescribe a penalty for any trespass by which the freehold of another is maliciously injured in any of the ways expressly pointed out by said section and subdivision thereof, or by any act fairly and reasonably within the contemplation of the language thereof; while the purpose of section 604 is to punish the act of injuring or destroying, not the freehold itself, but the crops, grain, etc., growing thereon. Subdivision 3 of section 602 in other words, clearly comprehends any character of injury to the freehold. For illustration, a malicious injury to a house or other structure attached to the freehold, which would constitute an injury to the freehold itself, or the severing or removal, maliciously, of the earth or soil itself, would be punishable under the terms of said section. In order, then, to bring the act of injuring or destroying "standing crops, grain, cultivated fruits or vegetables," as defined by section 604, within the terms of said subdivision of section 602, it would be necessary to show, by direct averment, that such act was a trespass by which a thing attached to the freehold, or "the produce thereof," was maliciously injured or severed therefrom. It is therefore very plain that there is, as between section 604 and subdivision 3 of section 602 of the Penal Code, so marked a distinction, both in the respective purposes of said sections and the language by which the crimes respectively denounced thereby are defined, that the statement of the one in a complaint in the language of the statute (and in either case the language of the section could be substantially followed in the statement of the crime therein defined) would as readily disclose the section upon which the complaint was founded as would the proper statement of the crime of manslaughter in an information or indictment disclose that murder was not charged. For illustration, if it were intended to charge the act of injuring or destroying standing grain as a trespass under subdivision 3 of section 602, the charging part of the complaint, following the language of that enactment, would read something like the following: "That did then and there willfully and unlawfully commit a trespass upon the freehold of John Doe, as follows, to wit, by then and there maliciously severing from the said freehold of said John Doe certain standing grain, to wit, wheat, then and there standing and growing on and attached to the said freehold of said John Doe, said wheat so standing and growing being then and there the produce thereof." On the other hand, the language of a complaint drawn under section 604, following the language of that section, would not specifically charge a trespass. Indeed, it would be improper to do so, since the crime therein defined is not so designated; but it would be sufficient to merely allege, as the complaint here alleges, that the accused had maliciously injured or destroyed certain standing crops or grain, etc. Thus, it being clear that the crimes under the two sections are materially different, it is manifest that the averments of the complaints under said sections, to properly state the offenses therein defined, must necessarily be different in material particulars; and therefore a judgment of conviction under either section could be pleaded and sustained without the aid of evidence de hors the complaints in any action prosecuted for the same act under the other section. It may, moreover, be stated that the effect of the judgment in either case, so far as the punishment is concerned, would be precisely the same, since the penalty prescribed by both sections is as for a misdemeanor.

We have now considered all the points which we deem essential to notice in the determination of the only question which is involved in a proceeding of the nature of the one presented here, with the result, as is manifest, that we have discovered no ground upon which we would be authorized to interfere with or obstruct the exercise by respondents of a jurisdiction with which the law invests them; but it is not conceived to be improper, under the remarkable circumstances of this case as they are disclosed by the petition, to make some observations which are neither pertinent to the issue presented here nor, consequently, necessary to a decision thereof.

[8] In his written opinion, an excerpt from which is given herein, the learned judge is constrained, from his examination of the record on appeal to the court over which he presides, to denounce the verdict as the result, not of a fair and just consideration of the evidence by the jury, but of a "private grudge" against the petitioner "of an individual or a neighborhood"; that the prosecution would never have been instituted, "if the defendant had granted her [the prosecuting witness] demand for the written agreement to furnish her lands with water;" that, had such agreement been made by petitioner, "she would probably have accepted, most gladly, the defendant's offer to pay liberally for all damages done to the land and crop in making his repairs;" that there was an absence of express malice in the act charged against the petitioner, and that therefore the sentence by which the petitioner must, if he can secure no relief from the consequences thereof, be imprisoned in the county jail for the period of six months, "is unreasonably severe." In short, the irresistible implication from the judge's opinion is that the petitioner was treated outrageously in his trial before the justice's court, and that his trial, conviction, and the sentence thereupon imposed would constitute a more appropriate chapter in the history of the judicial infamies of Lord Chief Justice Jeffries than the record of a trial of a criminal action in an American court. Yet, in the face of all this, the judge has announced that no reason appears from the record on appeal which would justify any other course by the superior court than the making of an order affirming the judgment—a judgment which, according to his view, is "unreasonably severe," and which, if his criticism of the proceedings leading thereto be justified, cannot be the crystallization of that fair and impartial trial to which, under our system, the meanest individual is entitled, but the offspring of malice and revenge.

It is, indeed, difficult to reconcile the opinion of the judge with the action which he declares his court feels constrained to take in the disposition of the appeal. If the verdict of the jury or the sentence imposed upon petitioner, or both, were brought about in the manner as indicated in his written opinion (and we may assume that his criticisms of the trial of petitioner are justified by his examination of the statement or record on appeal), then it is unquestionably the plain duty of the court (a duty, however, the exercise of which is discretionary in the respondent, court, and which, therefore, this court has no power to control) to grant the petitioner a new trial; or, if, notwithstanding the expressions in the judge's opinion as to the character of the trial, the court is in any doubt as to whether a reversal should be ordered and a retrial of the case had, then, if the judgment is, as he so characterizes it, "unreasonably severe," to modify said judgment by making the sentence one that will be reasonable and just—a power vested by section 1260 of the Penal Code in the superior court as the court to which alone appeals may be taken from judgments rendered in criminal cases by justices' courts, and, obviously not, as the judge seems to believe, a power exercisable by justices' courts, which courts lose jurisdiction of criminal cases triable therein the very moment that judgment in such cases is pronounced.

We have thus expressed our convictions as to the duty of the respondents in this case, because we have been greatly impressed with the startling views expressed by the judge with regard to the character of the trial accorded to the petitioner by the justice's court, and, furthermore, because, if said trial was such as it is declared to have been by the judge of the superior court, an appeal to which is the only remedy afforded a citizen convicted of a crime triable in justices' courts, it would be a blot upon the judicial annals of this state, or of any other civilized community where such a trial might take place, to permit its result to remain undisturbed, when there is vested in the appellate court ample power to set it aside, and so give the petitioner an opportunity to be tried according to due process of law. It must be understood, we may repeat, that the foregoing suggestions are ventured upon the assumption tion that the judge's characterization of the trial and sentence of the petitioner is justified by the record on appeal, which, in this proceeding, we are not at liberty to review, except in so far as it or any portion thereof might affect the question of the jurisdiction of respondents.

In accordance with the views herein expressed, the demurrer to the petition will be and it is hereby sustained, and the alternative writ of prohibition discharged.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

C. GANAHL LUMBER CO. et al. v. WEINSVEIG.

PEALER v. SAME. (Civ. 978.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 27, 1911. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 25, 1911.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 132*)—RIGHT TO LIEN—COMPLETION OF BUILDING.

Possession taken by the owner, upon abandonment of the work by the contractor, for the purpose of completing a building, is not the occupation or use contemplated by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that occupation or use of a building by the owner shall be deemed equivalent to a completion thereof for the purpose of filing liens.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 198-201; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 132*)—MATERIALMEN'S LIENS—ABANDONMENT BY ORIGINAL CONTRACTOR—FILING OF CESSATION NOTICE—EFFECT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requires the owner, within 10 days after completion of a building, or within 40 days after cessation of labor upon any unfinished building, to file a notice stating the date the building was completed, or, in case of cessation of labor thereon for 30 days, the actual date of such cessation, and also requires every lien claimant, except the original contractor, at any time after the completion of the building and within 30 days after the filing of the notice of completion or cessation by the owner, to file for record a claim containing a statement of his demand, etc. Held that, where the owner took possession of the building four or five days after the work was abandoned by the original contractor, merely for the purpose of completing the abandoned work and not to occupy and use it, the owner could not, by filing a notice of cessation after the abandonment, deprive claimants of their right to liens for materials furnished, notices of which were properly recorded within the time allowed after completion of the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—DISPOSITION—RENDITION—NECESSITY OF OTHER FINDINGS.

Upon refusal of a judgment denying materialmen's liens because the evidence did not sustain a finding that the owner took possession of the building as completed when the work was abandoned by the original contractor, the appellate court cannot adjudicate a lien to such materialmen; a retrial being necessary to permit findings on the question of the date of completion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Consolidated actions by C. Ganahl Lumber Company and others and by O. F. Pealer against M. Weinsveig to enforce materialmen's liens. From a judgment denying a lien, plaintiffs named appeal. Reversed.

G. C. De Garmo and Wm. T. Blakely, for appellants. J. L. Murphey, A. M. Norton, Percy R. Wilson, J. W. Ballard, Lloyd W. Moultrie, and John H. Foley, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Seven actions brought in the superior court to enforce liens alleged to be then existing in favor of the several plaintiffs against the property of defendant Weinsveig were consolidated, and trial was had in the consolidated action. The trial court determined that several of the lien claimants were entitled to have liens enforced against the property of said defendant, and a large sum of money which was deposited in court by defendant Weinsveig, and which represented the balance due to Reeve, the contractor, was ordered distributed among the successful plaintiffs. The appellants here, three in number, were not allowed to participate in the distribution of this fund, and the court determined that they were not entitled to enforce liens, but that they were entitled to judgment against the contractor only, for the amounts of their several claims. The appeal is from the judgment. So much of the evidence as was thought sufficient to illustrate the errors assigned by appellants is presented in the form of a bill of exceptions.

[1] By the findings of the court, it is shown that a contract was entered into between defendant Reeve, as contractor, and defendant Weinsveig, as owner, for the erection of a three-story frame building on the property owned by said Weinsveig; that this contract and the specifications for the doing of the work were duly recorded in the office of the county recorder, and the contractor proceeded with the erection of the building until December 4, 1907, when he gave notice to the owner that he would not proceed further with his contract and abandoned the same; that the building was not then completed, and that after the 4th day of December, 1907, said Reeve, the contractor, did no work nor caused any to be done upon the building; and that he furnished no further material for use upon the same. The court further finds that on the 10th day of January, 1908, the owner filed in the office of the county recorder a notice in writing, stating that the work on the contract had ceased on the 4th day of December, 1907.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes and that the contractor had abandoned his contract. There is a further finding that, on December 10, 1907, defendant Weinsveig, the owner, took possession of the building and occupied the same, and that he ever since has occupied and used the building. It is found that the allegations of the complaints of the several appellants with respect to the amounts of their claims are correct, and it is found further that notices of lien were filed for record on behalf of the appellants Ganahl Lumber Company and Frick-Fleming Hardware Company on the 2d day of March, 1908, and that a notice of lien on the part of appellant O. F. Pealer was filed on the 20th day of March, 1908. These notices of lien were in due and regular form. The only findings made by the trial court which are attacked by appellants are those numbered 7, 8, 10, 10½, and 12, and it is contended that these findings are not supported by the evidence. No finding was made by the trial court showing when the building was completed. An issue is made by the pleadings, as between the appellants Ganahl Lumber Company and Frick-Fleming Hardware Company and defendant Weinsveig, as to the date upon which the building was completed; but that issue was left undetermined by the court. As between appellant Pealer and defendant Weinsveig, it was alleged by Pealer and admitted by Weinsveig that the building was completed on or about the 7th day of March, 1908, and, further, that notice of completion was recorded by Weinsveig as owner on the 10th day of March, 1908. The notice of lien of appellant Pealer was, as found by the court, filed on March 20, 1908. From the findings it cannot be ascertained as to whether or not the building was ever completed after Reeve abandoned his contract on the 4th of December, 1907. It is said in the briefs of counsel that the trial court determined that appellants here were entitled to no lien because of their failure to record a notice within 30 days after defendant Weinsveig had recorded, on January 10, 1908, a notice stating that work had, on the 4th day of December, 1907, ceased upon the building. If finding 10½, which recites that "on December 10, 1907, the defendant Weinsveig took possession of said building and occupied the same, and ever since said December 10, 1907, has occupied and used said building," was intended, and we think that it bears that interpretation, to determine the date of the completion of the building, then it is a finding material to the issues. There is no evidence in the record, however, tending to support it; on the contrary, the evidence shows that Weinsveig took possession of the building only for the purpose of prosecuting the work as designed to be done under the contract with Reeve. He testified as follows: "There was no stoppage (of the work) for 30 days at any time from the time we started on the premises until I accepted the building. There was only about six days. We started work immediately after it was turned over to us. We started in between five or six days after." It is very evident that the finding of the court refers to the date upon which Weinsveig assumed charge of the work upon the building, but the evidence does not sustain that portion of the finding which recites that the owner, from the 10th day of December, 1907, occupied and used the building. The concluding portion of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that occupation or use of a building by the owner shall be deemed equivalent to a completion thereof; but the occupation and use intended to be described in that section is certainly not the occupation such as would be created by the owner assuming to proceed with the work of constructing an unfinished building, where the contractor had abandoned his contract. There is no evidence shown to the effect that there was any cessation of labor upon the structure for a period of 30 days; the only cessation shown being that which extended over three or four days. There was no such cessation of work, therefore, as would, under the provisions of section 1187, just cited, start the time running for the filing of notices of lien for work done or materials furnished prior to the date of abandonment of the contract by the contractor.

[2] The case of Robison v. Mitchel et al., 114 Pac. 984, is determinative of the proposition that in a case where the facts are as here shown the owner cannot, by the filing of a notice of cessation of labor after abandonment by the contractor of his contract, deprive lien claimants of their right to enforce their liens, notices of which were properly recorded within the time allowed by law after completion of the building. The court in the case cited has given very full consideration to the matter adverted to, and we think that the application of that decision to this case fully settles the point suggested. If the building was completed on the 1st day of March, as alleged by the plaintiffs Ganahl Lumber Company and Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, then the notices of lien filed by these parties on the 2d day of March, 1908, were filed in time. In the Pealer case, under the facts admitted by the pleadings, the date of completion was the 7th day of March, 1908, and the notice of lien recorded on the 20th day of March was filed within 30 days after the building was completed, and in time. As we have before mentioned, the finding of the court that the building was occupied and used by Weinsveig at and subsequent to the 10th day of December, 1907, finds no support in the evidence shown in the bill of exceptions.

[3] We do not think that the other points urged by appellants call for extended notice or discussion. In our opinion, they are without merit. The contract as made between the contractor and owner appears to be regular and valid, and there was no deviation from any of the terms thereof as to the manner of doing the work, or as to the quantity or kind of materials provided to be furnished and used. We cannot adopt the suggestion of counsel for respondent Weinsveig that upon a reversal of the judgment it will be proper to here fix the rights of appellants and provide that they should participate in the fund deposited for the benefit of the lien claimants in the court below. The evidence does not sustain the findings in the particular we have noticed, and therefore other findings must be made, and this can be done only upon a retrial of the action.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; SHAW, J.

16 Cal. App. 637

SPEAR v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (two cases).
(Civ. 842, 844.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 24, 1911. Rehearing Denied Aug. 23, 1911. Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 22, 1911.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where the conductor of a street railway car testified, in an action against the street railway company for personal injuries to plaintiff from a collision, as to the immediate circumstances surrounding the accident, it is not proper cross-examination to ask him how long the motorman had been on the road, and whether he was being educated to the work of a motorman.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931-948; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 113*)—COLLISION—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a street railway company for personal injuries to plaintiff, evidence that the motorman had been but three or four weeks on defendant's road, that it was his first trip on that car, and that he was being educated to the work of a motorman is inadmissible, as relating to the motorman's competency, and not to the issue, which is his negligence at the particular time the injury occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Evidence in an action against a street railway for personal injuries to plaintiff from a collision, that the motorman had been on the road only three or four weeks, that it was his first trip on that car, and that he was being educated to the work of a motorman, if irrelevant, is harmless, in view of other evidence that the motorman had been in the employ of railroads in another state, that he had experience on trolley cars, and that he was employed by the company for three or four months.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4153-4160; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—HEARSAY—CONVERSATIONS WITH THIRD PERSON.

Testimony of a witness, in an action against a street railroad for injuries to the plaintiff from a collision, that the motorman did not turn off the power, and that witness had told the motorman to shut off his power and stop the car is hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1174-1192; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 473*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MATTERS OF FACT OR CONCLUSIONS.

The declaration of a witness, in an action for injuries to plaintiff from a collision with a street car, that the motorman did not turn off the power, shown to be a conclusion of the witness from the speed of the car, is not the expression of an opinion on a matter of expert testimony, but is an inference of fact drawn by the witness from other facts, not involving any special skill, and inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2220-2233; Dec. Dig. § 473.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 231*)—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—GROUNDS OF OBJECTION.

A party objecting to the admission of evidence or a motion to strike out testimony should state the grounds of his objection or motion; otherwise he cannot complain on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1299; Dec. Dig. § 231; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-227.]

7. NEGLIGENCE (§§ 119, 124*)—INJURIES TO TRAVELER—EVIDENCE AS TO NEGLIGENCE OF CODEFENDANT.

Where the complaint, in an action against a street railway company and an express company for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a car and an express wagon, alleges negligence against each of the defendants, the express company, which, by declining to deny negligence on the part of the street railway company, in effect avers it, may introduce evidence as to the street railway company's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Dec. Dig. §§ 119, 124.*]

8. STREET RAILROADS (§ 113*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY—EVIDENCE AS TO ANOTHER TRANSACTION.

Testimony of the driver of an express wagon, in an action against the express company and a street railway company for injuries to plaintiff from a collision between his wagon and a car, as to whether he turned out for a car at a certain street, and whether that car gave him any warning, is inadmissible on the issue as to whether the motorman on another car a short time after, at the place of the accident, was chargeable with negligence in failing to give warning, since it is without relevancy to such issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY VERDICT.

An instruction, in an action against a street railway company and an express company for personal injuries from a collision between a car and an express wagon, that, if the driver of the express wagon was negligent in driving too near the track, but that, if the motorman was aware of the dangerous situation of the express wagon, and had a clear opportunity, by reasonable care, to have avoided the collision, but failed to do so, and plaintiff's injuries were the direct consequence of such failure, verdict should be against the street railway and in favor of the express company, if erroneous, is not prejudicial, in view of a verdict against both defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4230; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

10. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff, while driving a team on the north track, was injured by a collision on the south track, whereby the horses of an express team became frightened and ran into his team, and that the road in front of plaintiff was clear, and that he saw the car coming from the end of the block and might have gotten his team out of the way, and saw it in time to shout to the driver of the express wagon, and to pull his team to one side, the refusal of an instruction as to plaintiff's contributory negligence is error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 217*)—INSTRUCTION AS TO DUTY OF JURY—CAUTION AS TO FAIRNESS.

The refusal of the trial court, in an action against two corporations for personal injuries, to instruct against the undue influence of sympathy, and an exhortation to regard the law with equal favor towards a corporation and an individual, is not prejudicially erroneous, since the trial judge has a large discretion, and is not required to go beyond the essential legal principles involved in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 483, 485; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS—ALREADY GIVEN.

A requested instruction covered by an instruction already given is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

13. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS—RINGING BELL.

In an action against an express company and a street railroad company for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a car and an express wagon, where it might be contended from the evidence that the failure to ring the bell was not negligence, the refusal of an instruction, requested by the street railway company, that it was not the duty of a motorman to ring his bell, except to give the usual signal for starting, and except where his car is about to cross an intersecting street, and that there was no duty to ring his bell midway in the block, and that failure to do so did not of itself constitute negligence, is error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 258-267; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

14. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—ISSUES OR THEORIES OF CASE.

In preparing instructions, each party may assume any reasonable hypothesis in relation to the facts, and ask the court to declare the law as applicable to it; and it is error to refuse, merely because the case supposed does not include some other hypothesis equally rational.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477-479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

15. TRIAL (§ 296*)—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE.

In an action against a street railway company and an express company for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a car and an express wagon, the danger of a misapplication of an instruction, asked by the railway that it was not the duty of a motorman to ring his bell, except at starting, and when about to cross an intersecting street, and that there was no duty to ring the bell midway in the block, and failure to do so did not constitute negligence, is avoided by an instruction, given at the request of the express company, that it is the duty of the motorman to look ahead for any vehicles which may be on or dangerously near the track, and, if he sees such vehicle ahead, to give warning, slow down, and put his car under control, in order to avoid a collision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

16. TRIAL (§ 210*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

A charge that, where any witness has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is the duty of the jury to distrust his entire testimony may be properly given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 490-494, 501; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

17. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY THOSE GIVEN.

Where requested instructions have been substantially covered by instructions given, their refusal is not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

18. TRIAL (§§ 358, 359*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

Though there be apparent inconsistency between some of the special findings and the general verdict, yet if, as a whole, such inconsistency is not necessarily to be implied, the verdict must stand; and, if findings are open to double construction, that construction will be adopted which upholds the general verdict; and, though the general verdict should be set aside, if a special finding is absolutely inconsistent with it, inconsistency of special findings with one another would not necessarily require that a general verdict be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 856-860; Dec. Dig. §§ 358, 359.*]

19. STREET RAILROADS (§ 119*)—FINDINGS OF FACT—INCONSISTENCY.

In an action against an express company and a street railroad company for injuries to plaintiff, who was driving on one of two double tracks, and was injured by the horses of an express wagon becoming frightened and running into his team after the wagon was struck by a car on the other track, the inconsistency between a finding that the express wagon would not have been struck had it not turned to cross the other track, and that the track was clear of obstruction, and a finding as to what the motorman did or did not do, or could have done, after seeing the dangerous position of the wagon, in that, if the wagon was in a dangerous position, the track could not have been clear of obstruction, does not require that a verdict against the street railway company be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

20. TRIAL (§ 366*)—SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES—OBJECTION AND AMENDMENT.

Objection to the form of a special interrogatory should be made at the time the issues are submitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 875-878; Dec. Dig. § 366.*]

21. TRIAL (§ 352*)—INTERROGATORIES—ASSUMING FACTS.

A special interrogatory, submitted in an action against a street railway company and an express company for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a car and an express wagon, as to what the motorman did or did not or could have done after seeing the "dangerous position of the wagon," while assuming the dangerous position of the wagon, is not prejudicial, in that the assumption was one which no one could dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 840-845; Dec. Dig. § 352.*]

22. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1070*)—HARMLESS ERROR — SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES — REQUESTS FOR SPECIAL FINDINGS.

A street railway company, defendant in an action for personal injuries, caused by the collision of its car with the wagon of an express company, also made party defendant, cannot complain that special issues as to its negligence were submitted to the jury at the instance of the express company, rather than at the request of the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1070.*]

23. DAMAGES (§ 185*)—EVIDENCE—EXTENT OF INJURY.

Evidence, in an action for personal injuries, held sufficient to show that the plaintiff's loss of voice was caused by injuries received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

24. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 981*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 99*)—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The ruling of the lower court upon the motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence is largely left to the discretion of the trial judge, and his decision will not be disturbed, except in case of manifest abuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3876; Dec. Dig. § 981; New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 201, 207; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

25. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

A street railway company, moving for a new trial for newly discovered evidence after verdict against it, in an action for personal injuries, caused by a collision of its car with the wagon of an express company, also made party defendant, showed that the filing of the complaint was the first information that it had of the accident, and that, owing to the destruction of its accident records by fire, the name of the motorman was not learned until 16 days before the trial, and he was not located until after the trial, although every effort had been made to do so, and the facts recited in the motorman's affidavit entirely negated any implication of negligence on the part of the railway company. Held that such evidence might affect the result, and a new trial should have been granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 226, 227; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

26. NEGLIGENCE (§ 15*)—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE—JOINT LIABILITY.

Where the joint negligence of two or more persons results in injury to another, and the negligence of each of such persons is a concurring proximate cause of such injury, then each is liable in damages for the injuries so caused by the joint acts of all, irrespective of whether one was more or less negligent than the others, or that his negligence preceded or followed the negligence of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

27. NEGLIGENCE (§ 83*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

Where it is shown that two parties have contributed to an injury to a third, then, notwithstanding the act of one may have been wanton and reckless, and that of the other simply manifesting a want of ordinary care, the doctrine of the last clear chance will not operate in favor of either to relieve him of liability for injuries to the third who was not himself chargeable with contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 115; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

28. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 930*)—PRESUMPTION—VERDICT.

The complaint, in an action for personal injuries, brought against a street railway company and an express company, alleged that the driver of the express company's wagon was negligent in attempting to cross the street railway track without ascertaining whether a car was in proximity to the wagon, and the jury so found, and also found that the express company's wagon would not have been struck by the car, if it had gone in a straight line, without turning out for the plaintiff; and further found that the motorman saw the dangerous situation of the wagon in time to have avoided a collision, but that he did not slow down; but no specific finding was made as to whether the negligence of the driver of the express wagon ended when he turned toward or upon the track. Held that, in the absence of a special finding as to when the negligence of the express driver ended, it would be assumed, in support of a general verdict for plaintiff, that the driver, after turning upon the track, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have turned off again before the collision, and thus have avoided the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3755-3761; Dec. Dig. § 930.*]

29. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 930*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

On appeal from a general verdict for plaintiff, the findings of the jury will be considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3755-3761; Dec. Dig. § 930.*]

30. NEGLIGENCE (§ 83*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INJURY AVOIDABLE.

The negligence of an injured person ceases to be the proximate cause of his injury when another has opportunity to prevent it, and, with knowledge of his exposed situation, negligently refuses to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 115; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

31. STREET RAILROADS (§ 118*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES — INSTRUCTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

An instruction that it is the duty of any person traveling upon a street railroad track, or in such close proximity as to be in danger of being struck by an approaching car, to use ordinary care to ascertain whether a car is approaching, and to get out of its way, is properly given, since the term "ordinary care" is implied, in defining the duty to get out of the car's way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

32. STREET RAILROADS (§ 98*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CROSSING TRACKS.

One going upon a street railroad crossing in a city, where a collision is likely to produce serious injury, without looking in both directions along the street to ascertain whether any cars are approaching, and, if so, their rate of speed and distance from the crossing, would not be in the exercise of that reasonable care which requires the exercise of vigilance proportioned to the danger encountered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 204-209; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

33. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—APPROACHING CARS.

It is not negligence per se for a person to attempt to cross a street railway when a car is approaching.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-257; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

34. STREET RAILROADS (§ 99*)—DRIVERS OF VEHICLES—ASSUMING MOTORMAN'S PERFORMANCE OF DUTY.

A traveler has the right to assume, until his senses, exercised with reasonable diligence, inform him to the contrary, that the persons operating street cars will use ordinary care, give the usual signals, and keep the usual lookout ahead; but where the driver of an express wagon negligently goes upon a street car track in front of an approaching car a reliance upon the motorman's care to avoid collision is no defense to an action by a third person, who was not at fault, for injuries resulting from a collision between the car and the wagon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 209-216; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

35. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a personal injury case is submitted to the jury on erroneous instructions, but there was no evidence which would have sustained a finding in defendant's favor under the view of the law most advantageous to him, the abstract error furnishes no ground for reversing a verdict against the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4225-4230; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Robert Francis Spear, in which, after his death. Mary J. Spear, executrix, was substituted as plaintiff, against the United Railroads of San Francisco and Wells Fargo & Co. Judgment for plaintiff against both defendants, with appeals on separate records by the United Railroads of San Francisco and Wells Fargo & Co. Judgment against the United Railroads of San Francisco reversed, and judgment against Wells Fargo & Company affirmed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, for appellant Wells Fargo & Co. Wm. M. Cannon, A. A. Moore, and Stanley Moore, for appellant United Railroads of San Francisco. Ira S. Lillick, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought by Robert Francis Spear to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of a collision between an east-bound car of said railroad and a wagon of Wells Fargo & Co. going in the same direction, the horses thereby becoming frightened and crashing into the wagon which said Spear was driving in an opposite direction, throwing him to the ground and severely injuring him. A general verdict against both defendants was rendered by a jury. There were also findings upon certain special issues, which were submitted at the request of the defendants. Plaintiff consented to a reduction of $1,500 from the amount of the verdict, in accordance with a conditional order of the trial court, on the motion for a new trial, and thereupon said motion was denied. In the meantime said Robert Francis Spear had died, and his executrix was substituted as plaintiff in the cause.

The following may be stated as embracing the material facts of the case: On April 17, 1906, the said Robert Francis Spear was driving a regular mill wagon on the north side of Bryant street, in San Francisco, in a westerly direction towards Oak Grove avenue, which is a short street midway between Fifth and Sixth streets. The United Railroads owns and operates a double-track line of electric cars on Bryant street, and the south wheels of Spear's wagon were in the center of the two rails of the north track. At the same time, Thomas McCourtney, an employé of Wells Fargo & Co., was driving a second size rack wagon, which is a wagon with slats on top, down Bryant street from Sixth street in an easterly direction. The south wheels of his wagon were between the north rail of the south track and the south rail of the north track, and the north wheels were between the two rails of the north track. The position of the wagon was such that it would not have been struck by a car passing it on the south track. Without either looking or listening for an approaching car, the driver of Wells Fargo & Co.'s wagon changed his course by starting to drive towards and upon the south track as a car was approaching thereon behind said wagon. The track was clear of obstructions until the express wagon changed its course. About the same time that the driver turned towards and upon said south track, the collision occurred between his wagon and the car, causing the injury as aforesaid. Each defendant has appealed on a separate record from the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial, but we deem it advisable to consider in one opinion, the appeals of both defendants. Each defendant seeks to exculpate itself and inculpate the other. In fact, the trial seems largely to have been a contest between the two defendants as to which was liable for the injury; it being conceded by each that a sufficient showing was made against the other to entitle plaintiff to recover.

First, the Appeal of the United Railroads.

Herein it is contended that the court erred: (1) In admitting and in refusing to strike out certain evidence; (2) in giving the jury certain instructions; (3) in refusing certain instructions requested by appellant; (4) in receiving the general verdict in view of the fact that the special findings made by the jury were inconsistent with said general verdict; (5) in submitting certain special issues, designated "c," "d," and "f," to the jury at the request of defendant Wells Fargo

& Co.; and (6) in refusing appellant's motion for a new trial. Concerning these, we express our views in the order in which the points are presented.

Oscar Bargewell, the conductor on the car, was called as a witness by appellant, and in his direct examination he testified as to his recollection of the immediate circumstances surrounding the accident. On cross-examination, after stating that Herman was the name of the motorman, he was asked: "How long had he been on the road?" The question was objected to on the general ground, and also that it was not cross-examination and outside of the issues. The objection was overruled, and the answer received, "About three or four weeks." Over like objections he was permitted to answer quite a number of questions along the same line, and finally he was asked this question: "But as to where he was broken in, or how many days he was broken in, or what runs he made, you only know that from hearsay, don't you?" and he answered: "That is all." Appellant then moved to strike out this testimony "as to that matter, except what occurred when he appeared in the car house." The motion was denied; the court saying: "I cannot strike out the testimony about breaking the man into the duties of the position. What do you want to strike out?" Counsel replied: "His testimony as to the number of runs he had made and the time occupied in breaking him in." The motion was again denied, whereupon counsel for appellant said, "I want to strike out that there was one week of instruction and two weeks of experience," and as to this the motion was thereupon granted.

[1-3] As admitted by appellant, there was thereby much of the objectionable testimony removed from the consideration of the jury, but the following questions and answers remained: "Q. How long had he been on the road? A. About three or four weeks. Q. It was his first trip on that car? A. Yes, sir. Q. During the three weeks that he had worked for the company, was he not being educated to the work of a motorman? A. Yes, sir." It is indisputable that said questions were not within the limits of proper cross-examination, and they should not have been allowed for the additional reason that they concerned the experience and competency of the motorman. The purpose of the interrogatories was, clearly, to impress the jury with the fact of the inexperience and incompetency of the motorman in order that they might more readily reach the conclusion that the accident was due to his negligence. The evidence would naturally have weight with the jury. The effect of the testimony would be the same as though the witness had been allowed to declare that the motorman was without experience and training in the duties of his position. Such evidence is held to have no relevant bearing upon the issue, which is, Was the motorman negligent at the particular time of the occurrence in controversy? The rule is stated in section 65 of Wigmore on Evidence as follows: "A few courts have shown an inclination to admit, exceptionally, the character of a person charged with a negligent act (contributory negligence of a plaintiff) as throwing light on the probability of his having acted carelessly on the occasion in question, provided that the other evidence leaves the matter in great doubt, or that the other evidence is purely circumstantial, or (as sometimes put) that there are no eyewitnesses testifying. The mainstay of this exceptional doctrine seems to have been the obiter suggestion in Tenney v. Tuttle, 1 Allen [Mass.] 185. Such evidence is no doubt likely to be of some probative value in such cases, and under the above limitations is hardly contrary to the ordinary policy of avoiding confusion of issues. As a matter of law, however, the doctrine is maintained in a few jurisdictions only, and has been expressly repudiated in many." The exceptional doctrine has been repudiated in this state. Towle v. Pacific Improvement Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207. In the Towle case the judgment was reversed because the trial court permitted the defendant to introduce evidence that the driver, who was in charge of a team, was a good, first-class driver, careful in handling horses, and that during the four years he had been in the employ of defendant he had never been guilty of any mismanagement or carelessness in the care or conduct of the team. As authority for the decision, the court relied upon the rule as stated in section 407 of Deering on Negligence, as follows: "Whether the act or omission of the defendant is actionable negligence is to be determined by the character of the act or omission, and not by the defendants' character for care and caution. Evidence that the defendant is a careful, prudent, and cautious man, is inadmissible to negative his want of ordinary care. Upon the question of the negligence of the engineer at the time of collision of two trains, evidence of the incapacity of the engineer or of his being subject to fits is immaterial." However, it is stated by the Supreme Court that such evidence is admissible in cases where the utmost care is required, and when the defendant is held liable for injuries resulting from the slightest negligence. It is difficult to see the distinction in principle. If evidence of character or competency is admissible to show the "utmost" care or slight degree of negligence, it would seem to be relevant to the issue of a less degree of care or of greater negligence. The difference is as to the quantum of proof required, and not as to the materiality or relevancy of the evidence. But, in view of the other evidence in the case it does not seem at all probable that the jury were influenced by this objectionable testimony. It appears without contradiction that the motorman was at one time in the employ of railroads in Colorado, that he had experience as a motorman on trolley cars in Philadelphia in 1890, when they were first put in use in that city, and that he was constantly employed by appellant from December, 1905, to the time of the accident. In face of this showing, it would be rather a reflection upon the fairness or intelligence of the jury to hold that the said testimony of the conductor was prejudicially erroneous.

[4, 5] Henry Coffman, a witness called by Wells Fargo & Co., was near the scene of the accident, and, after stating that the car struck the wagon the second time, he was asked: "Whereabouts?" His answer was: "It hit it along about the front wheel, and that knocked Wells Fargo's driver off his seat; and it was shoving the wagon along, and then I jumped out in the street and told the motorman to shut off his power and stop the car." Appellant moved "to strike out what the witness told the motorman." The motion was denied. The witness afterwards stated that "the power was not off then." When asked upon cross-examination: "Then how could you say that the motorman did not turn off the power?" the witness answered: "I do not know, unless it was the rapid rate of speed that he was going at." Being further asked: "So it is a conclusion on your part, is it, from the rapid rate of speed he was going?" he answered: "Yes, sir." The motion was then made "to strike out all of the testimony of the witness showing that the motorman did not turn off the power." The court, after asking this question, "Could that speed have been maintained for that distance if no power was on?" and eliciting the answer, "No, sir," denied the motion. It is clear that what the witness told the motorman was not responsive to the question, and it was manifestly hearsay. The declaration of the witness that the motorman had not turned off the power was undoubtedly not the expression of an opinion on a matter of expert testimony, but it constituted the inference of a fact drawn by the witness from other facts, not involving any special skill or training "in any science, art, or trade," but within the common observation of all men. The proposition is so simple as to need probably the citation of no authority. However, appellant has furnished us two cases to which we may briefly refer. In Alabama, etc., Ry. Co. v. Burgess, 114 Ala. 587, 22 South. 169, in a case involving a railroad accident, it was held that the lower court properly excluded the statement of the witness Cullen, who was a passenger on the train, "that he knew that the brake was put on, because of the sudden stopping of the train after the whistle was blown"; the court stating that this was the mere conclusion of the witness from facts to which he had already testified. The question is set forth with fullness and precision in Sapenfield v. Main St., etc., Ry., 91 Cal. 48, 27

Pac. 590. Therein it is declared that the "general rule is that witnesses must testify to facts, and not to opinions, and that whenever the question to be determined is the result of the common experience of all men of ordinary education, or is the inference from particular facts, the inference is to be drawn by the jury, and not by the witness." It is undoubtedly true that the particular fact to which the foregoing relates was of prime importance to appellant. The jury found that the motorman could have averted the collision, had he used all the means at his command, after discovering the dangerous situation of the express wagon. This special finding was probably the feature of the case that led to the general verdict against the railroad, and the said finding in turn may have been based upon, or at least influenced by, the said testimony as to the failure of the motorman to shut off the power before the collision.

[6] But it is a just rule of practice to require a party making an objection to a question or moving to strike out testimony to state the grounds of his objection or of his motion. This is only fair to the trial judge, and it imposes no hardship upon the complaining party. Without the assistance of counsel, it would be unreasonable to expect the most wise and prudent judge to avoid error in the stress of a hotly contested trial involving complicated questions of law and fact. There was no compliance with this requirement in the instance under review, and therefore we think appellant should not now be heard to complain. In Howland v. Oakland C. St. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983, the general principle is discussed as applied to the objection made to the admissibility of evidence. Therein it is said: "If, however, we were to assume that the question is open to the criticism now urged, we do not think the objection could avail defendant here, for the reason, as claimed by respondent, that it was not taken in the court below. * * * Appellant should have pointed out the particular defect which rendered the question either incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, or wherein it was not a proper hypothetical question, that the objection could have been intelligently ruled upon, and, if necessary or proper, obviated. * * * This is not laying down a merely technical rule. It is one which has its foundation in the proper consideration of what is due to the court and adverse counsel in the trial of a case." Of course, the court may sustain an objection or grant a motion upon any sufficient ground, although not specified by the party in whose favor the ruling is made, but it is not required to do so. In Clark v. Huber, 25 Cal. 599, the principle is stated as follows: "The error alleged here is the exclusion of the defendant's testimony. The respondent is at liberty to suggest any ground that he may choose, to show that the ruling is right, whether advanced in the discussions below or not. If the testimony had been admitted, and Clark had appealed, he would have been required to confine himself to objections specifically taken at the trial and stated in the record. The distinction is between the case of a party seeking to reverse a judgment and that of a party resisting the attempt."

[7] We think appellant is wrong in the contention that "the court erred in permitting the witnesses of the defendant Wells Fargo & Co. to testify as to negligence on the part of the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco." The basis of the claim is two-fold—first, that there is no allegation in the answer of the defendant Wells Fargo & Co. as to negligence on the part of its codefendant, the United Railroads, and, secondly, that, "where two defendants are charged as being concurrently negligent, the negligence of one defendant is no defense to the other." 29 Cyc. 487; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 31. It is true that in the answer of Wells Fargo & Co. there is no affirmative allegation of the negligence of the railroad, but in said answer there is no denial of the averments in the complaint as to the United Railroads' negligence. It should not be held necessary for the company to repeat the allegation which has been made by the plaintiff and which, by declining to deny, Wells Fargo & Co. has in effect averred. Manifestly, concurrent negligence is inconsistent with sole and exclusive negligence. The allegation of the former, however, does not preclude one of the parties, who has denied any negligence on his own part, from introducing evidence having a tendency to show that the accident was due solely to the negligence of the other party. That, no doubt, was the purpose of the testimony of which complaint is made. Without reviewing it, we may say, however, that it rather supports the theory of concurrent negligence; and therefore the latter objection of appellant is without merit. But, regardless of these suggestions, the evidence was within the issues made by the pleadings; it was directly in support of plaintiff's allegations against appellant; and it would be a harsh rule that would demand a reversal of a just judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sole reason that legal evidence was offered by a codefendant, rather than by plaintiff himself.

[8] Thomas McCourtney, the said driver for the express company, on redirect examination, was interrogated as follows: "Q. You turned out for a car between Seventh and Eighth streets. Did that car give you warning?" The court overruled an objection to the question that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not connected with this transaction." The objection, we think, should have been sustained. What was done by another motorman, on another car, at another time, would have no relevancy to the issue whether the motorman on the occasion in controversy here was chargeable with negligence. Respondent does not seriously defend the ruling, but she invokes the doctrine that the admission of irrelevant evidence is not ground for reversal, when it appears to be of slight consequence. Hudson v. Hudson, 129 Cal. 141, 61 Pac. 773; People v. Wynn, 133 Cal. 72, 65 Pac. 126. There is much force, however, in the suggestion of appellant that "the error was prejudicial, as the jury may have inferred from it that the bell was not rung by the motorman of the car which collided with the wagon, because he had heard it when it had been rung on the other occasion. The evidence on this point was conflicting, and the jury, doubtful as to its determination. The jury, after being directed to retire again, returned a finding to special issue 6, to the effect that the bell on the car was not rung prior to the collision with the express wagon." It may be that the judgment should not be reversed for this ruling alone; but we cannot resist the conclusion that the error was a serious one, as it is impossible to determine what may have been its effect upon the minds of the jurors.

[9] Appellant complains of this instruction: "If you should believe from the evidence that the driver of Wells Fargo & Co. was guilty of negligence in driving too near, or upon, the track of the railroad company, but you should also believe from the evidence that the motorman of the car of the railroad company was aware of the dangerous situation of the express wagon, and that the motorman had a clear opportunity, by the exercise of proper care, to have avoided the collision, but negligently failed to do so, and as a direct consequence of such negligence plaintiff was injured, then your verdict, if in favor of plaintiff, should be against the United Railroads of San Francisco alone and in favor of Wells Fargo & Co." The instruction seeks to apply what is familiarly known as the "last clear chance" doctrine, and is admittedly a correct statement of that rule. It is contended, however, that it has no application to a case like this, where two parties are charged with separate and concurrent negligence. The discussion of this question may be deferred till we reach the consideration of the special findings of the jury. It is sufficient to say now that the instruction could not possibly have prejudiced appellant. The only objection to the instruction is, not that it fails to state the law correctly as far as appellant's liability is concerned, or that there was no evidence justifying it, but that the hypothesis assumed does not necessarily exonerate Wells Fargo & Co. from actionable negligence. The answer is, of course, that the jury either disregarded the objectionable portion, or else rejected the whole of the instruction as not pertinent to the facts shown by the evidence. This is demonstrated by their action in finding a verdict against Wells Fargo & Co., as well as against appellant. For like reason we attach no decisive significance to the apparent conflict between this instruction and the direction given by the court in response to an inquisitive juror, as follows: "Q. In case the jurors think from the evidence that both were negligent, but that one was more negligent than the other, how about such a case? The Court: If you should find that the negligence of both parties jointly and concurrently—that is, both together—caused the result, then they would both be liable. If they both assisted by their negligence in producing the result, they would be jointly liable." It is not disputed that the rule is that the jury are bound to accept all the propositions of law as given them by the court for their guidance, and if the instructions on a material point are repugnant and contradictory it is usually impossible for the jury to decide which to follow, and after the verdict it is equally difficult to determine that they were not influenced by the one that was erroneous. Sappenfield v. Main St. Ry., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590. But it will not be denied that this is subject to that other rule which has been denominated "the rule of reason." So viewing it, we think appellant has no cause for complaint as to this point. Conceding that, notwithstanding there is no right of contribution between joint tort-feasors, appellant is concerned in having the jury adopt the theory of a joint liability, rather than find a verdict against the railroad alone, still, considering all the instructions together in the light of the verdict actually rendered, we can see no reason for attaching to this point the importance claimed by appellant.

[10] The court refused to give the following instruction requested by appellant: "I instruct you that when the negligence of the injured party contributes to the injuries complained of the law will afford no redress, and if, therefore, you find in this case that the plaintiff was negligent, and such negligence contributed to the injuries complained of, I instruct you that he cannot recover against either of the defendants. In order to avoid injury to himself, the plaintiff was bound to have exercised reasonable care to avoid the same, and he was bound to use such care and diligence as a reasonable and prudent man would have exercised under like circumstances." It is not denied that this is a correct statement of the rule of contributory negligence, and that this defense was pleaded in appellant's answer; but the court's action is sought to be justified on the ground that there was no evidence whatever that plaintiff failed in any respect to exercise reasonable care and diligence. Of course, if there was any substantial evidence from which the jury might have concluded that the plaintiff was negligent, it was error for the court to refuse the instruction. While we are entirely satisfied that it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and while we may go further and say that the most reasonable view is that he was entirely free from fault, yet we think it must be said that the question is open to candid disputation, and therefore a proper one to submit to the jury. As we have seen, the plaintiff was driving his team up the street on one car track; the express wagon was coming down the street between the two tracks, and as it turned out to pass the plaintiff it was struck by a car from behind. The circumstances shown by the evidence, which seem to point the instruction, are related by appellant as follows: "The plaintiff might have gotten his team out of the way, and thus have avoided the accident. The road in front of him was clear. He saw the car coming from the time it left Sixth street. He saw the express wagon start to cross to the right between 60 and 200 feet away, and said, 'He is going to get it.' He saw the car coming in time to holler to the driver of the express wagon. When he saw Wells Fargo's wagon coming, he pulled to one side. The car hit the wagon 200 feet away from him. He could have turned in between the outside track and the sidewalk. He had passed the junk wagons before he came near Wells Fargo's wagon. He did not think anything was going to happen, and was going along as usual, because he thought he could stop the car quick enough. He did not look for trouble. He tried to get out of the road. The street was clear beyond the junk wagon. The plaintiff did not stop his wagon, nor make any effort to stop it. There is nothing to interfere with the plaintiff going up the north side of the street." It is quite rare that the court should not submit to the jury, under proper instructions, the question of contributory negligence, and we think there was some room here for the application of the doctrine.

[11] We think the refusal of the court to give the proposed instruction containing a caution against the undue influence of sympathy, and an exhortation to regard the law with equal favor towards the corporation and the individual, was not prejudicially erroneous. Such an instruction has been given in many cases, and no one would deny that it embodies a just principle. In Bachert v. Lehigh Coal, etc., Co., 208 Pa. 362, 57 Atl. 765, it is declared: "In the part objected to, the lower judge told the jury that their verdict should be founded in the evidence, and cautioned them not to be influenced by sympathy or prejudice, and in clear and distinct, but emphatic, language, admonished them that a disregard of the instruction might lead to a setting aside of their verdict. * * * It was the right of the judge to give this caution, and in view of the passion and prejudice that grew out of the labor troubles in the anthracite coal regions in 1902, and which existed at the time of the trial, it may be said to have been his duty to charge as he did." But we cannot assume that any such condition existed in the case at bar, and, granting that it was an average jury of American citizens, we are disinclined to hold that they needed any such direction. Many such ethical and didactic suggestions might be made, without impropriety, to the jury, but a wise discretion as to that must be left to the trial judge, who is not required to go beyond the essential legal principles involved in the action.

[12] The proposed instruction as to the manner in which the testimony of witnesses generally should be viewed was sufficiently covered by instruction No. 2, given at the request of plaintiff.

[13-15] Appellant requested the court to give the following instruction: "It is not the duty of a motorman to ring his bell or gong, except to give the usual signal for starting, and except when his car is about to cross an intersecting street. There was therefore no duty imposed upon the motorman to ring his bell or gong between Oak Grove avenue and Fifth street, and if he failed to do so such failure did not of itself constitute negligence." The request was based upon ordinance No. 1380 of the city and county of San Francisco, providing that, "It is not the duty of a motorman to ring his bell or gong, except to give the usual signal for starting, and except when his car is about to cross an intersecting street." The argument is that, in view of this law, it would be negligence per se for the motorman to fail to ring the bell or gong at starting or at a crossing, but not at any other time, in accordance with the principle announced in Schmidt v. St. Louis Ry. Co., 163 Mo. 645, 63 S. W. 834, wherein it is declared: "There is no statute making it the duty of the gripman to sound the gong or bell at the approach of a street crossing, and there is no law making a failure to do so negligence per se. Such failure becomes negligence only when the circumstances render the ringing of the bell necessary, and, if the circumstances are in dispute, whether the occasion is such as calls for the sounding of the bell, it is a question of fact for the jury." There is no doubt that the instruction related to one of the vital points in the case, and, since it might be plausibly contended from some of the evidence that the failure to ring the bell was not negligence, the instruction, we think, should have been given. The rule is as stated in People v. Taylor, 36 Cal. 255, that: "In preparing instructions, each party may assume any reasonable hypothesis in relation to the facts, and ask the court to declare the law as applicable to it, and it is error to refuse, merely because the case supposed does not include some other hypothesis equally rational. * * * Every instruction which correctly declares the law applicable to the case which it supposes, if the case can be rationally inferred from the testimony, should be given." The danger of a misapplication of said instruction by the jury was avoided by instruction No. 13, given at the request of Wells Fargo & Co., that: "It is the duty of the motorman to look ahead for any vehicles which may be on or dangerously near the track over which his car is passing, and, if he observes such vehicle ahead, to give warning, slow down, and put his car under control, in order to avoid a collision." The two instructions would have fairly presented the law and left it to the jury to determine whether the circumstances were such as to require the ringing of the bell, notwithstanding that the failure to do so is not necessarily proof of negligence.

[16] The court might well have given the requested instruction: "If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire testimony." People v. Stevens, 141 Cal. 492, 75 Pac. 62. But, if a juror believed that any witness had so sworn, such juror would not be like the average man if he did not "distrust his entire testimony," without any direction from the court to that effect.

[17] Certain other instructions, hypothetical in character and covering appellant's theory of the facts, were also requested and refused. It cannot be said that they are inconsistent with every rational inference from the evidence, but we think they were substantially covered by the instructions which were given by the court.

[18] There is no inconsistency, in our opinion, between the special findings and the general verdict. The phraseology of some of the questions submitted to the jury is open to criticism, but we can see therein no prejudicial error. The rule is as stated in Antonian v. Southern Pacific Co., 9 Cal. App. 731, 100 Pac. 877, that the court should not strain the language of a finding to make out a case of conflict. "The findings should be reconciled if it can reasonably be done, and be so construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat—i. e., that the end may be promoted, rather than destroyed." Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 137, says: "Though there be apparent inconsistency between some of the special findings and the general verdict, yet, if, taking the findings as a whole, such inconsistency is not necessarily to be implied, the verdict must stand. Obscurities and apparent inconsistencies are to be given weight in favor of rather than against the general verdict. If the findings are open to double construction, that construction will be adopted which upholds the general verdict. A general verdict upon issues and evidence properly submitted is presumed to have decided every fact or deduction therefrom essential to support it; while a special finding must be limited and controlled by its specific terms." The argument of appellant is addressed largely to the consideration of the inconsistency of the special findings with one another. Conceding the soundness of the contention, it would not necessarily follow that the general verdict should be set aside. This would ensue if a special finding is absolutely inconsistent and irreconcilable with the general verdict; but this might not be the case, although two special findings were inconsistent with each other, since one or both might be immaterial or concerning a probative matter. We think the most that can be said is that some obscurity has resulted from the special findings.

[19] The principal objection is that the finding of the jury that the wagon would not have been struck if it had not turned, and that the track was clear of obstruction, are inconsistent with "special issues, c, d, and f, as to what the motorman did or did not or could have done after seeing the 'dangerous position' of the wagon, because, if the wagon would not have been struck, and if the track was clear of obstructions, then the position of the wagon could not have been dangerous." The point is that a wagon in a dangerous position is an obstruction. 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 763. The inconsistency is more apparent than real. Applying the foregoing principles, we must hold that the question, "Did the motorman running the car of the defendant United Railroads see the dangerous position of the defendant Wells Fargo & Co.'s wagon in time to have slowed down his car and avoided a collision?" refers to the position of the wagon after the driver had turned to cross the track. It is not disputed that it was then in a dangerous position, and an obstruction to the free passage of the car.

[20, 21] It is also claimed that the foregoing special issue, designated "c," "assumes as a fact that the wagon was in a position which was dangerous, and such that the car could have been slowed down and the collision avoided, had it been seen by the motorman in time." This goes to the form of the interrogatory, and the objection should have been made at the time the issues were submitted. Besides, while it does assume that the wagon was in a dangerous position, it is not prejudicial to assume what no one can dispute. While the question is somewhat complex, it left to the jury to determine whether the motorman actually saw the dangerous position of the wagon, and whether, after seeing it, he could have avoided the collision.

[22] We think it too clear for argument that appellant has no cause for complaint that the said special issues were submitted to the jury at the instance of Wells Fargo & Co., rather than on the request of plaintiff.

[23] We think there is no merit in the contention that a new trial should have been granted for the reason "that the evidence was insufficient to show that the plaintiff's loss of voice was a result of the injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant

United Railroads." As pointed out by respondent, Dr. Barbat testified that "Mr. Spear contracted bronchitis as a direct result of the accident, and lost his voice as a direct result of the bronchitis," and Dr. Toner testified that "the injuries sustained by the plaintiff resulted in his present loss of voice." And while, as to the negligence of appellant, the case is a close one, we think it cannot be said that there is an entire absence of evidence in any respect to support the verdict.

[24, 25] The ruling of a lower court, it may be observed, upon the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence is very rarely interfered with by an appellate tribunal. The matter is largely left to the discretion of the trial judge, he being the judge of the value and effect of the evidence; and the rule is not to interfere with his decision, except in case of manifest abuse. It must be admitted, though, that appellant here made an exceptionally strong showing upon this ground, and it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the motion should have been granted. Harry Herman, who was the motorman at the time of the collision, was not present at the trial. In the language of appellant, "There can be no question of the sufficiency of the showing as to why this witness was not produced. All of the accident records of the United Railroads were destroyed in the fire [the great fire of April 18, 1906]. The filing of the complaint was the first information that the defendant United Railroads had of the accident. The names of the conductor and motorman were not learned until 16 days before the trial, and the motorman was not located until after the trial, although every effort had been made to ascertain these facts. The whole of the plaintiff's case, as far as this defendant is concerned, consists of the testimony of various witnesses as to the acts and failure to act of the motorman. The testimony of the motorman as to these facts, although cumulative, is nevertheless of so overwhelming a character, as to render a different result probable, not so much because of the testimony itself, but because it would be the testimony of the actor, and therefore of infinitely greater probative value." Of course, it harmonizes with common observation and experience that "probability of a higher degree of attention and interest gives rise to a presumption of considerable force that a person's recollection of his act and of attendant circumstances is more definite and trustworthy than another person's recollection of it, especially if it was an act done in the performance of a duty, or if the other person's testimony is little more than an expression of opinion or judgment." Moore on Facts, § 783. Ordinarily the court is justified in looking with suspicion upon newly discovered evidence, but this case seems to be out of the ordinary. The facts recited in Herman's affidavit entirely negative any implication of negligence on the part of appellant, and, while a jury might not give full faith to his testimony, it appears just that appellant should have the privilege of affording them the opportunity to do so.

Wells Fargo & Co.'s Appeal.

The point to which appellant Wells Fargo & Co. devotes most attention, and upon which it seems largely to rely for a reversal, is that the company was entitled to judgment on the special findings. The principle invoked is stated by the Supreme Court of Kansas in Colwell v. Parker, 81 Kan. 295, 105 Pac. 524, as follows: "In an action for negligence, where the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff, and special findings, including the finding that the defendant was negligent, and another finding that the direct cause of the plaintiff's injuries was the negligence of another, from which it is apparent that the negligence of the defendant was wholly unrelated to the direct, proximate cause of the injury, the defendant is entitled to a judgment on the findings notwithstanding the general verdict." In accordance with this principle, it is the contention of appellant that the special findings returned by the jury here show conclusively "that the negligence of the United Railroads of San Francisco was the sole proximate cause of the collision and of the injuries which resulted therefrom, and that the negligence, if any, of Wells Fargo & Co. was not a proximate cause, sole or concurring, of the collision, but was a prior and remote cause thereof, which did nothing more than furnish the condition or give rise to the occasion by which the collision and the resulting injuries were made possible."

[26] It is admitted, however, that, "where the joint negligence of two or more persons results in injury to another, and the negligence of each of such persons is a concurring proximate cause of such injury, then each is liable in damages for the injuries so caused by the joints acts of all, irrespective of whether one of the defendants was more or less negligent than the others, or that his negligence preceded or followed the negligence of his codefendant." It is claimed, though, that the verdict should be against the railroad alone, in view of the following considerations: The express company's negligence, as alleged in the complaint, consisted in the attempt made by the driver of its wagon "to cross said track without stopping, looking, or ascertaining whether or not a car of defendant United Railroads was in close or other proximity to it." As to this, two questions were submitted to the jury, to each of which the answer was, "No." These are the questions: "Did the driver of the express wagon look or listen for the approach of the car before starting to drive toward or across the tracks on which the car was approaching (if he did start so to do)?" and "Would the wagon of defendant Wells Fargo & Co. have been struck by the car of the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco if said wagon had kept on going in a straight line, without turning out for plaintiff?" Whereas the acts of negligence of the other defendant, which were covered by the complaint, are seen in the findings of the jury, which, to some extent, we have already noticed, to the effect that the motorman saw the dangerous situation of the wagon in time to have slowed down his car and have avoided the collision, and that he did not slow down or use the means in his power, whereby he could have averted the accident. The argument is therefore made that not only was the negligence of the railroad last in point of time, but that it was the proximate, and consequently the sole, cause of the injury. It amounts substantially to a contention, as already stated, for the application of what has not been inaptly called "the last clear chance" doctrine.

[27] But, strictly considered, this doctrine can be invoked only in favor of the person who is injured. It implies "contributory" negligence on his part, and generally speaking, is operative in those cases where, notwithstanding his want of ordinary care, another wantonly or with knowledge of his danger carelessly or recklessly injures the one who is in jeopardy. Under those circumstances, the one so acting is held to be liable, although the other has carelessly placed himself in a position of danger. The law is just and humane, and will not tolerate the principle that the mere carelessness of one shall excuse or justify the wantonness or criminal recklessness of another, which causes injury. But the case is quite different when the question arises between two parties who are jointly charged with negligence. In such case, it is only necessary to show that both contributed to the injury, notwithstanding the act of one may have been wanton and reckless and that of the other simply manifesting the want of ordinary caution. This question was involved in Cordiner v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 5 Cal. App. 401, 91 Pac. 436, and therein it is said: "Appellant seeks to apply the well-established principle that 'he who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, by the exercise of proper care to avoid injuring another, must do so.' Esrey v. Southern Pacific Co., 103 Cal. 541 [37 Pac. 500]. This rule is only applicable to cases where the defense is based upon the contributory negligence of plaintiff, due to his want of care in placing himself in a position of danger, and where he may, notwithstanding his negligence, recover from a defendant, who, by the exercise of proper care, could have avoided the injury. We are unable to perceive why this rule should apply to plaintiff, who was in no way chargeable, by imputation or otherwise, with negligence; nor are we referred to any authority which supports the proposition. Indeed, all the authorities recognize the right of recovery against either or both of the defendants whose concurring acts of negligence united in producing the injury. 1 Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, p. 122; 1 Thompson on Negligence, p. 75; Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213 [58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171]; Tompkins v. Clay St. Ry. Co., 66 Cal. 163 [4 Pac. 1165]; Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87."

[28] But, aside from the foregoing somewhat technical consideration, it is apparent that appellant's contention should not prevail. As suggested by respondent, the jury made no special finding upon the question as to whether or not the negligence of the driver of the express wagon ended or culminated when he turned toward or upon the track. As there is no special finding upon the question, it must be assumed, in support of the general verdict, that said driver, after turning upon the track, in the exercise of ordinary care, could have turned off again before the collision, and thus have avoided the injury.

[29] Indeed, viewing the findings of the jury and the evidence in the record, as we must, in the light most favorable to respondent, the conclusion is irresistible that appellant's negligence was a proximate, concurring, if not the sole proximate, cause of the injury. It thus appears that said negligence continued till the time of the injury, and had it not been for this negligence the accident would not have happened. In other words, it was an active, continuous, contributing cause, and therefore at least a necessary element of the proximate cause of the injury. We are at a loss to understand what element is lacking to render appellant liable. In reference to this point, we agree with the views of Hon. John Hunt, the trial judge, who, in his opinion denying the motion to enter judgment for appellant, said: "Now the injury suffered by plaintiff was not self-inflicted; it resulted either from the negligence of the defendant the express company or from the negligence of the defendant the railroad company, or from the negligence of both. Under such conditions it cannot be that an innocent party injured in consequence of such negligence, is remediless. In this case it is admitted that the car struck the wagon, and that the wagon, in consequence of the impact, struck the plaintiff's wagon, and that the plaintiff was thereby injured. These acts of negligence may be said to have been concurrent and simultaneous in point of time, although neither of those acts, standing alone, would have occasioned the result. If the wagon of the express company had not been driven upon the railroad track, it would not have been struck, and the plaintiff would not have been injured. If the motorman on the car had not been negligent, the collision would not have ensued, and the plaintiff would not have been injured. It was the combination of the negligent acts of the two defendants that occasioned the result; and therefore inquiry is immaterial into the precise degree or extent of the negligence of each of the parties defendant, or, the relation, in point of time, of such acts of negligence, or whether they were concurrent or successive, independent or joint, or whether one proximately contributed to the result more than the other. The rule of law upon this subject is well expressed in the Slater Case, 64 N. Y. 138, where it was said, although the act of each defendant alone might not have caused the injury, there is no good reason why each should not be liable for the damage caused by the different acts of all. In the Pastene Case, 49 Cal. 87, lumber had been negligently piled by defendants' servants. The driver of a wagon, who was a stranger to the defendants, negligently drove his horse against the lumber pile, causing it to fall and injure the plaintiff. The negligent act of the defendants' servants in that case in piling the lumber, and the negligent act of the driver in colliding with it, were in point of time and relation, separate, and not interdependent, acts, and yet the court held that the negligent act of piling the lumber was, in effect, a concurring cause in producing the result, and the defendants were accordingly held, although, in point of time at least, the negligence of the driver might be claimed to have been the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. In the Turntable Case, 91 Cal. 296 [27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186], and in other cases, the Pastene Case has been cited as authority. Under the ruling in the Pastene Case, the negligent act of the driver, in driving upon and along the railroad track, continued down to and at the time when the car collided with it, and thus the negligence of the defendants was joint and concurrent, and for the consequences thereof both defendants are responsible. In Thompson on Negligence, § 75, it is said, 'If the concurrent or successive negligence of two persons combined result in an injury to a third person, he may recover of either or both, and neither can interpose the defense that the prior or concurrent negligence of the other contributed to the injury,' and in support of that doctrine the author cites a number of authorities."

In Forsyth v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 149 Cal. 572, 87 Pac. 26, in an action for damages caused to a passenger on a street car by a collision between the car and a heavy wagon, wherein the contention was made by the railroad company that the negligence of the driver of the wagon was the proximate cause of the injury, the Supreme Court said: "But the deceased was not guilty of any contributory negligence, and if the negligence of the railway company was a cause of the damage it has no defense to this present action in the fact that the negligence of the storage company also contributed to that damage. This appellant must show that it was not guilty of any negligence which, in whole or in part, caused the injury."

[30] But the principle is too well settled to require the citation of other authorities. We cannot undertake to review the cases cited by appellant, but most, if not all of them, involved the question whether the contributory negligence of the injured party or the subsequent negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury, and a not unreasonable tendency is manifested to hold liable the party who was chargeable with the later and grosser negligence. It is apparent that in many of the cases cited the terms "proximate cause" and "contributory negligence" are not used with precision, and the grounds of some of the decisions are open to serious controversy; but, in general, they illustrate the "last chance doctrine," and hold, as stated in Indianapolis St. Ry. Co. v. Schmidt, 35 Ind. App. 202, 71 N. E. 663: "That the negligence of the plaintiff ceases to be the proximate cause of the injury when the defendant has opportunity to prevent it, and, with knowledge of the exposed condition of the plaintiff, negligently refuses to do so."

[31, 32] Appellant complains of the following instruction, given at the request of the United Railroads: "It is the duty of any person traveling upon or partly upon a street railroad track, or in such close proximity to it as to be in danger of being struck by an approaching car, even though proceeding in the same direction of the car, to use ordinary care to ascertain whether a car is approaching, and to get out of the way of said car." The latter portion of the instruction is somewhat subject to criticism, but the phrase "ordinary care" is implied, and the jury could have understood the instruction only as meaning that it is the duty of a person, under the circumstances mentioned, "to use ordinary care to ascertain whether a car is approaching, and to use ordinary care to get out of the way of said car." Even if we were to concede that this states the rule too favorably to the railroad company, if the action had been brought against it by Wells Fargo & Co., still it is not too exacting in favor of a third party, who is injured by the failure of the driver to observe it, and it is a correct general statement of the law. In Barker v. Savage, 45 N. Y. 191, 6 Am. Rep. 66, it is said: "Reasonable care requires, in all cases, the exercise of vigilance proportioned to the danger encountered. To enter upon a street crossing in a city where the moving vehicles are numerous, and a collision with them likely to produce serious injury, without looking in both directions along the street to ascertain whether any are approaching, and, if so, their rate of speed, and how far from the crossing, would not only be the omission of reasonable care for his own safety, but an act of rashness." There is no substantial difference between this instruction and the rule as stated in Holmes v. South Pacific Coast Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 161, 31 Pac.

834; Bailey v. Market St. Cable Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 320, 42 Pac. 914, and Hamlin v. Pacific Electric R. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 89 Pac. 1109.

[33] The jury could not have understood the language as importing an exclusive right in the railroad company to the use of the track. Any such implication was obviated by instruction No. 31, which we have already considered. It may be said, also, as to the latter part of the instruction complained of, that it necessarily follows from the rule requiring the person "to use ordinary care to ascertain whether a car is approaching." The only purpose of exercising this care is that he may be in a position to "use ordinary care" to avoid a collision; in other words, "to get out of the way of the car." The cases cited by appellant (Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 278, 55 Pac. 908; Campbell v. Los Angeles Traction Company, 137 Cal. 567, 70 Pac. 624; and Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 611, 93 Pac. 677) simply hold that it is not negligence per se for a person to attempt to cross a street railway when a car is approaching—a proposition which no one should dispute. Otherwise, as stated in one of the cases, "he could never attempt to cross such a track in the crowded parts of a city, where there is practically always an approaching car."

[34] The court did not err in omitting from one of the instructions requested by appellant the following clause, "and the driver of Wells Fargo's wagon had a right to assume that this would be done [that is, that the motorman would give warning and slow down] at the time of the accident complained of, if a car should approach him from behind. If there were obstructions on the right-hand or south side of the street at the time mentioned, or if that portion of the street was full of chuckholes, the driver had the right to take the middle or northerly side of the street, in order to have a clear way." It cannot be the law, because it is not reasonable that one's negligence, whereby another is injured, is excusable because the former assumed that a third party would do his duty. One, without fault himself, can recover for injury caused by the negligence of another, whether or not the latter mistakenly assumed that a third party would exercise proper care. Indeed, in the Scott Case, cited by appellant, it is said: "He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. * * * The rule should be that the traveler has the right to assume, until his senses, exercised with reasonable diligence, inform him to the contrary, that the persons operating street cars will use ordinary care, give the usual signals, and keep the usual lookout ahead." As to the latter portion of the instruction, it is sufficient to say that it was properly rejected, because it did not fit the evidence. Considering the instructions as a whole, we are satisfied that appellant has no just cause to complain. They certainly stated the law as favorably to the express company as it had a right to demand, and, altogether, they gave to the jury a fair and just notion of the law upon the points discussed. Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Company, 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407.

[35] Finally, there is another consideration which seems a complete answer to nearly, if not to all, of appellant's contentions. The bill of exceptions of the express company purports only to give "all the evidence introduced at the trial tending in any way to support or justify the verdict of the jury in the particulars hereinafter specified by defendant Wells Fargo & Co. as the particulars in which said verdict was not justified by the evidence." When we turn to those particulars, we find they all relate to the capacity of plaintiff to earn money, his employment, the extent of his injury, and the amount to which he has been damaged, while all the alleged errors which are argued in the brief relate to the subject of negligence. What is the result? Simply, that we must assume that the evidence was such that the errors, if any, were without prejudice, for it surely cannot be said that any of them would be prejudicial under any conceivable state of facts within the issues. Furthermore, if necessary to support the judgment, we should assume that the case was tried upon the theory that such evidence was within the issues. At most, then we would have a case of abstract error, and what was said in Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra, in reference to an erroneous instruction, would apply here to all the points made by appellant: "He was therefore not harmed by the action of the court in submitting this question to the jury on erroneous instructions, since there was no evidence which would have sustained a finding in his favor under the view of the law most advantageous to him. Under these circumstances, error in the instructions furnishes no ground for reversal. Green v. Ophir, etc., Co., 45 Cal. 522; In re Briswalter [72 Cal. 107, 13 Pac. 164; Hughes v. Wheeler] 76 Cal. 230 [18 Pac. 369]; Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376 [53 Pac. 821]."

We have thus devoted much time and space to the various contentions of the parties. We deemed it proper to do so, as they are important, and they have been argued exhaustively and with apparent sincerity by learned counsel, and in view of the contingency of a new trial.

We have no doubt that the judgment and order should be reversed as to the United Railroads and affirmed as to Wells Fargo & Co., and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Robert Thompson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Greely, T. I. Fitzpatrick, and Robert Ferral, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant, charged with murder, was tried and found guilty of murder in the second degree. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

The defendant relies on four points for a reversal of the judgment.

[1] 1. It is admitted that Marie Messerschmidt, on whose testimony the actual commission of the offense was established, was an accomplice; and defendant contends that her testimony was not corroborated as to some of the material elements of the crime. But the rule does not require, as seems to be thought by defendant, that the accomplice shall be corroborated in all the essential elements of the offense. On the contrary, it is sufficient if the corroborating evidence, considered by itself, tends in some way to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. In People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 205, 84 Pac. 364, 368, Mr. Justice McLaughlin, considering the same question, said: "While corroborating evidence must create more than a mere suspicion, it is not required that it be absolutely convincing. Nor need it extend to every fact and detail covered by the statements of the accomplice. It is sufficient if, standing alone, it tends to connect the defendant with the crime." In People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 178, 106 Pac. 1103, Mr. Justice Cooper, commenting on the rule declared by section 1111 of the Penal Code, said: "The actual commission of the offense may be established by the evidence of the accomplice; but the law, in order to protect innocent men from being convicted, provides that the evidence of the accomplice alone shall not be sufficient to justify a conviction, but that there must be other independent evidence which 'tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense.' The evidence, outside of that of the accomplice, need not be sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant, but it must in some way tend to implicate the defendant and connect him with the transaction and with the crime." In another case it is said: "It (the corroborating evidence) 'need not be strong; it is sufficient if it tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, though, if it stood alone, it would be entitled to but little weight.' Nor need it extend to every fact and detail covered by the statements of the accomplice." Eppinger v. Kendrick, 114 Cal. 620, 46 Pac. 613.

[2] In the case at bar we have facts and circumstances in abundance corroborating the accomplice and connecting the defendant with the commission of the offense. The testimony of the accomplice, Marie Messerschmidt, a nurse, showed that the defendant, at San Francisco, on April 9 and 10, 1910, performed a criminal abortion on one Eva Swan; that Eva Swan remained at the home and office of the defendant, under the joint care of the witness and the defendant, until the 21st of that month, when, as the result of the operation, she died; whereupon the defendant placed her dead body in a trunk, and on the evening of the 21st he and one Willie Saack hired an expressman, with whose aid they removed the body to a vacant house at No. 350 Eureka street, in San Francisco, and after two nights' work succeeded in burying the body under the floor of the basement of the vacant house, which had been rented for that purpose. Previous to this the defendant had shown the witness a bottle of acid, which he said he was going to pour over the dead woman's face, so that she could not be identified. This witness further testified that in the month of May she and the defendant went to Highland Springs, where, a few days after their arrival, the defendant was visited by two men from San Francisco, who, the defendant told her, had learned of the burial of Eva Swan from Willie Saack, and who were trying to blackmail him.

The evidence in the case corroborating the accomplice, and which tends to establish the defendant's connection with the crime, is as follows: Paul Parker, a witness for the people, testified that he called and saw Eva Swan twice at 1293 Golden Gate avenue, but that on April 14th, when he called again, he did not see her, and was told by the defendant that she was too ill to receive visitors. The defendant also told the witness that Eva Swan's sister had sent $200 with which to pay the expenses of caring for Eva Swan in some sanitorium to which she would be sent for proper treatment. C. F. Large, a druggist employed in a drug store located near the place of business of the defendant, testified that on or about the 19th or 20th of April he sold to him a large bottle of nitric acid, which bottle was similar to one in size and other respects found by officer M. V. Burke with the buried body of Eva Swan. Evelyn Bean, who lived all the month of April in the immediate neighborhood of No. 350 Eureka street, testified that on or about the 23d of April she saw the defendant with another man at said premises. G. A. Pike testified that he visited the defendant at Highland Springs about the middle of May, and there told the defendant that some boys, in digging around the basement of the Eureka street house, had found a condition of things that aroused their suspicions; that he advised the defendant to raise $300 to send the boys East; to which proposition the defendant replied that he did not have the money, but that likely he would be able to give the boys something to do, and in that way keep them quiet. The house at Eureka street had, according to the testimony of another witness, been rented for one month; and in this conversation at Highland Springs the defendant requested Pike, so Pike testified, to rent the house for another month. Here we quote from the record: "Q. What did he (defendant) say about the house on Eureka street? A. He said, 'Are you willing to go out and rent the house for me for another month?' and I said, 'Yes.' He said, 'Don't you think that would give the acid plenty of time to get in its work?'" The witness had a subsequent conversation with the defendant in a saloon in San Francisco, at which Willie Saack and Ben Gordon were present, in which Pike again advised the defendant to raise $300 and send away the boys who had, as he pretended, learned about the interment of the body. The witness further stated that at this time he told the defendant he would need a little money, and that, although the defendant was not indebted to him, he gave him $30. Ben Gordon testified that he with Pike visited the defendant at Highland Springs in May; that towards the last of the following September he demanded $18 of the defendant; that the defendant called him a "son of a bitch," gave him two dollars, and told him to get out of town, or he would shoot him, or "rip" him "wide open with lead;" that thereupon he left the defendant, saying, "I am liable to fool you."

From the testimony of other witnesses, it is learned that the defendant is not a licensed physician, although he was known as "Dr. Grant," and when the officer called at his place of business on September 23d to arrest him he said that he was not "Dr. Grant," but was waiting for him; whereupon the officers called in Ben Gordon (who was waiting nearby), when the defendant was identified and arrested. According to the testimony of Detective Edward J. Wren, the defendant, on the day after his arrest, denied that he had ever been in or around the premises 350 Eureka street; that upon being brought from his cell into the presence of Miss Messerschmidt to listen to a statement of the case by her he ran away, and upon being forced to return tried to persuade her "not to talk." She, however, said that he was the man who "performed the operation on Eva Swan at 1293 Golden Gate avenue," and that he was also the man "who put the body of Eva Swan in the trunk." The defendant listened to these accusations and remained silent.

From this brief statement of the evidence it is so apparent that defendant's contention is without merit that comment is unnecessary. We therefore pass to the next point.

[3] 2. Defendant claims that the evidence introduced by the people fails to show, in accordance with section 274 of the Penal Code, that the operation was not necessary to save the life of Eva Swan. Conceding, for the sake of argument (as was done in People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259, 76 Pac. 1017), that it was for the prosecution, and not the defendant, to establish this fact, the fact was established in this case. The evidence of the people in part shows that the deceased was 23 years of age and in good health at the time of the operation; that when she died the defendant cut her body into parts, covered it with a corrosive acid, and buried it clandestinely, as before narrated. These facts and circumstances, together with his conduct when arrested and when accused of the crime by Miss Messerschmidt, lead irresistibly to the inference that the operation was not performed to save the life of the deceased.

[4] 3. The witness Messerschmidt testified that she knew what placental tissue was, and that after the defendant and the deceased had been in defendant's operating room at Golden Gate avenue she saw such tissue there in a vessel. This was not expert testimony; it was testimony as to a fact. But, even if it be regarded as expert testimony, still the contention of the defendant that the witness was not qualified to give such testimony is unavailing, for the evidence in the case is ample to show that she was sufficiently experienced and informed on the subject to be regarded as an expert.

[5] 4. The defendant assigns as error the court's refusal to instruct the jury that, if a hypothetical question propounded to an expert witness embraced a statement which was not supported by the evidence, the opinion of the expert in answer thereto would be valueless. The instruction, if given, would have simply told the jury what their own common sense would have informed them; and as it embodied no principle of law the refusal to give the instruction was not error. It has been repeatedly so held in this state. People v. Kirby, 114 Pac. 794 (decided by this court February 2, 1911); People v. Bartleman, 120 Cal. 7, 52 Pac. 112; People v. Methever, 132 Cal. 326, 64 Pac. 481.

The judgment is affirmed.

Arnett F. Perry was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Fred Searls, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining from one Ed. Arthur the sum of $500 by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses. The appeal to this court is from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

No brief has been filed in behalf of the defendant, and, therefore, if there were errors made in the trial of the cause which would merit special consideration by this court, we have not been apprised of them.

This court is not required, in the absence of special assignments, in some form, of alleged error, to search the record for the purpose of determining whether the trial in the court below was in all respects conducted without any prejudice to the substantial rights of the accused.

We have, however, taken the pains to carefully read the stenographer's transcription of the testimony, and we have from such investigation discovered no reason for questioning its sufficiency to justify and support the verdict.

The judgment and order are, accordingly, affirmed.

MORTGAGES (§ 468*)—FORECLOSURE—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—GROUNDS.

Where there was nothing to show that the owners of personal property about a mine were unable or unwilling to protect it, a receiver should not be appointed, pending foreclosure of a mortgage thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Edward Ridgely, as trustee, against the Abbott Quicksilver Mining Company and others. From an order removing one receiver and appointing another, defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

H. B. Churchill, J. W. Cochrane, and R. P. Henshall, for appellants. C. M. Crawford and H. V. Keeling, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order of the superior court of Lake county removing one Matthew T. Wilson from the office of receiver in the above-entitled cause, and appointing in his place one Euvelle Howard.

Respondent has presented no argument, either orally or by brief. This may be for the reason that appellants' contention was deemed unanswerable, or probably respondent did not feel inclined to incur any additional expense, since, according to the evidence, the property is merely of nominal value. This court should have been apprised, however, by respondent of his attitude or been afforded the advantage of his views upon the questions herein involved. On account of his remissness, he would have no cause for complaint if the order were reversed without any examination of the record. We have, however, considered with some care the points made by appellants.

It seems that, on March 27, 1903, the plaintiff brought suit to foreclose upon certain bonds, secured by a mortgage upon the real property involved herein. On the same day, one Riley A. Boggess, was, ex parte, appointed a receiver of the property. On October 2, 1903, a final decree of foreclosure was entered, at which time Boggess was in possession as receiver, and he so continued in possession until he was removed on December 7, 1908, on the petition of one of the appellants herein. On the removal of Boggess, the said Matthew T. Wilson was appointed receiver. On July 27, 1909, on the petition of Boggess, the court made the order removing Wilson and appointing Howard to the position.

From an examination of the record, we are convinced that the court was justified in removing both Boggess and Wilson. The only question is whether it should have made another appointment. In this connection it may be said that no suggestion is made impeaching in any manner the character or competency of Howard; but it is contended by appellants that the court was without authority to make another appointment, for the reason that the judgment was "outlawed at the time the order was made," and "no showing whatever was made that would justify the appointment of a receiver." We consider it necessary to notice only the second ground specified by appellants. The only evidence tending to support the claim that there should be a receiver for the property is found in the testimony of H. V. Keeling, a well and favorably known attorney of Lake county. His testimony, however, is essentially the expression of his opinion as to the propriety of such an appointment, rather than the recital of facts that would justify the order. He said, indeed, that "there is still remaining certain personal property at the Abbott mine, consisting of wood and some mining machinery, the exact character and value of which are unknown to him at this time, which requires the care and attention of a receiver." He also testified that he, as attorney for Boggess, had entered into certain negotiations with two gentlemen named Winters and Garner, purchasers of the mine at the tax sale, for the purchase of their interest, and they had expressed themselves as willing to make satisfactory arrangements with Mr. Boggess, when he should come from the East. There is nothing in his testimony, however, opposed to the inference that the parties who were directly interested in the preservation of the property were capable and willing to do everything that the witness opined should be done. It was said, in De Leonis v. Walsh, 148 Cal. 255, 82 Pac. 1048, that, "of course, a party to an action should not against his will be subjected to the onerous expense of a receiver, unless when one may be lawfully appointed, and his appointment is obviously necessary to the protection of the opposite party."

Without further discussion, we conclude that it does not sufficiently appear that it was necessary to appoint another receiver, in order to protect any one's interest in the property. The order of removal of Matthew

T. Wilson as receiver is affirmed. The order appointing Euvelle Howard receiver is reversed.

Plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll.

The following constitutes the entire statement found in appellants' brief: "We respectfully invoke the consideration of the court to the complaint and demurrer thereto set forth in the transcript from folio 3 to folio 69. We submit that the second and third causes of action of the complaint are not amenable to the objections raised by the demurrer, and that, if the demurrer was properly sustained, leave should have been granted plaintiffs to amend said second and third causes of action."

[1] The record fails to show that plaintiffs asked leave to amend or to suggest wherein they could amend their complaint or desired to do so. In such a case we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in denying leave to amend. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 252, 81 Pac. 516. We are asked to examine 66 folios of the complaint to discover some ground for reversing the order sustaining the demurrer to the second and third alleged causes of action. We are given no aid in this search. In no single particular is it suggested that the grounds of the demurrer were not well taken. In no particular is it shown that the complaint was sufficient to meet the objections raised by the demurrer. We are simply told that these causes of action "are not amenable to the objections raised by the demurrer," but, if they are so amenable, plaintiffs should have had leave to amend. Such method of following up an appeal is neither fair to the respondent nor to the appellate court. We feel ourselves fully justified in treating the appeal as practically abandoned. Respondent, however, has, with unnecessary elaboration anticipated every imaginary point which appellants could suggest in support of the complaint, and, we think, has shown that the complaint is deficient in many essential respects. To this very exhaustive treatment appellants make no reply.

[2] No reasonable conclusion can be reached other than that appellants have abandoned their appeal except upon the single point that they should have been given leave to amend. As already stated, this point has no merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where, on the motion to change the place of trial of an action for divorce from S. county to F. county, defendant averred that he resided in F. county, and plaintiff in her affidavit specifically declared that defendant was a resident of S. county, and positively denied defendant's averments, and orally testified that both parties considered S. county as their home, the evidence was conflicting, so that a denial of the motion would not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Carrie Etta Nicholson against John R. Nicholson. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Bowden, for appellant. Benj. K. Knight, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial of an action for divorce. Appellant claimed to be a resident of Fresno county; whereas the complaint was filed in Santa Cruz county, the place of respondent's residence. If the court below had granted the motion, there is no doubt an appellate court would hold that the order was justified by the showing made by defendant. But the affidavit and oral testimony of respondent clearly make it a case of conflicting evidence and, under the well-established rule, the decision of the trial judge is controlling here.

Appellant is not entirely accurate in the assertion that "the affidavit of plaintiff, in so far as it attempts to deny the statement of defendant that he resided in Fresno, is made upon information and belief." It is true that she declared "that affiant is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief states the fact to be, that defendant is only temporarily residing at Coalinga, and that he will not long remain there, and that he is likely at any time to depart from the state of California;" but, as to that portion of appellant's affidavit declaring "that at the time of the commencement of said action he was and yet is a resident of the county of Fresno," respondent positively denied the same, and "every part thereof." She proceeded further to state facts (which we deem it unnecessary to detail) that, as a matter of law, justified the court in concluding, in the language of respondent, that "the affidavit of the defendant made herein is not in good faith," and that he was simply sojourning temporarily in Fresno county, without any intention of making it his permanent abode. In her oral testimony she stated that both parties considered Santa Cruz as their home; that "we have no other home. I know that the defendant has no fixed place of abode, other than the county of Santa Cruz. I know that the motion to have this case tried elsewhere is not made in good faith on the part of the defendant. He only wants to have it transferred to cause me annoyance and trouble, and to prevent the court from awarding me alimony." While some of her declarations are mere inferences, yet sufficient facts are related, in our opinion, to bring

PEOPLE v. SPENCER. (Cr. 320.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 5, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 183*)—VARIANCE.

Where the information, in a prosecution for drawing a bank check with intent to defraud, charged accused with having drawn a check on the National Bank of Commerce, doing business in the city of Seattle, and the evidence showed that the check was drawn on the National Bank of Commerce of Seattle, but there was no other bank by a similar name, the variance is immaterial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 535*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY—PROOF OF CORPUS DELICTI.

While an accused's confessions or admissions are inadmissible until there has been proof, not necessarily conclusive, of the corpus delicti, which includes all of the elements of the crime, in a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476a, making it a crime for any person to utter a bank check with intent to defraud, knowing that he has not sufficient funds or credit to meet it, where it appeared that defendant reported he had on deposit in the bank upon which he drew a check over $20,000, and when the check was presented a few days later it appeared that he had less than $200, those facts warranted an inference that he did not have sufficient credit with the bank to meet the check, and so his confessions and admissions were admissible.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1038*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURTS BELOW—NECESSITY.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476a, making it a crime for any person to utter or draw a bank check with intent to defraud, knowing at the time that he has not sufficient funds or credit to meet it, the court read the whole section to the jury, save the last sentence, which defines credit. Held, that accused having requested no instruction defining the word "credit," he cannot complain on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2646; Dec. Dig. § 1038.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. P. Lawlor, Judge.

L. E. Spencer was convicted of drawing and uttering a bank check with intent to defraud, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Hanley, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of drawing and uttering a bank check with the intent thereby to defraud Watson, Pond & Riddle, a corporation.

The prosecution was had under section 476a of the Penal Code, which section reads as follows: "Every person who willfully, with intent to defraud, makes or draws, or utters, or delivers to another person any check or draft on a bank, * * * knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering or delivery that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank, * * * to meet such check or draft in full upon its presentation, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. * * * The word 'credit' as used herein shall be construed to be an arrangement or understanding with the bank * * * for the payment of such check or draft."

Briefly the facts of the case are these: The defendant represented to Watson, Pond & Riddle that he had $20,000 on deposit in the National Bank of Commerce of Seattle, Wash.; that he expected to have there in a few days $75,000 more; that he was also the owner of rent-producing properties in Seattle, and was related to some of the officials of said bank. On the strength of these pretenses, Watson, Pond & Riddle, on April 28, 1910, as a matter of accommodation, gave the defendant its check for $725, and took in exchange therefor his sight draft on said bank for a like amount. When this draft was presented—which was done as soon as practicable—payment was refused on account of lack of funds.

The evidence tends to sustain the theory of the prosecution that the defendant had put in operation a scheme by means of which he sought, first, to work his way into the good graces of certain San Francisco business men by a number of fair exchanges of his drafts for their checks, and then later, if he succeeded in gaining their confidence, to defraud some of them of large sums of money. However this may be, from a number of transactions similar to this one, each comparatively small in amount, the district attorney selected this (the largest) one on which to base the prosecution. In due time the case came on for trial, evidence was introduced by the people, and on behalf of the defendant witnesses testified as to his good reputation, but he did not himself take the stand. Upon his conviction a motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of three years, whereupon he took this appeal, which is from the judgment.

The defendant relies for a reversal of the judgment on three points: (1) That there is a variance between the allegations of the information and the proof; (2) that the confessions and admissions were admitted before the corpus delicti was established; and (3) that the court erred in giving an instruction to the jury defining the offense charged.

[1] (1) As to the question of variance, the information charges that the draft in question was drawn on the "National Bank of Commerce, doing business in the city of Seattle, state of Washington," and the evidence shows that it was in fact drawn on the National Bank of Commerce of Seattle. Defendant claims that such a variance is fatal. But the evidence also shows that there is no other National Bank of Commerce in Seattle, or any other bank there of similar name, and that this one is called by and does business under both names. We therefore hold that defendant's position on this point cannot be maintained. Such a variance would not be regarded as material in a criminal prosecution, even in the name of the defendant (People v. Oreileus, 79 Cal. 178, 21 Pac. 724), nor in that of the injured party (People v. Hughes, 29 Cal. 262). In the last case, under an indictment charging arson for the purpose of defrauding the Hartford Insurance Company, evidence that the name of the company was the Hartford Fire Insurance Company did not constitute a fatal variance. See, also, People v. Leong Quong, 60 Cal. 107; People v. Armstrong, 114 Cal. 570, 573, 46 Pac. 611.

[2] (2) As to the second point, defendant contends that, independently of his extrajudicial statements and confessions, the evidence fails to establish the corpus delicti, in that it does not show that he had not sufficient credit at the bank, and that therefore the court committed error in admitting such confessions and statements. The rule on the subject is stated in People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440, as follows: "The corpus delicti involves the elements of crime; and, in order to prove it, all of the elements of the crime must be made to appear before defendant's confessions or admissions are admissible for any purpose; and they cannot be used to establish any necessary element for the commission of the crime." But here the defendant represented that he had on deposit in the Seattle bank $20,000; that within a few days he expected $75,000 more; yet when his draft was presented for payment a few days later he had on deposit approximately only $200. These facts, together with the circumstance that the check was dishonored, were quite sufficient to warrant the jury in drawing the inference that the defendant did not have sufficient credit with the bank to meet the draft, and consequently justified the court in admitting proof of the extrajudicial statements of the defendant without further evidence to establish the corpus delicti. The authorities support this view. In People v. Montgomery, 114 Cal. 792, the defendant was charged with an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to kill; and in order to permit the verdict to stand it was necessary that the proof in the case should show that the gun with which the assault was made was loaded. There was no direct proof that the gun was loaded, but the defendant, after quarreling with the prosecuting witness, left the premises, and soon thereafter returned with the gun, which he pointed at him, threatening to kill him. These circumstances, with the fact that he persisted in remaining about the premises, and threatened others, were held sufficient to justify the jury in drawing the inference that the gun was loaded. In the cases of People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538, and People v. Terrill, 133 Cal. 120, 65 Pac. 303, it was held that the absence of a certain name from the city directory was sufficient, in the case of forgery, to show that it was the name of a fictitious person. In Commonwealth v. Locke, 14 Mass. 294, the court said: "The burden of proving affirmatively that the sale or intended sale was in violation of law, by negating the authority or license of the person by whom it was made or intended, was placed upon the government; but the court rightly ruled that it need not be proved by direct evidence, but might be inferred from circumstances."

On this question of the degree of proof necessary to establish the corpus delicti before permitting proof of the defendant's extrajudicial statements or confessions, we think the case of People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698, is particularly in point. There the evidence showed that four detached buildings were burned; and the court held that this fact tended to show that the buildings were separately fired, and therefore sufficiently established the incendiary character of the fire to admit evidence of the confession. The court described this evidence as weak and unsatisfactory, and in the course of the opinion said: "A distinction must be taken between the evidence which upon the whole case would justify a conviction, and that degree of proof of criminal agency in the burning of the buildings for the purpose of letting in evidence of the confessions or admissions of the defendant. To justify a conviction, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of every fact necessary to constitute the offense, and to identify the defendant as the perpetrator; but it is not necessary that the evidence of the criminal act should be of that conclusive character in order to justify the admission of the defendant's confessions."

[3] (3) Finally, the defendant insists that the court erred in not reading the whole of section 476a of the Penal Code. The court read all of that section, except the last part, which defines the word "credit." In view of the fact that throughout the trial, in various ways, the defendant contended that there was no evidence sufficient to establish the lack of credit with the bank, it would seem that the court should have read, not a part of the section, but the whole of it. People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 Pac. 1001. But the jury must have understood the meaning of a word of such common use. Moreover, the record discloses that the district attorney read the section to the jury, and in such a way as to call their special attention to the last clause thereof. In any event, the defendant requested no instruction defining the word "credit"; hence he cannot be heard to complain.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 13, 1911. Rehearing Denied July 13, 1911.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—RELEASE—CONSENT.

A stockholder may not be released from liability on his contract of subscription without the consent of his fellow stockholders, as well as that of the creditors of the corporation.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—INSOLVENCY—PREFERENCES TO CREDITORS—TRUST FUND DOCUMENT.

The subscribed capital stock of a corporation, both paid and unpaid, is a trust fund which the stockholders and creditors have the right to insist shall not be reduced, diminished or impaired, except with their consent.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—RELEASE.

The rights of a creditor of a corporation do not permit him to interfere and prevent a stockholder from altering his relation toward the corporation, with respect to his membership therein as a holder of its shares; and a solvent stockholder may make a valid agreement with the corporation, securing first the consent of all the other stockholders thereto, by which he may surrender his stock and be released on a subscription contract.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 229*)—RETIREMENT OF SUBSCRIBER—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

Although an agreement between a solvent stockholder and the corporation, with the consent of all the other stockholders, by which the stockholder is to surrender his stock and be released on a subscription contract, be binding upon the corporation, it may not prevent existing creditors from having recourse against the retiring stockholder, to compel contribution from him, in satisfaction of their claims, in an amount proportionate to the unpaid balance of his subscription.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—POWERS OF DIRECTORS—SURRENDER OF SHARES.

The power of consenting stockholders to accept a surrender of the shares of a subscriber may not generally be exercised by a board of directors, in the absence of authority given them by the charter or by laws of the corporation.

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—POWERS OF DIRECTORS—COMPROMISE AND RELEASE.

While general authority is not reposed in a board of directors to accept a retransfer of stock from a subscriber, and so terminate his relation as a shareholder, they may make compromises with the subscribers whose liability is questioned, who are insolvent, or who are of doubtful financial responsibility; and under this exception the action of directors in making an agreement with subscribers, who through losses were unable to take and pay for all the shares subscribed for by them, releasing them from liability as to one-half of the amount subscribed for in consideration of certain cash payments, was within the authority of the directors.

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—ESTOPPEL TO DENY AUTHORITY—RELEASE OF SUBSCRIBERS.

Directors of a corporation, by vote reciting the inability of subscribers to stock to take and pay for all the shares subscribed for, agreed with such subscribers that in consideration of payment of certain sums in cash they would be released as to one-half of the amount subscribed for. The payments were made, the contract fully executed, the released subscribers thereafter treated as stockholders, the surrendered stock resold to other subscribers, and the whole transaction was in good faith, and was not repudiated by any stockholder. Held, to warrant the conclusion that all stockholders acquiesced in such action, and were estopped from objecting to the authority of the directors, even if the release was beyond their power.

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—COLLATERAL AGREEMENT—"NOVATION."

The agreement was in effect a "novation," which, under Civ. Code, § 1531, is made by the substitution of a new obligation, between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation; and the fact that payment of a part of the money required to be paid by the released subscribers was deferred did not have the effect of continuing them in their relation as stockholders, for the full amount of their subscription, until the final payment had been made.

9. CORPORATIONS (§ 229*)—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—CORPORATE DEBTS—EFFECT OF RELEASE BY CORPORATION.

A corporation, on October 5, 1906, executed its note for $22,500, and, on November 16th, another note for $25,000. On August 23d, before any payment had been made on the subscription agreements of certain subscribers, the corporation had adopted a resolution reciting the inability of certain subscribers to take and pay for all the stock they had subscribed for, and proposed to compromise with them as to one-half the amount of their subscription, in consideration of certain cash payments, which were made by the subscribers according to agreement, and, on October 10th, after the execution of the corporation's first note, other subscribers were released by a similar compromise agreement; both agreements being made in good faith. Held, in an action by the holder of notes to enforce payment by the corporation and by the subscribers concerned in the compromise agreements, that on October 5th, when the first note was executed, the subscribers who were parties to the agreement of August 23d, owned and were liable on only one-half of the shares originally subscribed for, and that the subscribers who were parties to the agreement of October 10th, owned and were liable for the indebtedness of $22,500 on the full number of shares represented by their subscription in agreements, and as to

I. M. Golden, Rothchild, Golden & Rothchild, and J. M. & H. L. Rothchild, for appellants. Porter & Sutton, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action brought to enforce payment of two promissory notes executed by the Wentworth Hotel Company, a corporation; one being for the sum of $22,500, made in favor of the First National Bank of Pasadena, and the second for the sum of $25,000, made in favor of the Union Savings Bank of the same city. Appellants were joined as parties defendant because of the fact that they were owners of stock in the hotel company at the time the indebtedness sued on was incurred, and recovery was sought against them on their shareholders' liability arising under the provisions of section 322 of the Civil Code. Judgment went against appellants for the amount prayed for, except that a deduction of 150 shares of stock was apportioned as a credit among appellants Fleishhacker and Bachman, reducing the number of shares found by the court to be held by them at the time the indebtedness was incurred to the following totals, respectively: Mortimer and Herbert Fleishhacker, 137½ shares each; S. Bachman, 275 shares. The occasion for the making of this reduction is hereinafter referred to in connection with the mention of stock issued to Lewis C. Warner and C. Dana Warner. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The Wentworth Hotel Company was organized under the laws of the territory of Arizona, for the purpose, in part, of transacting business in the state of California. The par value of the stock was the sum of $100. At the time of the organization of the company, the appellants were subscribers for shares of stock in the following amounts, to wit: Mortimer Fleishhacker and Herbert Fleishhacker, 175 shares each; David Neustadter and Jacob H. Neustadter, 150 shares each; S. Bachman, 350 shares. No certificates representing the stock were issued to any of the subscribers until November 8, 1906. The subscription contract was signed by appellants prior to the date upon which the indebtedness represented by the two promissory notes was incurred, and provided that payment for the stock subscribed for should be made in four equal installments, not less than 60 days apart, upon 15 days' notice from the treasurer of the company. The promissory notes represented money borrowed from the respective banks for uses of the corporation. The date of the note to the First National Bank was October 5, 1906; that to the Union Savings Bank was November 16, 1906. On August 23, 1906, and before any payment had been made by appellants on account of their subscription agreements, the board of directors of the hotel company adopted a resolution, whereby they proposed to release appellants Mortimer and Herbert Fleishhacker and S. Bachman from their obligation as to one-half of the number of shares subscribed for by each. This resolution recited in substance that, as the said appellants had suffered great loss and damage by the earthquake and fire in San Francisco, to such an extent that they were unable to take all of the stock subscribed for and pay for the same, but as they were willing to take one-half of the number of shares so subscribed for and to make certain cash payments, and that it appeared to be for the best interests of the company to enter into such agreement, that the said appellants were therefore released from their subscriptions to the extent stated. Under the terms of this resolution, $5,000 in cash was to be paid by each of the Fleishhackers, and $3,750 was to be paid by each on November 1, 1906. Bachman was to pay the sum of $10,000 in cash and $7,500 on November 1, 1906. On October 10, 1906, by a resolution similar in terms, the two Neustadters were to be released from liability as to one-half of the amount subscribed by them upon the payment in cash of the sum of $7,500 each; these amounts being in full payment for one-half of the stock mentioned in the agreement of subscription executed by these two appellants. The amounts of money mentioned in these resolutions were paid by appellants in accordance with the terms thereof. If the adoption of these resolutions operated to release appellants at the time the action referred to was taken by the board of directors of the hotel company, then at the time the notes were executed the two Fleishhackers and S. Bachman were the owners of only one-half of the number of shares of stock originally subscribed for by them, and the Neustadters had been released from liability as to a like proportion of their subscription for stock after the first note was executed, but before the note for the sum of $25,000 was made in favor of the Union Savings Bank, on November 16, 1906. The trial court determined that the releases attempted to be made were all invalid, and that all of the appellants were liable for their proportion of the indebtedness represented by the two promissory notes up to the full number of shares of the stock contracted to be taken by them under their subscription contracts. The question as to the validity of these releases is the principal one argued. The position taken by respondent is that a subscriber to stock of a corporation cannot be released from the obligation of his contract, except by payment according to its terms, or with the consent of all the remaining stockholders and the creditors of the corporation. With this contention the trial court agreed; hence its judgment.

[1, 2] Stating the rule in its general sense, it is correct to say that a stockholder may not be released from liability on his contract of subscription without the consent of his fellow stockholders, as well as that of the creditors of the corporation. The reason for the rule is found in the doctrine, now thoroughly established by the decisions of the American courts at least, which views the subscribed capital stock of a corporation, both paid and unpaid, as a trust fund, which the stockholders and creditors have the right to insist shall not be reduced, diminished, or impaired, except with their consent. Thompson on Corporations, vol. 1, par. 765; Morgan v. Struthers, 131 U. S. 246, 9 Sup. Ct. 726, 33 L. Ed. 132. In considering the application of the rule just stated, however, it must be kept in mind that the creditor of a corporation is not a direct party to the contractual relation entered into between the corporation and a subscriber to its capital stock. Under the trust fund theory, the creditor is presumed to have given credit upon the faith that the working capital of the corporation, whether actually paid in or promised to be paid, will be kept available to satisfy his debt. The corporation, then, cannot, without committing a fraud against such creditor, wipe out the fund, either by returning the money paid by subscribers or releasing the obligors on their unpaid subscription contracts.

[3, 4] The rights of the creditor, nevertheless, do not extend so far as to permit him to interfere and prevent a stockholder from altering his relation toward the corporation with respect to his membership therein as a holder of its shares. It must be admitted that a solvent stockholder may make a valid agreement with the corporation, securing first the consent of all the other stockholders thereto, by which he may surrender his stock and be released on his subscription contract. Such an agreement will be valid and binding upon the corporation, although it may not prevent existing creditors from having recourse against the retiring stockholder, to compel contribution from him, in satisfaction of their claims, in an amount proportionate to the unpaid balance of his subscription. In what has just been said, we have referred to releases made by consent, and where no consideration of doubtful claims or compromises with insolvent or irresponsible subscribers enters into the transaction. This for the purpose of pointing out that a creditor may not complain of the act of a corporation in waiving its right to enforce payment from a subscriber and accepting the relinquishment of his shares of stock. As the creditor may only be damaged by a cancellation of the subscription liability, and if this liability remains with the subscriber after his withdrawal from the corporation, for the benefit of the complaining and nonconsenting creditors, that is all that such creditors have any right to demand or insist upon.

[5, 6] It may also be said that the rule of the decisions is that this power in the stockholders to accept a surrender of the shares of a subscriber may not be exercised by a board of directors in the absence of express authority given them by the charter or by-laws of the corporation. Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, vol. 3, § 692, subd. 1; Thompson on Corporations, vol. 1, par. 763; Morawetz on Private Corporations, vol. 1, § 112. Yet, while general authority is not reposed in a board of directors to accept a re-transfer of stock from a subscriber, and so terminate the relation of the latter as a shareholder, an exception is recognized by the authorities and text-writers to the extent of admitting that the directors may make compromises with the subscribers whose liability is questioned, who are insolvent, or who are of doubtful financial responsibility. Such compromises usually take the form of that which was entered into between the de-defendants here and the Wentworth Hotel Company, by its board of directors; that is, in consideration of the subscriber paying for a portion of the shares agreed to be taken, he is released, so far as the corporation is concerned, as to liability for the remainder. We quote: "The directors of a corporation ordinarily have no authority to release stockholders from liability on their subscriptions otherwise than in pursuance of a bona fide compromise, or for a sufficient consideration. But they may compromise with subscribers, as with other debtors, and may release a subscriber where there is a sufficient consideration, so that there is no fraud or wrong as against creditors or other stockholders." Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, vol. 3, § 692, subd. 1. Again: "The corporation, in case of a subscriber's inability to pay for his shares, or in case of bona fide disputes as to his liability, may bona fide compromise the dispute upon surrender of his shares, and release him from liability thereon. While the directors may compromise doubtful claims, they have no authority to release stockholders from liability upon their binding and undisputed contracts of subscriptions. * * * Section 242. The directors or corporate officers may compromise doubtful claims against subscribers to capital stock." Purdy's Beach on Private Corporations, vol. 1. See, also, section 841, vol. 2, Morawetz on Private Corporations. In Cook on Stock and Stockholders, at section 171, the author says: "A compromise differs from a cancellation, in that the subscriber pays to the corporation a part of the subscription price, in order to be released from the balance. The stock is delivered back to the corporation. The corporate authorities—generally the directors—have power to compromise any corporate debt; and if in the collection of subscriptions there is reasonable doubt as to the liability of the subscriber, or if the subscriber is insolvent, the corporation may compromise the liability and release a part for the purpose of securing the residue. All that is required is good faith." We cite, also, Republic Life Ins. Co. v. Swigert, 135 Ill. 150, 25 N. E. 684, 12 L. R. A. 328; Morgan v. Lewis, 46 Ohio, 1, 17 N. E. 558; Whitaker v. Grummond, 68 Mich. 249, 36 N. W. 62; Erskine v. Peck, 13 Mo. App. 280. We think the action taken by the board of directors of the Wentworth Hotel Company, in making the releases in favor of the appellants, under the statements of the text-writers quoted from and decisions just cited, was within the authority of such board as the managing agents of the corporation.

[7] But let us assume that the action was not within the power conferred upon the directors. It would have undoubtedly been valid, if accompanied by the unanimous consent of the remaining stockholders. No stockholder, so far as the record in the case shows, has ever repudiated the action of the directors, and no creditor whose debt existed at the time the resolutions were adopted can be affected by the action taken. Furthermore, the stock upon which the defendants secured the releases was treated ever afterwards as the stock of the company, and a large number of shares thereof were resold to new subscribers. This action was brought more than six months after the compromise agreement was entered into. At a meeting of the stockholders, held in December, 1906, the records of the corporation show that appellants were recognized by the corporation as holding only one-half of the number of shares of stock originally subscribed for by them. The compromise agreement between the corporation and defendants was fully executed. The corporation dealt with the surrendered stock as its own, and resold, on November 8, 1908, 50 shares thereof to Lewis C. Warner, and 100 shares thereof to C. Dana Warner; these shares so sold being the number which the trial court apportioned to the holdings of the two Fleishhackers and Bachman as a credit. All of these facts would seem to make the case a proper one for the application of the rule of estoppel, which would prevent any stockholder from now objecting to the authority of the directors to make the releases complained of, and to warrant the conclusion that all stockholders acquiesced therein. It is not claimed that the directors acted in bad faith, nor that the action taken was not, as the resolution recited, for the best interests of the company, and because of the fact that appellants were unable to take and pay for more than one-half of the stock agreed to be taken under the terms of their subscription contract. Our Supreme Court has said, in the case of Tulare Savings Bank v. Talbot, 131 Cal. 45, 63 Pac. 172: "While it is true that a contract of subscription may be modified or annulled only by the unanimous consent of the stockholders, or by the board of directors duly authorized thereto (Pacific Fruit Co. v. Coon, 107 Cal. 452 [40 Pac. 542]), such release may be proved, not only by the records, but as well by the acquiescence of the stockholders of the corporation." The act of the directors was not ultra vires, because the result effected might at first consideration appear to be that some of the capital stock had thereby been withdrawn. Treating of a similar situation, the Supreme Court of Ohio, in the case of Morgan v. Lewis, supra, used this language: "The finding of the referee that this transaction worked a reduction of the capital stock of the company is not tenable. There was nothing in the way of the company reissuing this stock, or its equivalent, to others, who may have desired it. There was nothing in the fact that these certificates were marked 'canceled' on the face by the secretary of the company, and by him treated as surrendered stock, to authorize the finding that the capital stock was reduced. This was no part of the transaction with Morgan, and there was nothing in the fact of the re-exchange of the stock for the furnace which called upon the officers of the company to treat the stock as canceled, or the capital pro tanto reduced. Green's Brice, Ultra Vires (2d Ed.) 191, 192. This conclusion is not qualified by the fact that the stock was not thereafter represented." See, also, Cook on Stock and Stockholders, vol. 1, § 282. We conclude, therefore, first: The board of directors had authority to enter into the compromise agreement releasing defendants from a portion of their subscription liability, and accepting the surrender of a part of the shares of stock agreed to be taken, and that defendants ceased to be stockholders from the time of the making of that agreement; second, assuming that no authority existed authorizing the directors to so act, that the corporation and stockholders thereof have become bound by acquiescence from raising any question as to the validity of the releases.

[8] The record shows that the deferred payment on account of the purchase price of one-half of the stock was made by the Neustadters on October 8, 1906. The fact that a portion of the money required to be paid by the defendants Fleishhackers and Bachman, under the terms of the resolutions of release, was provided to be paid on a day subsequent to the date of the making of the cash payment did not postpone the effect of the compromise agreement until all of the money had been paid. A new contract was entered into at the time of the adoption of the resolutions between the corporations and appellants, which was, in effect, a novation. A novation is made: "1. By the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation." Civ. Code, § 1531. The obligation of all of the parties to the subscription contract was changed. On the part of the corporation, certificates for one-half of the number of shares of stock subscribed for were not to be issued, but the stock was to be held by it, and a large amount of money was paid as a further immediate consideration moving to the corporation. The time for payment of the balance of the purchase price being deferred did not have the effect of continuing Mortimer and Herbert Fleishhacker and S. Bachman in their relation as stockholders, for the full amount of their subscription, until the final payment had been made. In the case of Griswold v. Pieratt, 110 Cal. 263, 42 Pac. 820, a change was worked in the agreement of the parties to the contract there considered by the introduction of new and different terms. In discussing the question as to the effect upon the original obligation in that case, the Supreme Court said: "The original contract was suspended, if not extinguished (Civ. Code, 1531, 1682); the plaintiff, while the new compact between himself and defendant remained in force, could maintain no action for any breach of duty by defendant under the former. His only proper course, if such breach had occurred, was to impeach the settlement by appropriate pleading for fraud, accident, or mistake. * * * Since defendant pleaded facts showing that the original contract was superseded by a new obligation, he showed that neither party has any rights based upon it." The resolution of the board of directors of the hotel company expressly recited that the obligors on the original subscription contract were then released, and the effect of the transaction, which was fully carried out, as we have before mentioned, was to put an end both to the right of appellants to demand more than one-half of the stock subscribed for by them, and also to the right of the corporation to enforce payment for more than a like proportion of the subscription indebtedness.

[9] The release of defendants Neustadter was shown by the resolution of the directors to have been made on October 10, 1906, and it was in consideration of the payment of $7,500 in cash by each of these two men. The fact that the payment of these amounts of money was shown to have been made two days before the resolution of release was adopted and recorded is, we think, immaterial. It is sufficiently clear that the payments were made pursuant to the compromise agreement entered into by the officers of the corporation, which by the action of the board of directors was made binding. It follows, then, that on October 5, 1906, at the time the indebtedness of $22,500 to the First National Bank of Pasadena was incurred by the hotel company, the two Fleishhackers were the owners of 87½ shares each, instead of 175 shares originally subscribed for by each, and that S. Bachman was the owner of 175 shares, instead of 350 originally subscribed for. The release of the Neustadters not being made until October 10, 1906, these latter appellants were liable for the indebtedness of $22,500 on the full number of shares represented by their subscription agreement. The indebtedness on the note, dated on November 16, 1906, executed to the Union Savings Bank of Pasadena, for the sum of $25,000, was incurred after the several appellants had been released from their obligation to accept more than one-half of the number of shares of stock subscribed for.

[10, 11] The resolution of the board of directors, whereby authority was given to the managing officers of the corporation to borrow money and execute notes therefor, did not give express authority to such officers to bind the corporation by contract to pay attorney's fees in the event suit was brought to recover on any promissory notes so executed. That resolution was in the following form: "On motion duly made and seconded, it was resolved that arrangements be made for borrowing such sums as may be needed, and that the president and secretary be authorized to execute notes therefor." Schallard v. Eel River Nav. Co., 70 Cal. 144, 11 Pac. 590; Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 34 Pac. 527. No doubt, under the terms of the resolution quoted, the president and secretary were authorized to execute promissory notes which would contain all usual and customary terms and conditions; but we cannot take notice of the fact, if it be a fact, that it is usual and customary for such notes to contain a contract for the payment of attorney's fees, in the event of suit. The record as it is presented contains no evidence showing or tending to show that the condition requiring the payment of attorney's fees in the event of suit is one customarily and usually incident to the terms of such contracts. Attorney's fees were therefore improperly allowed.

[12] The further contention that the stockholders are not subject to the personal liability imposed by the statute of this state, (Civ. Code, § 322), which makes a shareholder in a corporation responsible for the payment of such a proportion of the debts of the corporation as the number of shares owned by such shareholder bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock, may be disposed of by reference to the decision rendered by the Supreme Court on August 31, 1910 (see Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 275, 110 Pac. 942), holding that the stockholder of a corporation organized under the laws of Arizona, for the purpose of doing business in the state of California, is liable and must respond to the claims of creditors in the amount prescribed by the Civil Code.

It follows from the conclusions we have expressed that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

THOMAS v. WENTWORTH HOTEL CO.
et al. (L. A. 2,691.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1911.)

In Bank. Dissenting opinion on order denying a rehearing.

For opinion in District Court of Appeal, see 117 Pac. 1041.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. The directors of the corporation had no authority to release any portion of its subscribed capital, except by way of a bona fide compromise with an insolvent subscriber, and the recitals in their records are not competent evidence, against either stockholders or creditors, that Bachman or either of the Fleishhackers was insolvent, or believed to be insolvent, on the 23d day of August, 1906—the date of the supposed compromise. Aside from these recitals, there is no evidence that either of them was then or has been since insolvent, or suspected of insolvency. If, therefore, as I have no doubt is true, the burden of proving these essential facts was on the defendants, the resolution or agreement of August 23, 1906, was properly held to be ultra vires and ineffectual until duly ratified by the stockholders; and there is not the slightest pretense of even an implied ratification prior to the date of the first loan—the loan of the First National Bank of Pasadena, made on October 5, 1906. Conceding, then, that the officers of that bank are chargeable with knowledge of what appeared upon the records of the corporation and of other existing conditions, all that they knew was that the directors had, without authority and contrary to law, attempted to release the obligation of solvent subscribers to the capital of the corporation. A subsequent ratification by the stockholders of a void release would not have the effect of impairing the rights of existing creditors. But even if it could be allowed that effect there was no subsequent ratification by the stockholders. Certainly there was no express ratification, and the only pretense of an implied ratification is the fact that at a stockholders' meeting on October 10th Bachman and the Fleishhackers voted only one-half of the stock they had subscribed for. This would have been a very inconclusive circumstance, if all the other stockholders had been present. But all the other stockholders were not present, either in person or by proxy. The entire number of shares (3,500) had been subscribed; only 3,001 shares were represented at this meeting, leaving 499 shares unaccounted for, and, excluding the 350 shares surrendered by Bachman and the Fleishhackers, there were 149 shares wholly unrepresented. This was fatal to a ratification, even if it had been express in terms, instead of having to rest upon a doubtful implication.

What is here said regarding the first attempted release applies equally to the subsequent attempted release of the Neustadters, of whose insolvency there is no evidence—a transaction never expressly ratified, nor ratified by any pretense of acquiescence, until after the loan made in November by the Union Savings Bank.

As to the supposed estoppel of nonconsenting stockholders, arising out of the fact that the directors were able to dispose of 150 out of the 350 shares surrendered by Bachman and the Fleishhackers at their par value, I do not understand the principle upon which it rests. This was but a partial restoration to the trust fund of a larger amount unlawfully diverted; it was at most a compensation pro tanto to the stockholders, and a reimbursement pro tanto of the trust fund for the benefit of creditors. Nor can I understand how an estoppel of the stockholders of a corporation can be held to impair the rights of creditors. The partial reimbursement of the fund, it is true, entitled the defendants to a proportional credit, and it was given that effect in the judgment of the superior court, which in my opinion, should have been affirmed.

In re YOELL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 5,392.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 15, 1911.)

WILLS (§ 402*)—CONTEST—COSTS OF CONTEST—ANT.

Where the second trial of a will contest was abortive because of the destruction of the records, and the third trial resulted in a mistrial, it was error to order the payment of contestants' costs thereon by the special administratrix out of the funds of the estate; the court having no power to appropriate the assets to aid either party, until a final judgment is rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 402.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of J. Alexander Yoell. From an order directing contestants' costs upon certain trials of a will contest to be paid out of the assets of the estate, an appeal was taken. Reversed.

Hiram W. Johnson and Carl Westerfield, for appellants. Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood, E. E. Cothran, and Leon Morris, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Certain of the children of J. Alexander Yoell, deceased, contested the admission of his proffered will to probate. The first trial resulted in a disagreement of the jury; the second proved abortive because of the earthquake and fire; the third resulted in a mistrial; the jury standing eight for contestants and four for the proponents. The trial court then made its order, fixing the costs of the contestants upon the second and third trials, and directing them to be paid by the special administratrix out of the funds of the estate. From that order, this appeal is taken.

The question thus presented upon appeal has been determined absolutely in favor of appellants' position by this court in bank, in Henry v. Superior Court, 93 Cal. 569, 29 Pac. 230. In the Henry Case the order was in advance of the hearing of the contest, and was a direction to the special administrator to pay to the attorney for the contestants the sum of $600 "for counsel fees, witness fees, and other expenses." In the opinion in the Henry Case, it is pointed out that such allowance for counsel fees should be made to the party, and not to the attorney. It is further declared that it is not within the scope of the powers of the special administrator to pay, and therefore not within the scope of the power of the court to order him to pay, such costs, but that such an order, even when properly made in other respects, should call for the payment in due course of administration. But the principal ground for the decision, as stated by the court itself, is "that until the will has been admitted to probate, or probate has been denied, the court has no power to appropriate the funds of the estate to aid either proponent or contestant." Some of the reasoning advanced in support of that view, pertinent to the case before it, is not here applicable. In the Henry Case there had been no trial, and the allowance of costs, made in advance of the incurring of the costs themselves, must rest upon a speculative basis. Here there has been a trial, and it is not seriously in question but that the costs have been incurred. But the foundation of the court's decision in the Henry Case is that costs cannot be allowed at all, "except as an incident to some judgment or order of the court." And in this case, no more than in the Henry Case, is there any such judgment or order.

It is proper to add, in contemplation of the fact that the law (with but few restrictions) permits a person to dispose of his property by will in such manner as he sees fit, that another law which permits one to contest the will, and perhaps lay bare the secrets of a testator's life, and to cloud his reputation after his death, and then permits him to recover all his costs, even when his efforts so to destroy the will have proved futile, is exceptional, in that it takes one man's property and bestows it upon another, when that other has been making an unsustained attack upon the testamentary act of the person whose estate is thus compelled to pay for the attack. And so it is said by this court, in Estate of Bump, 152 Cal. 271, 92 Pac. 642, that the cases "must be rare and the circumstances must be peculiar indeed to justify such an order in favor of a contestant who has failed." The final determination of the litigation, consequently, must have a weight in influencing the court, in the exercise of the discretion, to award costs with which the law has vested it, and not until the final determination can that discretion be properly exercised.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

ROSENHOLZ v. ROSENHOLZ.
(S. F. 5,807.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 478*)—WRIT OF RESTITUTION—PROCEDURE.

Where the allegation, in a petition to the Supreme Court for an alternative writ of restitution, that defendant before execution applied to the trial court to fix the amount of his stay bond pending appeal, is controverted, and neither the record nor other evidence is before the court, the cause must be set down for hearing, as his failure to make such application would affect his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

In Bank. Action by Mary C. Rosenholz against Alfred Rosenholz. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant now applies for an alternative writ of restitution to be directed against plaintiff. Cause set down for hearing.

R. M. Royce and Austin Lewis, for petitioner. Leo Kaufmann, for plaintiff.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of restitution, restoring to petitioner the possession of certain real property, and preserving his statutory right to a stay of execution pending an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. It is made to appear by the petition that an interlocutory judgment and decree awarding to plaintiff the property in question was duly made and given; that he appealed from this judgment and repeatedly sought the court to fix the amount of a bond to stay the execution of the judgment pending the appeal; that the trial court failed to do this, while maintaining the status quo by its order staying execution of the judgment. The last application to the court to fix the stay bond upon appeal, it is alleged, was made upon January 5th. Upon January 6th, in the absence of defendant's attorney, upon application of plaintiff's attorney, the order staying execution was vacated, and a writ of possession ordered issued by the judge. Upon acquiring knowledge of this, and before the execution of the writ by the sheriff, defendant's attorney secured another stay of execution for two days, and likewise an order fixing the amount of the stay bond; that this order was served upon the sheriff; that within the time limited by it a good and sufficient stay bond was filed; that, notwithstanding this, petitioner was ousted of possession by unauthorized persons not connected with the office of the sheriff of the city and county; that petitioner's attorney then made application to the court for a writ of restitution which the court refused to consider, "handing the same to the clerk and telling him to tell defendant's counsel to take it away."

An application for relief was then made to this court. The answer to the petition joins issue upon certain of these averments. Thus, it is denied that petitioner ever made application to the court to fix the amount of the stay bond until after the court had issued its writ of possession to plaintiff under the judgment and this writ had been duly executed by the sheriff. It is further denied that the sheriff did not execute the writ, and that the writ was executed by unauthorized persons. Manifestly the rights of petitioner, if he had made timely application for a stay bond pending his appeal, would be very different from the rights that would be his if he had made such application only after execution of a judgment.

The condition of the record making it impossible for this court to determine this and other controverted questions of fact herein adverted to, it is ordered that the order of submission in the above-entitled matter heretofore made be vacated, that the cause be set down upon the calendar of the next law and motion day, October 2, 1911, for further hearing and evidence upon these matters, and that timely notice be given of this order to the parties interested.

SHAW v. SHAW. (S. F. 5,355.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 35*)—SALES.

Plaintiff and defendant owned, as tenants in common, 200 acres in timber land which, by reason of the quantity of the timber thereon, at the price of $1 per 1,000 feet per acre, was only worth $20 per acre. It was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that they would not sell the land for less than $25 an acre, and, in order to get more, defendant obtained control of approximately 1,500 acres of the land, which, including the 200 acres, averaged 6,000 standing feet per acre, whereupon defendant was enabled to sell the whole land for $60 per acre; but, before doing so, he concealed the price and asked plaintiff for what sum he would sell his interest in the 200 acres and obtained a deed from him at the rate of $25 per acre. It was stipulated that defendant was plaintiff's agent in selling plaintiff's interest in the 200 acres in connection with the larger tract. Held, that defendant was not entitled to make a profit out of the sale, and, all the land having been sold at the rate of $60 per acre without reference to the timber standing thereon, defendant was accountable to plaintiff for his interest at that rate.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 218*)—SPECIAL VERDICT—FAILURE TO OBJECT AT TRIAL.

Objections to answers given by the jury to special issues submitted by the court should be made at the time the answers are returned into court, that the jury may be required to render more definite and specific responses, and cannot be first raised on appeal.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge.

Action by W. H. Shaw against S. B. Shaw. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Ford and L. M. Burnell (T. J. Crowley, of counsel), for appellant. Denver Sevier, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff and defendant are brothers. They owned in common 200 acres of timber land in Humboldt county. The value of such timber land was estimated (provided the timber was sufficient in quantity to justify cutting) at a dollar per thousand standing feet per acre. Thus, an acre of land containing 100,000 standing feet of timber was estimated to be worth $100. The brothers desired to sell their 200 acres, and they had their land "cruised"—that is to say, the amount of timber upon it approximately estimated—and were disappointed to find that it averaged only about 20,000 feet per acre, which would mean a valuation of $20 an acre or $4,000 for the tract. They desired to obtain more than this; as much as possible, of course. The defendant conceived the idea of gathering in by purchase or under bond as large a tract of better timber land as was possible and of making a sale of the whole, including the 200 acres. He proceeded to do this at his own cost and expense, buying 80 acres and bonding other lands until in the aggregate he controlled approximately 1,500 acres, which he then offered for sale. The intending purchasers were willing to buy the land, provided the land averaged 60,000 standing feet an acre. That it would so average defendant felt well assured. A bond was given to the intending purchasers whereby the purchasers agreed to buy the land at the price of $60 an acre if they satisfied themselves that it would average 60,000 standing feet of lumber per acre. A brief time was given to them to have the land "cruised." They satisfied themselves of its value, and the purchase was completed. After the bond was given and before the purchase was actually made, defendant wrote to his brother, and, without advising him of the condition of affairs or the price which he expected to obtain, asked him for what sum he would sell his interest in the 200 acres, and inclosed a deed for the plaintiff to execute. Plaintiff did execute the deed for a consideration of $25 an acre and wrote to his brother saying that he knew that "we had agreed between ourselves not to take less than $25 an acre." He also agreed to allow his brother a $200 commission for effecting the sale. The sale was made. The defendant accounted to his brother for the $2,500, deducting a commission of $200. Subsequently plaintiff learned that all the land had sold at the rate of $60 per acre and brought this action to recover the sum which he claimed to be due him in accordance with the terms of the sale. The cause was tried before a jury. Its verdict and the judgment following were given for the plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, and, from the order denying his motion, though not from the judgment, defendant appeals.

Defendant's contention is that the 200 acres were worth no more than $20 an acre, that this land could not be sold even for that without adding to it other and more valuable timber land; that to accomplish this sale he had spent his time and money; that the land was, while sold nominally for $60 an acre for the whole tract, actually sold per acre according to the value of the timber standing upon it; that, when the plaintiff made the conveyance of his interest in the 200 acres for $25 an acre, the price was actually more than the land was worth; and that he (defendant) took the deed either as a purchase, which he had the right to make since he was paying more than the land was worth (in this matter the defendant's own testimony is inconsistent with itself), or took the deed, not as a purchaser of his brother's interest, but in effect as a bond upon the property the better to enable him to sell it; that when he sold it he was in equity accountable to his brother for only the timber value, namely, $20 an acre; and that, consequently, under the terms of the sale actually made he had overpaid and not underpaid his brother in their settlement. The contention of the plaintiff, upon the other hand, is that his brother acted for him as his agent in the sale of his land (and this is conceded by the stipulation of the parties); that the distinct understanding was that, while they would be willing to sell their 200 acres for $25 an acre and not less, they, of course, desired to get as much more for it as possible; that the defendant agreed to undertake the sale, to gather in other tracts of timber land, and to sell the whole, including the 200 acres, for such price per acre as could be obtained; that the very purpose of this arrangement was to increase the price obtainable for the 200 acres; that the land was actually sold for $60 per acre; that this $60 per acre represented the selling price of the 200 acres as well as of every other acre in the combined tract; that it was their express agreement that he should be paid such sum per acre as the land sold for: that his brother by concealment induced him to give the deed at $25 per acre knowing the land was to be sold for $60 an acre, and after the sale continued to conceal the selling price from him until from outside sources he discovered what it was.

The evidence leaves little doubt but that for timber the 200 acres was not worth more than $20 per acre; but this is not a controlling consideration. The controlling considerations are two: First, what was the relationship between the plaintiff, and defendant in regard to the land which they owned in common? Second, what were the terms of the sale which defendant actually made? The first consideration is completely answered by the stipulation of the parties solemnly entered into upon the trial of the cause to the following effect: "It is admitted that the defendant was the agent of the plaintiff for the sale of the plaintiff's land." This relationship, of course, as matter of law, bound the defendant to the utmost good faith in his dealings with his principal. But, besides the obligation of the law, the testimony of the plaintiff and of his witnesses was that the defendant had agreed that plaintiff should have his full share of all the 200 acres sold for; that in the selling of the whole tract "all would go in at the same price by the acre"; that he (plaintiff) was to have the same price per acre that defendant received. "I was to have for my land just the same as the land sold for." To other witnesses the defendant is represented as saying that "when plaintiff's land went into the tract plaintiff would get his share per acre for which it was sold." It is undoubted that defendant kept plaintiff in ignorance of the price when he secured from him his deed to the land at $25 per acre. In his testimony he treats this transaction with his brother as a direct purchase by him of all his brother's rights, saying that he had made him an offer and "when the deed was signed by him of course I bought it"; that at the time he was satisfied that his sale was "going to go" and that he "took it" (his brother's land) and "took a chance as to whether the sale was going to go through." In the next breath he apparently denies that he made any offer for the land, and seemingly wishes to convey the idea that the deed is to be treated merely as a bond authorizing him to sell. This latter seems to be the view adopted by the attorneys for the defendant, from the following language of their brief which in contemplation of the evidence already quoted is at least singular: "It was admitted that defendant was the agent of the plaintiff; but there is no evidence that he purchased the property or even claimed that he had done so."

[1] It must be concluded, therefore, upon this proposition, that the admission of defendant and the evidence in the case abundantly support the proposition that fiduciary relations existed between the parties and by virtue of those fiduciary relations the defendant could not make any profit out of the sale of his principal's land by any transaction unknown to and unapproved by the principal himself. So axiomatic is this proposition that, of course, it does not require the citation of authority.

The second consideration turns upon the true nature of the sale which defendant actually effected, and here, at the outset, it should be said that if defendant charged with the duty of an agent can show that by the transaction he, himself, did not make any profit out of the sale of plaintiff's land, then, since the sale even at $25 an acre was a fair price, defendant is exonerated and plaintiff cannot recover. But upon this plaintiff's evidence established abundantly that the land was not sold for $1 for every thousand standing feet of timber per acre, but that the transaction actually was this: The purchasers were buying the land at the rate of $60 per acre if upon inspection they became satisfied that it averaged at least 60,000 standing feet of timber per acre. There was no contract that if it averaged 80,000 feet of timber per acre that the price should be $80 per acre. There was no contract whereby the parcels were to be segregated and valuations put upon them according to the amount of timber found thereon. For aught that appears the land may have averaged 150,000 feet of timber per acre; but the price was still $60 per acre to be paid after the intending purchasers had satisfied themselves of the amount of timber growing on the whole tract. Thus, one of the purchasers, Palmtag, testifying that they bought the tract from the defendant Shaw, and being asked what he paid for it, replied: "$60 an acre. Q. Was there any distinction as to any particular land selling for less, or did it all go at the rate of $60? A. It all went at $60 an acre." Lancaster, another of the purchasers, corroborates Palmtag, and, in answer to questions from the court, said that the bond for the deed specified on its face that the land was to be sold at the rate of $60 an acre and the deed followed the bond. Even the defendant testifying that the 200 acres was included in the sale, and being asked as to the land "if it all sold for $60 an acre," answered, "It sold if it averaged 60,000 feet to the acre." And, indeed, the very purpose of defendant's endeavors in securing the large tract for sale and including the 200 acres therein was to obtain for the 200 acres an enhanced price, a price so enhanced by the greater value of the surrounding lands. And here we may consider a proposition which appellant's counsel designate as one of controlling influence in the case. They state that the test of the transaction is: What sum would plaintiff be entitled to if the action were between him and the other owners of the land for an apportionment of the proceeds of the sale, and they proceed to argue that if all the landowners had sold they would apportion the proceeds according to the timber respectively on each seller's land. This might be true if a group of landowners were to put their lands together and so agree upon the sale; but it does not at all follow that this affords the measure of plaintiff's rights against his agent. If, in fact, such was defendant's agreement with the other sellers of land, and if he was by his contracts with them obliged to account to them on the sale in proportion to the timber growing on their lands, the evidence would have weight, not as controlling the relationship between plaintiff and defendant, but as showing what, in fact, the lands actually sold for, for that, of course furnishes the basis of the accounting between the principal and the agent. But the defendant does not pretend to offer evidence that he was so called upon to distribute the proceeds of the sale or that the lands of the others were paid for at any other rate than $60 an acre regardless of the amount of timber on them or even that for his own 100 acres of the undivided 200 acres he did not receive the full $60 per acres. If he did receive the full $60 an acre for his 100 acres, the plaintiff was entitled by virtue of the relationship between them to $60 for his 100 acres of the same undivided tract.

The evidence therefore clearly supports the verdict of the jury in this regard.

Complaint is made of certain instructions given and of the refusal to give others. The complaint is not addressed to any error of law embraced in the instructions given, but rests upon the declaration that they were inappropriate to the case. The foundation of the complaint is expressed in the brief of appellant's counsel that it was wrong to give instructions as to the right of the defendant to purchase his principal's lands, and his duties and responsibilities in the event that he did so purchase; and again the declaration is repeated that: "There was no evidence whatever even tending to show a purchase of the property by the defendant. The matter was absolutely outside the case and was not and could not have been in any manner an issue in the case." We think what has already been said is sufficient to dispose of this contention. Indeed, under the evidence it would have been error for the court to have refused to give the proposed instructions upon this very subject. In like manner it is said, as to many of the instructions touching the duties of an agent to his principal unimpeachable in themselves, that "they are all on matters which are not in issue in the case, matters upon which there is no evidence." The statement of the evidence above given demonstrates the unsoundness of his declaration. The instructions which the court refused were based upon the contention, which we have here declared to be untenable, that the sale of the land was in accordance with the amount of standing timber per acre. These refused instructions did not even leave that question open to the jury, but were declarations to the effect that such in fact was the nature of the sale, and that therefore plaintiff was entitled only to the "proportionate part of the average price which his land bore to the average quality of the land in the tract," with much more to the same effect. The instructions were properly refused.

[2] The other asserted errors in their varying forms are addressed to different phases of these same contentions. The objections which defendant makes to the answers given by the jury to special issues submitted by the court should have been remedied by him by a request at the time the answers were returned into court that the jury be required to render more definite and specific responses. He cannot here complain of them. Huss v. Chicago G. W. Ry. Co., 113 Iowa, 343, 85 N. W. 627; Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 106.

[3] This appeal being only from the order denying a new trial, the asserted defects in the complaint and the objection that the findings contradict or are at variance with the pleadings cannot here be considered. Schroeder v. Pissis, 128 Cal. 212, 60 Pac. 758; Moore v. Douglas, 132 Cal. 450, 64 Pac. 705.

For these reasons the order appealed from is affirmed.

1. CONTEMPT (§ 66*)—PUNISHMENT—REVIEW.

An order of the superior court dissolving an attachment against a bank officer, on refusal to state upon examination before the board of tax equalization how much money a certain person had in his bank, where the board had then finally adjourned so that no answer witness might be compelled to give would be available to any one, will not be reviewed; Code Civ. Proc. § 1222, making the judgment and orders in contempt proceedings conclusive.

2. CONTEMPT (§ 67*)—REVIEW—ANNULMENT ON CERTIORARI.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1222, providing that the judgment and orders of the court or judge in contempt proceedings are final and conclusive, an order made in contempt proceedings can only be annulled on certiorari when it is in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

Shaw and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting in part

In Bank. Application for writ of review by the People and others against the Honorable R. H. Latimer, Judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of Napa, to review an order discharging an attachment against the person. Order affirmed.

F. M. Silva, Dist. Atty. (Theo. A. Bell, of counsel), for petitioners. A. J. Hull, Frank L. Coombs, Percy S. King, and Chas. E. Trower, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an order made by the respondent, discharging and dissolving an attachment against the person of E. L. Bickford issued in a contempt proceeding.

On August 7, 1909, the chairman of the board of supervisors of the county of Napa made and filed with the clerk of the superior court of said county, and presented to the Honorable H. T. Gesford, the judge of said superior court, a verified certificate of facts. That certificate showed that on August 5, 1909, the board of supervisors of said county, sitting as a board of equalization, had before it for consideration and action the matter of directing the assessor of the said county to assess to one H. A. Crawford, a resident of said county, taxable property owned by said Crawford at 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday in March, 1909, which had escaped taxation; that previously, and on the 16th day of July, 1909, the clerk of the said board of supervisors, upon the order of said board, sitting as a board of equalization, had notified the said Crawford by letter, postpaid, and deposited in the post office at Napa, which was his place of residence, that said board would, on July 22, 1909, investigate the matter of directing the assessor of Napa county to assess to him any taxable property owned by him at 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday of March, 1909, and which had escaped taxation; that the investigation of said matter was continued from time to time until August 5, 1909, when it was taken up by said board of equalization for action; that at the said time E. L. Bickford was duly sworn as a witness, and after testifying that he was the cashier of the First National Bank of Napa, and knew whether or not said H. A. Crawford had any money on deposit in said bank at 12 o'clock meridian on said first Monday of March, 1909, was asked the following question: "Did H. A. Crawford have any money on deposit in the First National Bank of Napa on the first Monday in March, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian"; that said E. L. Bickford refused to answer said question, and thereupon the board, having determined that the question was proper and pertinent, directed the chairman of said board to require the witness to answer it; that the chairman of said board directed said witness to answer the question, but he again refused to do so; that the board thereupon unanimously declared that said witness be deemed in contempt for his refusal to answer, and directed the chairman of the board to report the facts to the judge of the superior court of Napa county, that such proceedings might be taken in said matter as required by law.

On the filing of said certificate with Judge Gesford, he issued an attachment directed to the sheriff, commanding him to attach the person of said E. L. Bickford forthwith and bring him before said judge; that thereafter and on August 7, 1909, the sheriff, under said attachment, brought said Bickford before said judge, and by stipulation of counsel the hearing was continued to August 10, 1909, to be taken up before respondent, judge of the superior court of Contra Costa county, sitting in the place and stead of said judge of the superior court of Napa county.

On August 10, 1909, the matter coming up before the respondent, Judge Latimer, counsel for Bickford moved to discharge the attachment on the grounds: (1) That the board of equalization had no jurisdiction over said H. A. Crawford mentioned in the certificate of facts; (2) that at the time of the alleged contempt the duty of the board of equalization had expired by limitation of time; (3) that said board had no power to assess any taxable property to H. A. Crawford which might have escaped taxation; (4) that the said board of equalization had no jurisdiction of E. L. Bickford by reason of the fact that he was an officer of a national bank.

No testimony or evidence was presented on the hearing. The motion was argued by counsel and submitted, and on August 12, 1909, an order was made by the respondent, Judge Latimer, that the attachment be dissolved and the said E. L. Bickford discharged.

Insisting that in making the order Judge Latimer exceeded his jurisdiction, this proceeding was instituted here to have such order reviewed and annulled, and such further order made as may be proper in the premises.

At the time the contempt proceedings came on for hearing in the superior court, the board of equalization had finally adjourned, it was no longer possible to receive any testimony from any one on the matters concerning which it had been sought to examine Bickford, and such matters had been definitely closed so far as such board was concerned.

[1] We are of the opinion that we cannot disturb the action of the trial court. Assuming purely for the purpose of this decision that Bickford was guilty of contempt under the provision of section 4068, Political Code, and should have been so adjudged, the board of equalization having finally adjourned, he could not have been imprisoned until he answered the questions that had been propounded to him as a witness before said board; in other words, he could not have been imprisoned as a means to compel such answers, as would have been permissible had the board still been in session, and in a position to take action in the matter wherein his testimony was desired. The situation was such, at the time of the hearing in the superior court, that any answers he might give would be of no value to any person. Nobody's rights could be affected thereby. The only penalty that it was possible for the trial court to impose was a fine or imprisonment for a stated period, or both such fine and imprisonment, simply as a punishment, and not in any degree for the protection of the rights of any third party.

Whether or not under such circumstances a person charged with contempt shall be adjudged guilty thereof and punished therefor is a matter solely within the discretion of the court entertaining the contempt proceedings. The law does not authorize an appeal in such matters, and it is expressly provided in section 1222, Code of Civil Procedure, that "the judgment and orders of the court or judge made in cases of contempt are final and conclusive."

[2] It is only when an order so made is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court making it that it may be annulled on certiorari. Even if we assume that the trial court erred in refusing to adjudge Bickford guilty of contempt, it cannot be held that it exceeded its jurisdiction in doing so. It simply erred while acting in the exercise of its jurisdiction. It has been held, as in Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 213, 73 Pac. 1006, that mandamus will lie at the suit of one beneficially interested to compel a court to employ the process of contempt against a witness to compel him to answer such questions, where such answers when given will be available to such party in a pending proceeding. Likewise, doubtless, mandamus will lie to compel such action on the part of a court to compel compliance with an order requiring the payment of alimony when the party is financially able to so comply, or in any case where compliance with an order is essential for the protection of the beneficial rights of the petitioner; but, except when there is some party beneficially interested in having the particular act constituting a contempt performed, the dismissal by a court or judge of a contempt proceeding is final and conclusive, and beyond review by any other tribunal. It cannot be held that there is in this matter any party so beneficially interested.

It follows that the order of the superior court must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment. A person who refuses to answer a question which a majority of the board of equalization decides to be proper and pertinent, as declared by section 4068 of the Political Code, "shall be deemed in contempt," whatever that may mean. Apparently he is in contempt of the authority of that board, but they have no power to punish him for the contempt. All that they can do is to report his contumacy to the superior court and cause his arrest and arraignment before that tribunal. When so arraigned, he has committed no contempt of court, and it is difficult to see how he can do so in connection with the cause of his arrest, unless, after the court shall have decided that the question is one he ought to answer and ordered him to answer, he still refuses. He is then, and for the first time, guilty of a contempt of court, for which the court may punish him by fine and imprisonment, and may keep him in prison until he does answer, or until the adjournment of the board puts it out of his power to answer. This in my opinion is the meaning and whole scope of the provisions of sections 4068 and 4069 of the Political Code, which, owing to the fact that the board of equalization had adjourned sine die before Bickford was arraigned before Judge Latimer, proved wholly inadequate to the exigencies of the case. It would have been vain for him to order Bickford to answer when there was no board in existence, to which an answer could be made, and since he could not order him to answer he could not punish him for not answering. He could do nothing in short but what he did—discharge the attachment for contempt—unless, as seems to be contended, Bickford's contempt of the authority of the board of equalization was a misdemeanor punishable as other misdemeanors, and that in a summary proceeding by the superior judge. But there is no statute making a contempt of the authority of the board of equalization a misdemeanor, and if it were a misdemeanor the Constitution would require it to be prosecuted in the name of the people of the state of California (article 6, § 20) and in the ordinary form of procedure and subject to the common rights of defendants in criminal actions.

The amount of it is that the statute needs to be amended and strengthened, by making the contempt of the board a misdemeanor and providing an adequate penalty. The present statute, owing to the short life of the board of equalization, is practically impotent.

SHAW, J. (dissenting). I agree with all that is said in the foregoing opinion by the court, except the discussion and conclusion to the effect that the order erroneously made by the superior court cannot be annulled on certiorari. The superior court was not without jurisdiction, for it still retained power to punish the party for the contempt by imposing a fine or imprisonment. It did not exercise its jurisdiction by deciding that Bickford should not, under the facts charged, be punished. It dismissed the proceeding solely because it decided that it had no jurisdiction to impose any punishment, no power to act at all in the matter. The court, by the order dismissing the proceeding, erroneously divested itself of further jurisdiction thereof. "Where such is the case, the writ of certiorari is a proper proceeding to annul the order." Hall v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 550, 12 Pac. 672; Levy v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 292, 5 Pac. 353; Hall v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 25, 8 Pac. 509; Carlson v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 631, 11 Pac. 788. The entire proceeding before the board of supervisors and the ancillary proceeding in the superior court was at the behest of the state, and they were had for the purpose of securing the equal taxation of the property liable thereto, a matter in which the state is directly interested and is, in fact, the real party in interest. It is therefore beneficially interested to a sufficient extent to give it a standing in court to have the order annulled and the prosecution for contempt of its authority completed and determined. The order dismissing the proceeding should, in my opinion, be annulled, and the superior court, being then invested with jurisdiction, could proceed to trial and judgment upon the charge against Bickford.

LORIGAN, J. (dissenting). I concur with the views expressed in the foregoing dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice SHAW. As to the prevailing opinion, while I am satisfied that from the undisputed certification of facts Bickford was guilty of contempt of the authority of the board of supervisors meeting as a board of equalization, I cannot agree with the view announced therein that there is no party beneficially interested in this proceeding who is entitled to have the order of the court annulled on certiorari.

The Constitution (article 13, § 1) requires all property not exempt from taxation to be taxed in proportion to its value, and under section 3672 of the Political Code the board of supervisors meeting as a board of equalization is invested with the power and it is made its duty to carry this constitutional mandate into effect. It is directed by said section 3672 to "equalize the assessment of all property in the county," and unless all property is assessed necessarily the assessment is not equal and the constitutional mandate that all property be taxed is not carried into effect. The board, as an agency of the state, was proceeding to carry out this duty under the provisions of the law authorizing it to examine witnesses for that purpose when Bickford refused to testify and for such refusal was guilty of contempt under section 4068 of the Political Code and to punishment therefor under section 4069 of the same Code.

These proceedings before the board in the matter of equalizing assessments are essential proceedings in which the state is vitally interested, being directed, under the provisions of the Constitution and statutes, toward the securing of the equal assessment of all property. This being true, it must be equally beneficially interested in proceedings brought to punish for a contempt of its authority in an endeavor to discharge this public duty. There is no room for any distinction as far as the public interests—the interests of the state—are concerned in proceedings before the board in the matter of the equalization of assessments and proceedings for contempt of the authority of the board in attempting to do so. They are both in aid of the public interests.

While, of course, it must be conceded that when the order discharging the attachment was made there was no board in session before which Bickford might have voluntarily appeared to purge himself of contempt or before which the court might have required him to appear and answer and order him imprisoned until he did so, still this afforded no warrant for the action of the court in discharging the attachment and releasing him. He was guilty of contempt in refusing to answer before a board which was lawfully in session at the time of the refusal. If the result of his contumacy was that before he could be brought to bar for contempt his opportunity to purge himself therefrom was gone, this constituted no reason why the judge of the superior court should have discharged him without punishment. He was still guilty of contempt, and the court should have exercised its power and punished him by fine or imprisonment or both.

Respondent claims that by the order discharging Bickford the superior court has now lost jurisdiction to proceed at all against him, and that no substantial benefit can be obtained by an annulment of the order. I do not agree with this view. The effect of the annulment of the order in question here is to leave the proceeding before that court as it stood when that order was made. It then had jurisdiction of him, and it has now the power to secure his presence before it by a bench warrant. It is its duty to do so and try him for the alleged contempt, and if found guilty punish him. Such disposition of the case is essential in my judgment to the proper maintenance of the power and dignity of the state.

SHAW, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Justice LORIGAN.

KEESEY v. KEESEY. (L. A. 2,594.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 14, 1911.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 37*) — GROUNDS — DESERTION — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Defendant held not guilty of deserting her husband, within Civ. Code, §§ 95, 96.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Index.

2. DIVORCE (§ 37*)—GROUNDS—DESERTION—DECLARATIONS OF PARTIES.

Where a wife was residing in the same house with her husband, and was carrying on such wifely duties as preparing the meals, though the spouses did not occupy the marital bed, her declaration that she would not again live with her husband neither constituted desertion nor justified the husband in leaving her.

3. DIVORCE (§ 37*)—GROUNDS—DESERTION—EVIDENCE—VOLUNTARY SEPARATION.

Where a husband announced to his wife that he had changed his residence, and would not take her with him, and within a year would get a divorce for her desertion, and she agreed to that proposal, and the husband departed without her, such conduct is not evidence of desertion, but only establishes separation by consent, with the understanding that one of the parties would apply for a divorce.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action for divorce by O. M. Keesey against Anna D. Keesey. From an interlocutory decree for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Smith, Miller & Phelps, for appellant. Wellborn & Wellborn and J. W. Morin, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action for divorce, in which the defendant appeals from an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleged extreme cruelty and desertion, which was denied by defendant, and the court found in favor of the plaintiff on the ground of desertion only. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

There was not much evidence introduced in the case aside from the testimony of the parties themselves. Plaintiff and defendant were married in 1896, in Orange county, in this state, and lived together at various places—San Luis Obispo county, Los Angeles, and the state of Texas—up to the time of the alleged desertion. Plaintiff was a widower at the time of his marriage, and in December, 1906, he and his wife were living temporarily at the residence of his married daughter, Mrs. Hill, in Los Angeles. During some part of that month, a serious altercation arose at the residence of Mrs. Hill between the parties—husband, wife, and daughter—resulting in Mrs. Hill ordering the defendant from her house. Defendant at once left. As to her departure, plaintiff testified that "she left, and said she would never live with me again. She went to the New Hampshire street place, and lived there. She said we would never live together there, and I said I had a place to stay." Defendant at once took up her residence in a house on New Hampshire street. Mrs. Hill, after defendant left her residence, moved all the articles belonging to defendant out of the house, placing them in a shed on her premises, from which next day defendant had them removed to the house on New Hampshire street. After the defendant left Mrs. Hill's residence, the plaintiff remained there for a few days, when his daughter returned to her home in Texas. Upon the departure of his daughter, plaintiff went to live with his wife at the New Hampshire street house, which contained four rooms and a kitchen. The plaintiff testified: "The defendant and I agreed to both live in the New Hampshire street house, and we did so. I lived on one side and she on the other side of the house; I got the stuff and she cooked it, and we boarded together." The defendant testified more in detail as to this arrangement, and plaintiff did not question its accuracy. She said: "Mr. Keesey came there [to the New Hampshire street house], and said he would come and live there; that he would live on one side and I on the other. I said, 'Which side do you want?' He said he wanted two rooms and a kitchen. He said I could have two rooms, and I said, 'All right.' Then he said he would get the groceries and stuff to eat, if I would cook it, and I said I was willing." This arrangement was carried out until March, 1907; the house being so occupied by them; she preparing the meals, which they ate together. While they were living at this residence, plaintiff was ill for some time, confined to his bed from the effects of an old gunshot wound in his leg. During this period, he was under the care of a doctor, and defendant waited on him, giving him his medicine, treated and dressed his wounded leg, and prepared and brought his meals to his room.

In March, 1907, apparently without any previous discussion between the parties on the subject, plaintiff told defendant that he was going back to Arroyo Grande, in San Luis Obispo county, where he had some property upon which, several years previously, the parties had lived. As to this intended departure, plaintiff testified: "I told her I was going back to Arroyo Grande. I did not ask her to go with me; she had said she would never live with me any more the day they had the fight in Mrs. Hill's house. I packed up the furniture in the house before I went to Arroyo Grande. * * * I took all the furniture there was in the house, both on her side and on my side. I think there were the springs on the cot and an old oil stove left. * * * As soon as I could get them to the depot and shipped, I went back to Arroyo Grande, and I still live there." The defendant testified as to the departure of plaintiff: "He said he was going to move to Arroyo Grande, and was going to take the things out of the house, but he did not ask me to go with him. I was willing to go with him and live with him, if his daughter would leave us alone. * * * He said that he would not live with me any more. When Mr. Keesey went to Arroyo Grande the last time, in March, 1907, he said, 'You are not to go with me,' and he said, 'In a year I will get a divorce from you on the ground of desertion,' and I agreed to it." These statements of the defendant were not denied by plaintiff, and, in fact, they agreed in the main with the testimony of plaintiff. Defendant further testified that she stayed at the house until all the things were packed, and there was not a thing left for her to sleep on or cook with, or anything to eat. "I was willing to go to Arroyo Grande with him, if he asked me. I would have lived with him at any time up to the time he filed the suit, and would now, but not with his daughter." It further appears from the testimony of defendant, and not contradicted by plaintiff, that after this suit for divorce was brought plaintiff visited defendant several times at her residence in Pasadena. These visits were friendly and somewhat prolonged; the plaintiff, at the invitation of defendant, remaining to have supper with her. When he visited her, he asked her if she would not agree to let him have a divorce, which she declined to do, stating that she did not think he was entitled to it.

A witness on behalf of plaintiff testified that while the parties were both living at the New Hampshire street house she heard the defendant say that she would never live with plaintiff again, and he said that it was no use for them to try and live together. These statements were not denied by either party. Another witness testified that at the same residence, while the parties were living together, defendant desired her to ask plaintiff if he would live with her again, which she did, and plaintiff answered that he would not; that he was going to pack up everything and take them to Arroyo Grande.

This presents all the material evidence in the case. No property question was involved, and the little evidence respecting property shows that each of the spouses was possessed of separate means. It appears that there were no very serious quarrels between the couple. Plaintiff himself testified "she never mistreated me much." Neither of them mentioned any trouble between them, except the altercation at the residence of the daughter, in December, 1906, which seems more to have involved Mrs. Hill and the defendant than the plaintiff. He testified that his wife was of a very violent temper; she said nothing against him; but the daughter testified in an indefinite way that most of the quarrels between the parties were about investments in real estate.

On this appeal the reply of respondent to the claim of appellant that there is no evidence to sustain the finding of desertion is that the record shows that on this subject the evidence was conflicting, and for that reason the finding cannot be disturbed here. But we do not perceive any conflict in any material evidence. The evidence appears to us to be all one way, and to show that if there was desertion at all that in fact and in law it could more reasonably be asserted to be the desertion of defendant by plaintiff.

[1] "Willful desertion is 'the voluntary separation of one of the married parties from the other with intent to desert,' and is manifested " * * * by the refusal of either party to dwell in the same house with the other party when there is no just cause for such refusal." Civ. Code, §§ 95, 96. "Separation by consent with or without the understanding that one of the parties will apply for a divorce is not desertion." Civ. Code, § 99. The allegation of the complaint, which the court found was sustained by the evidence, is that: "On or about the month of December, 1906, * * * defendant * * * willfully * * * deserted and abandoned plaintiff, and * * * still continues without cause to desert and abandon plaintiff and to live separate and apart from him without sufficient cause, * * * and against his will and without his consent." To constitute the offense of desertion as alleged, the evidence must show that the defendant voluntarily separated from the plaintiff; that she had refused to dwell with him in the same house without any just cause for the refusal, and that this was done with intent to desert the plaintiff. It is quite clear that the evidence fails entirely to measure up to these requirements. It is obvious from the allegations of the complaint and the testimony of plaintiff on the trial that his sole claim of desertion on the part of defendant is that, following the altercation at the residence of the daughter of plaintiff, in December, 1906, and when she was ordered out of the house by the daughter, she declared to plaintiff that she would never live with him again, and that from that day she had never done so. But, in the light of events subsequent to this declaration by defendant, which was made, doubtless, in an angry moment, when smarting under the indignity of being ordered from his daughter's home without any protest on the part of plaintiff, the fact is that within the month after defendant went to the New Hampshire street house their matrimonial cohabitation was resumed; they dwelt together there, and this cohabitation continued up to the time that plaintiff departed for Arroyo Grande. It is of no moment that the parties occupied different parts of the house, and did not occupy the matrimonial bed. Plaintiff dictated when he came there to live with defendant how they should occupy the rooms in the house; he made no request that the matrimonial cohabitation should be any different than what it was, while, on the part of defendant, she testified that he might have occupied her room with her, had he so wished. But, whether he occupied her room or not, there was a general cohabitation resumed between them at his solicitation after she took up her residence at the New Hampshire street house; they occupied the same house, and their relations were perfectly amicable; they ate their meals together, which in the discharge of her wifely duties she prepared, and in his illness she affectionately ministered to his wants. Under these conditions and without any cause whatever for doing so, the plaintiff stripped the house of all its furniture, both on her side and his, leaving her nothing but "the springs on the cot and an old oil stove," and without asking her to accompany him left the house and her, and took up his residence on his property at Arroyo Grande. He not only did not, as in the discharge of his legal duty to his wife he should have done, require her to accompany him, but, according to her statement (which he does not deny), left her with a declaration on his part that she was not to go with him, and that in a year he would get a divorce from her on the ground of desertion. Under these unquestioned facts in the case, there is no room for any claim that defendant was guilty of desertion of plaintiff.

[2] But it is said that there was testimony that defendant had declared, while she and plaintiff were occupying the New Hampshire street house, that she never would live with plaintiff again. But that testimony amounts to nothing. When this declaration was made, as was also his declaration to the same effect, they were then actually dwelling together in the same house, and her declaration of what she would not do in the present case simply did not accord with the fact of what she was then actually doing.

[3] Nor is the uncontradicted testimony of defendant that plaintiff said when he left that she was not to go with him, and that in a year he would get a divorce from her, and that she agreed to it, of any moment at all in establishing desertion on her part. On the contrary, this evidence would only establish separation by consent, with the understanding that one of the parties would apply for a divorce, which the Code expressly declares would not constitute desertion. Civ. Code, § 99. It would also establish a collusion, which would preclude the granting of a divorce to either party. Civ. Code, § 114.

The decree and order appealed from are reversed.

PARKINSON v. JOHNSON, Governor.

(S. F. 5,927.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 18, 1911.)

1. STATUTES (§ 32*)—RETURN OF BILL BY GOVERNOR—VETO—RECORD.

There is neither constitutional nor statutory provision requiring any record to be kept by the Governor concerning bills returned by him without his signature, nor requiring any record to be made of the date of the return of such bills in the journals of either house, or on the bills themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 26*)—ADOPTION—METHOD.

A bill may become a law by signature of the Governor after passage by the Legislature; by the Governor retaining it without signing it for 10 days (Sundays excepted) after its delivery to him, and his causing a certificate of the fact to be made on the bill by the Secretary of State, and depositing the bill with the laws in the office of such secretary; or by passage of the bill over the Governor's veto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-34; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 285*)—ENACTMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where a bill, after having been passed by the Legislature, has been properly enrolled, authenticated, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, it having been either signed by the governor, retained by him without signing for 10 days (Sundays excepted), and the fact certified to by him, or passed over his veto, it is conclusive evidence of the legislative will; and courts will not look to the journals of the Legislature, or permit any other evidence to be submitted, to determine whether or how the bill passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 27, 384, 385; Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 286*)—PASSAGE—RETURN BY GOVERNOR—EVIDENCE OF JOURNALS.

Const. art. 4, § 10, requires each house of the Legislature to keep a journal of its proceedings and publish the same, and enter the yeas and nays of either house on any question, at the desire of any three members. Section 16 declares that every bill which has passed the Legislature before it becomes a law shall be presented to the Governor; that if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, which shall enter such objections on the journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration it again passes both houses, it shall become a law, notwithstanding the Governor's objections, and if any bill shall not be returned within 10 days after presentation to him (Sundays excepted), it shall become a law as though signed, unless the Legislature has adjourned. Held that, since such provisions do not require an entry in the journals of the house of the date a bill was returned by the Governor without his signature, an entry of the date of such return was not conclusive of the date on which the bill was in fact returned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

5. STATES (§ 41*)—LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT—GOVERNOR.

Under Const. art. 4, § 16, requiring all bills that have passed the Legislature to be presented to the Governor before they become a law, the Governor is a component part of the lawmaking power.

In Bank. Application for mandamus by J. H. Parkinson, as executor of the will of James Tuohy, deceased, against Hiram W. Johnson, as Governor of the State of California. Denied and dismissed.

R. Platnauer, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. C. Van Fleet, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the respondent, as governor of the state of California, commanding him to cause assembly bill No. 208, passed by both houses of the last session of the Legislature, to be certified by the Secretary of State as a statute of the state.

The following facts are alleged in the petition: That during the last session of the Legislature there originated in the assembly a certain bill, known as assembly bill No. 208, entitled "An act to authorize the personal representatives of James Tuohy, deceased, to bring suit against the state of California." That on February 16, 1911, said assembly bill passed the assembly of the state of California, and on March 6, 1911, said bill passed the Senate of said state. That on March 11, 1911, said assembly bill was presented to and received by respondent, as Governor of the state of California, for his consideration as such Governor, at which time said bill had been and was properly enrolled and authenticated as prescribed by law. That said assembly bill has not been approved by respondent, and was not returned by him to the assembly of the state of California within 10 days (excluding Sundays) after said 11th day of March, 1911. That said bill was not returned by respondent to the assembly until March 24, 1911, on which date it was returned to it by respondent with his objections, and said objections were thereupon, and on said March 24, 1911, entered upon the journal of the assembly. That the said journal of the assembly of said March 24, 1911, contains the following entry: "Messages from the Governor. The following messages from the Governor were received and read. Sacramento, Cal. March 23, 1911. To the Assembly of the State of California: I return you herewith without my approval assembly bill No. 208 entitled 'An act to authorize the personal representatives of James Tuohy, deceased, to bring suit against the state of California. [Here follow the objections stated by the respondent for declining to approve the bill.] For the reasons given I have vetoed the bill. Respectfully submitted, Hiram W. Johnson, Governor of California.'" That there is no other or different entry of any objections of the respondent to said assembly bill in the journal of the said assembly. That petitioner has demanded of respondent that, as Governor, he cause the Secretary of State of California to certify on said assembly bill the fact that said bill was not returned by the Governor within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after its receipt by him, and that said assembly bill became a law.

Upon these alleged facts the petitioner asks for a mandate to respondent, commanding him to cause the fact to be certified on the bill, by the Secretary of State, as provided by section 1313 of the Political Code, that said assembly bill had remained with the Governor 10 days (Sundays excepted), and had therefore become a law.

The answer of respondent to the petition admits all the allegations contained therein, excepting those relating to his alleged failure to return the bill to the assembly within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it was presented to him, or that the bill was not returned until March 24, 1911. These particular allegations are denied, and as a separate answer respondent alleges that the assembly bill in question was received at the office of the Governor and receipted for by his private secretary on March 11, 1911; that said bill was returned by said private secretary personally to the assembly within 10 days (Sundays excepted) thereafter, to wit, on the afternoon of March 23, 1911, with the message from the Governor (referred to in the petition), vetoing it; that at the time said bill was returned, on March 23, 1911, the assembly was in regular session; that said private secretary was duly recognized by the presiding officer of the assembly, and announced that he was delivering to it a message from the Governor, and delivered said message with said bill to the proper officer of the said assembly. A demurrer to the answer was interposed by the petitioner, and the matter is before us after argument on the demurrer and the submission thereof.

[1] The Constitution (section 10, art. 4) provides that "each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings and publish the same and the yeas and nays of either house on any question shall at the desire of any three members be entered on the journal." Section 16, art. 4, of the same Constitution provides that "every bill which may have passed the Legislature shall before it becomes a law be presented to the Governor. If he approve it he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated which shall enter such objections upon the journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration it again pass both houses * * * it shall become a law notwithstanding the Governor's objections. If any bill shall not be returned within ten days after it shall have been presented to him (Sundays excepted) the same shall become a law in like manner as if he had signed it unless the Legislature by adjournment," etc. These are the only sections of the Constitution having any bearing on the question involved here. There is no provision, either constitutional or statutory, requiring any record to be kept in the office of the Governor respecting bills returned by him to the Legislature with his veto thereof; nothing requiring any record to be made of the date of the return of such bills; nor is there any provision which requires any officer of either house of the Legislature to make any notation or entry upon a bill returned by the Governor as to the date or time when it was returned to the house with his objections thereto, or requiring any entry on the journals of either house respecting the return, save what is required by section 16 of the Constitution, above quoted.

[2, 3] There are three ways in which a bill can become a law: By the signature of the Governor after its passage by the Legislature; by the Governor retaining a bill without signing it for 10 days (Sundays excepted) after its delivery to him, and his causing a certificate of the fact to be made on the bill by the Secretary of State, and the bill deposited with the laws in the office of said Secretary; or by the passage of a bill over the veto of the Governor. In all these cases, if the act is properly enrolled, authenticated, and deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, it is conclusive evidence of the legislative will, and courts will not look into the journals of the Legislature, or permit any other evidence to be submitted, to determine whether or how a bill passed. People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 560; Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 64 Pac. 403, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41; People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9. So that, as to all bills upon which there has been favorable action, due enrollment, authentication, and deposit in the office of the Secretary of State of such bill is conclusive evidence of the legislative will.

The bill in question here is not found in the office of the Secretary of State, authenticated as the law of this state. The petitioner, however, seeks to have the respondent compelled to deposit it there, with the authentication of the Secretary of State thereon, as evidence that it had become a law, under section 16 of the Constitution, through the failure of the Governor to return it to the assembly where it originated, with his objections thereto, within 10 days after its presentation to him. In the absence of such deposit and authentication, the position of petitioner in this proceeding is that the entry in the journal of the assembly (which respondent admits in his answer is correctly set forth) shows that the bill was not returned by the Governor to the assembly until more than 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it had been presented to him; that the journal entry is conclusive evidence of this fact, and that parol testimony or extraneous evidence cannot be received to dispute, contradict, or vary such recital; that the facts set forth in the answer constitute an attempt on the part of the respondent to contradict by parol evidence the recital of the assembly journal, which under the rule contended for by petitioner he insists may not be done, and that the demurrer to the answer for these reasons should be sustained. This is the only point presented on the demurrer, and in our judgment it does not require extended discussion because, conceding for present purposes that the position of petitioner is correct—that entries in the assembly journals are conclusive as to matters contained therein—they can only be conclusive as to matters which are actually recited therein, and which are specifically required to be entered in those journals.

[4] Now when we come to consider the entry in the journal upon which the petitioner relies, and the provisions of section 16 of article 4 of the Constitution, which is the only section that directs specially what shall be entered in the assembly records when a bill is returned by the Governor with his objections thereto, we find that the journal in fact contains no entry or recital of the time when the bill was returned by the Governor to the assembly, and, further, that neither the section of the Constitution referred to nor any other section requires any such entry. All that the assembly journal of March 24, 1911, contains respecting the bill here in question is a recital that "the following messages from the Governor were received and read," followed by a verbatim copy of the objections contained in the veto message accompanying the bill in question here, and the date of the message—March 23, 1911. This entry only shows that the message was read to the assembly on the 24th of March. The fact that it was returned by the Governor on that date, or any other date, is nowhere stated in the journal. It is silent on that subject. But, even if the journal entry could be considered as amounting to a recital that the bill, accompanied by the objections of the Governor, was returned by him to the assembly on the 24th, because it is referred to in the journal of the proceedings of the assembly of that date, such recital would not be conclusive upon the matter. In order to make the journal entries conclusive, there must be some provision of the law which requires such entries to be made therein, and, as far as making an entry in the journal, as of the time when a bill with his objections is returned to either house of the Legislature by the Governor, there is no such provision. There are only two pertinent sections of the Constitution respecting journal entries involved here—section 10 and section 16 of article 4. Section 10 requires that each house shall keep a journal of "its proceedings," and the return of a bill without his approval by the Governor is not a proceeding of either house of the Legislature, so there is nothing in this section referred to which requires such entry. In fact, petitioner does not claim that it does. He relies particularly on section 16, but an examination of that section will show there is nothing contained in it requiring any such entry.

[5] Under our Constitution, the Governor is a component part of the lawmaking power of the state. To him all bills must be submitted for action before becoming laws, and all that section 16 requires (as far as pertinent here) in discharge of his duty as a part of the legislative branch of the government, with respect to such bills, is that, if he disapproves any of them, he must return it to either house within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after he receives it, with his objections. When this is done, the duty of the Governor is discharged, and the duty to be performed by the house where the bill originated, and to which it is returned, arises, and that duty is simply to enter the objections of the executive upon the journal, and proceed to consider the bill. There is not a word in the section which requires that any entry shall be made in the journal respecting the time when the bill is returned by the Governor. And we would hardly expect to find a provision requiring such an entry, and to which the conclusive evidence rule would apply; the effect of such a provision would be to make inadvertent and erroneous recitals in the journal of one branch of the Legislative power control the action of the executive as another branch thereof, and by such recitals defeat the veto power constitutionally vested in the latter, and which he had in due time properly exercised. As all acts of the Legislature receiving favorable consideration are enrolled, authenticated, and deposited with the Secretary of State, and when this is properly done are conclusive evidence of the legislative will, it is only in extremely rare cases that it will become necessary to resort elsewhere to ascertain whether an act, not so found in the office of the Secretary of State, did in fact become a law. This is one of these rare cases, where the journals of the assembly are resorted to under a claim that there are recitals therein which are conclusive evidence that the Governor failed to return the bill in question, with his veto thereof, within the time allowed by the Constitution; and hence it became a law. But, as we have pointed out, there is no provision of the Constitution which requires any such entry of the date of return to be set forth in the journal of the assembly, and in fact it contains no such entry. If it did, it would not be conclusive, because the conclusive evidence rule can only apply to such entries as are constitutionally required to be set out in the journal. On the hearing of this demurrer, it was admitted by petitioner, while insisting on the conclusiveness of the record, that he could not question the truth of the fact set forth in the answer respecting the return of the bill by the Governor on March 23d, as stated therein.

The demurrer to the answer is overruled, and, as the facts set forth in the answer are in effect admitted to be true by petitioner, it is not necessary to proceed further in this matter, and therefore the petition for a peremptory writ of mandate is dismissed.
